CORRESPONDENCE.

Description of the Eclipse.

By S. J. GUMMERE, President of Haverford College.

Wm. J. Allinson, dear friend.—A long cherished desire has been gratified in a most satisfactory view of the total eclipse of the 7th inst., and in fulfilment of my promise I must endeavor to give thee a brief account of the beautiful phenomenon as I saw it.

Prof. McClune, of Philadelphia, accompanied me to this place. Each of us was provided with a telescope of moderate dimensions and power; we had also a chronometer and a few instruments for meteorological observations. Daniel Hunt, Isaac Cook, and other Friends in and about Oskaloosa, were very kind and efficient in selecting a suitable location, and in furnishing us with everything needful for our purposes.

After several days of cloud and storm, the morning of the 7th came bright and cloudless, and with a temperature delightfully cool and bracing. Two hours before the calculated time for the beginning of the eclipse we were at our station, engaged in the final adjustment of instruments, and occasionally examining the beautiful clusters of spots visible on the surface of the yet unobscured sun.

While thus occupied and thus waiting for the great event of the day, I was much impressed with the practical illustration which was then being given of the definition of faith as "the evidence of things not seen." Scattered along a well-defined line crossing the whole continent, hundreds of observers were at the same time awaiting the coming of the shadow whose boundaries and movements for this day had been predicted scores of years before. Nothing visible on earth or in the heavens gave any indication of the approach of an unusual event, yet of all the expectant multitude no one entertained a doubt that the prediction of the astronomer would presently be fully verified. This remarkable confidence involved faith in the abstruse formulæ of the mathematician, faith in the observations of the practical astronomer, faith in the logarithmic and other tables, and in the intricate processes of the computer, and, above all, faith in the constancy of those laws of nature which are but the expression of the will of the Author of nature.

Soon a glance at the chronometer assured us that the moon's penumbra had already touched the earth, and that far away, off the shores of Japan, the eclipse had just commenced. Again a little time of waiting, and the shadow has swept across the Pacific Ocean, over the Rocky Mountains and the broad prairies, and now that it is within one or two hundred miles of our own position, we fix our eyes intently on the precise point of the sun's limb at which we know that the indentation of the disk will occur. Silence prevails in the company about us, while an assistant announces audibly each successive beat of the chronometer. Thus the seconds of one minute are counted out: another, and yet another, and the bright circle is still perfect; but with the third second of the next minute the first indentation of the limb is simultaneously noticed by each observer.

From this moment onward, the state of the thermometer and barometer was noted at short intervals, and the exact time at which the moon's dark limb reached each conspicuous spot was also observed. As yet the appearances were those of an ordinary partial eclipse, familiar to us all, except that in the constancy of direction of the line joining the cusps of the diminishing sun, we had visible evidence of the direct approach of the centres of the moon and the sun.

But now the moment was near which was to present the novel experience of the total obliteration of the sun from a cloudless sky, while yet high in the heavens. Again the beats of the chronometer were counted, as we watched through the telescopes the rapidly vanishing remnant of the sun. The total obscuration came with a suddenness that made it easy to determine the precise instant; and yet the first subsequent glance with the unassisted eye raised a momentary doubt of the fact. The dark glass of the telescope had concealed the beautiful "corona," which immediately revealed itself to the naked eye, and which, in the first surprise, seemed a portion of the sun's limb itself yet unobscured.

The total eclipse so long anticipated had now come, and everything was as favorable as could have been desired for its observation, except that all must be done within the short space of three minutes.

The first object that claimed attention was the "Corona" itself, that wonderful and still mysterious accompaniment of total solar eclipses. In color, brilliancy and form, the corona on this occasion was singularly irregular. Above the dark body of the moon, it appeared of a brilliant white, and of greater extent than elsewhere. On the right and the left of the vertex rose-colored flames or rays appeared, but by far the brightest tints were exhibited near the lowest point of the moon's limb. Here, too, was a most remarkable crimson-colored projection, apparently a solid appendage to the moon, and reaching to a distance from its limb of perhaps one-third of the moon's radius. The upper part of the corona especially bore some resemblance to an auroral display, and the whole phenomenon produced a strong impression of intensely energetic action about and beyond the dark body that hid the sun from sight.

On opposite sides of the sun the planets Venus and Mercury shone conspicuously. The view of the latter planet, a body so rarely seen with distinctness on account of its vicinity to the sun, was of itself an interesting feature of the display. I had made a memorandum of the position of the brightest fixed stars, and spent a few precious seconds in scanning those regions of the sky in which they should appear. Owing to the want of time, and partly, perhaps, to the fatigue of the eye, I did not discover any of them, but numerous observers about us saw with perfect distinctness a number of stars which we readily recognized from their subsequent descriptions of position.

From this hasty search for stars I turned to an examination of the nature and the density of the darkness, and its effect on the appearance of surrounding objects.

The obscurity was greater than I had anticipated, yet it did not resemble that of a starlight or a moonlight night. It was rather the blackness and gloom of the thunder-storm presented with manifold greater intensity. The thick shade seemed like a thing of substance and of weight covering and pressing the surface of the earth. Gleams of light skirted the horizon, coming by reflection and refraction from the regions beyond the shadow; and as the moon advanced from limb to limb of the sun, this glow in the horizon faded on the one side and brightened on the other. A Friend who, on his return from Spring Creek Monthly Meeting, was overtaken by the total obscuration in the middle of a thick grove, described the sudden darkness as something truly awful.

As some criterion of the actual degree of darkness, we had requested one of the company about us to try the legibility of a printed page during the greatest obscuration. On this page were two sizes of type;—one corresponding nearly with the general type of the Review, the other with that of the Obituary Notices and the "Summary of News."

His report was that the larger type was read without difficulty, the smaller with difficulty. I afterwards noticed the time in the dusk of the evening which corresponded as nearly as possible with this statement, and with the strange darkness of the eclipse still vividly impressed on the mind, was greatly struck with the contrast in the appearance and general effect of the darkness on the two occasions.

With the re-apppearance of the sun, the interest of the occasion seemed destroyed; or rather it had become a thing of memory and of the past; and yet I do not know whether this re-appearance was not the grandest spectacle of all. So quickly was the darkness that covered the face of the earth removed, so sudden was the transition from night to day, that probably there were few intelligent spectators who were not at the instant reminded of the sublime words that describe the opening act of creation: "And God said, 'Let there be light,' and there was light." The throng of spectators about our station now rapidly diminished; but we continued our observations of the sun's disk as the groups and clusters of spots were again successively uncovered, until the orb of day recovered his wonted fulness of lustre and perfection of form.

It has frequently been stated that in total eclipses the dark shadow of the moon may, in favorable situations, be distinctly seen sweeping over the surface of the earth as it approaches the spectator or recedes from him. I was not able to satisfy myself on this point by personal observation, on account of being engaged at the telescope at those instants when, if ever, the grand spectacle was to be seen. A gentleman, however, who joined us shortly after the shadow had passed away, assured us that he had a perfect view of the rushing shadow as it approached him with the velocity of more than 40 miles per minute. After observing the unexpected suddenness of the transition from darkness to light, I am more ready to believe in the reality of this phenomenon, of which, on account of the gradual darkening of the penumbra into the perfect shadow, I had previously been doubtful.

The late eclipse has been observed with a care and with a variety of instrumental means and appliances altogether unexampled in the history of astronomical research. Interesting results, and, perhaps, important additions to the sum of human knowledge, may be expected from the deliberate study and comparison of the collected records of these observations.

For the gratifying success which is already known to have crowned the well-matured plans of observation of numerous individuals and parties, due credit should be awarded to the self-denying zeal of those whom all the wonders of the eclipse could not withdraw from their self-imposed labors with the telescope or the chronometer, the spectroscope or the photographic plate. Like Whittier's Abraham Davenport, though sudden darkness covered the land, these faithful sons of science remained steadfast at the post of duty. Very truly thy friend,

SAMUEL J. GUMMERE.

Education in North Carolina—The Normal School—The Eclipse.

BALTIMORE, 8th mo. 16, 1869.

Dear friend Wm. J. Allinson.—The readers of the "Review" expect to be informed about what is passing among our Friends in North Carolina, and I take pleasure in giving the outlines of a recent visit to Friends' Normal School at Springfield, in company with Jesse Tyson. This is the fourth year the teachers and advanced scholars have thus spent their summer vacation together under the training of experienced teachers, among whom were President Jos. Moore, of Earlham College, and Eli Jay and wife of Indiana. There are 80 students upon the roll, and the standard of education is the highest the Normal has yet reached. The exercises were such as are usual at our best institutions at the North, and embrace the rudiments as well as the higher branches of learning. There have been more visitors this year than usual, including a number of the public men of the State, such as Professors of the State University and some of the Colleges, School Commissioners, State Superintendent of Education and State Geologist. North Carolina has passed laws for public instruction, but for the want of means nothing has yet been done.

During the week of our visit the teachers of the First-day School gave their 250 children a delightful pic-nic in the beautiful grove surrounding the meeting and school houses. The table was of rough boards, 30 inches wide and 250 feet long, covered with pure white cloth, arched with evergreens at intervals of fifty feet, with a rope fence around the entire table at a distance of ten feet;—this gave a frontage of 500 ft. for the children, parents and others, while the teachers and waiters had the intermediate space. The result was perfect order, and as the well-clad crowd of over 1000 stood in silence before this table, richly loaded with fruit and the handiwork of devoted mothers and sisters, we thought we never saw a more beautiful sight of the kind. We could but contrast it with the poverty and destitution of the same dear friends five years ago, when a wing of Johnson's army was encamped 12,000 strong upon the same spot, prepared to dispute the march of Sherman's army. Truly the Lord has preserved and blessed this people. Previous to dinner, Findley Tomlinson gave a lecture, and the children went through their exercises. After the meal, Jos. Moore and F. T. King each delivered an address.

About seven hundred of the company, including all the children and teachers, passed to an open field on the "Swarthmore Farm," near by, to witness the eclipse, and hear an explanatory lecture from Prof. Jos. Moore, illustrated by a diagram. Care had been taken to provide smoked glass for all, and when the signal was given that the eclipse had begun, there was a murmur of pleasure from old and young. We saw it under the most favorable circumstances—the dark, rapid shadow, as the eclipse became total—the splendid corona—two large beads of violet and green light, one at the lower edge and the other to the right of it—the visible planets—the green sickly shade over the extensive landscape—the hushed awe of the vast company—the reversed shadow and the burst of pent up feelings when the first beams of the sun reappeared. Immediately after the eclipse the thermometer fell 20°, and the next two mornings it was as low as 52° at sunrise, continuing very cool during the entire day.

I have been present at many social gatherings of Friends in North Carolina in their efforts to keep families and children together, through innocent recreation and improving exercises, regulated by the presence of parents and concerned friends, but this was the most interesting day of them all.

This week winds up our fourth scholastic year in North Carolina. Friends' schools have increased from 12 to 44, and the pupils at the close of each year have been 940—2143—2586—this year about 4200. All the children attend our week-day meetings and First-day schools, and many of them who are not members also attend our meetings for worship with their parents on First-days also.

The funds of the Baltimore Association are entirely exhausted. (The annual report will be made to Baltimore Yearly Meeting in the Tenth month.) Forty-four schools, with but moderate aid to each, will require a large sum, besides which we have the Agricultural Department, equally successful, and no less important at this juncture. Over 1000 persons have visited "Swarthmore Farm" in the past seven months, many of them from distances of 100 to 300 miles.

In the present depressed state of education and agriculture, no one can properly estimate the result of this combined work of the Yearly Meetings upon the future of the South and of our church in particular. Under slavery, in one sense, Friends had no voice or position in the State Governments or among the people, but in the triumph of the principles they consistently maintained and for which they suffered, they can now be heard, and let us in their poverty and in our abundance help to educate their children for the mission that is before them. Our organization has been half self-sustaining from the first, but the time has not yet come to entirely withdraw from the work—it must be a gradual withdrawal.

We have made considerable progress the past year in preparing for this change, and the 4200 pupils have cost us no more than the 2600 of the previous year.

Our devoted and successful Superintendents of Education and Agriculture, Allen Jay and William A. Sampson, and their valuable households, remain with us.

Thy friend, FRANCIS T. KING.

WEST BRANCH, IOWA, 8th mo. 14th, 1869.

William J. Allinson, my dear friend,—Many articles are furnished thee having reference to the Indians, and I know there is a limit to the space thou canst allow in the Review to any one subject. But having had access to letters from two dear friends of our Quarterly Meeting who have now reached their working-places as agents, I thought a few brief extracts might rightly be made use of to keep Friends apprised of their situation, that they may not cease to be borne upon the heart and remembered in the prayers of the Church.

We have great satisfaction in having these brethren beloved in the representative and responsible positions they occupy. Drawn by a feeling of religious duty long before they were selected by our Government, having heard the call of the Lord ere His Providence ordered the "lot" to fall upon them, they were prepared to yield themselves through great sacrifices of personal comforts and enjoyments to this arduous service. And not their friends only, but the community at large where they are known, recognized their fitness for the work.

I will only add the peculiar rejoicing and hope it must give us to know, as our thoughts will often be turned to that natural and moral wilderness, that Christians are praying there. May we not hope that these prayers will open new channels through which heavenly blessings may descend upon the means employed by feeling hearts and laboring hands for winning to Christian civilization the wild and savage races of our own continent.

Thy friend, JOEL BEAN.

Brinton Darlington writes from Indian Territory:

"You need not be alarmed about my being in danger. No one that I have conversed with manifested any apprehension that I would be in danger after arriving here, but very many protested against my coming from Ellsworth here without a military escort, and I was urgently advised to apply to Gen. Miles at Fort Harker for one. But their warnings and suggestions never disturbed me for a moment. As we were riding along, I mentioned these things to McAdams, in whose ambulance I was travelling, and he replied that a good deal of it was done for effect. He thought they wanted to intimidate me, and induce me to apply for a military escort, in order that they might have a fine joke to publish in the papers, and he was glad I was not moved by them to do so."

The Indians of his charge, the Arapahoes and Cheyennes, had not yet come into the reservation assigned them. Awaiting them, he writes:

"There is no settlement south of us, they say, for 160 miles, and north of our cabin there is none for about 80 miles. Yet I feel so happy here that I can scarcely realize that such is the fact."

Lawrie Tatum, 160 miles further south, in Indian Territory, in charge of the Kiowas, Camanches, and Wachitas, writes, Seventh mo. 19th, 1869:

"Some of them have nice patches of sod corn which please them much. One of the head men last spring, not having a hoe to plant corn, took his mouth-full, got on his knees, scratched a hole in the breaking with his fingers, dropped a few grains from his mouth, covered it with his hands, and so continued until he got his little patch planted. He now has a nice prospect for corn. He came to see me to-day.

I expect in a week or two we shall have all the wild ones belonging on this reservation here. Those who have been here the present spring and summer have been out with the wild ones, hunting buffaloes and having a 'medicine dance,' at which they were to decide whether they were to go to war, or to come on to their reservation and try to learn to live like 'white folks.'

Of course we who knew what was going on felt anxious. So were many of the Indians. The head war chief of the Camanches did not go, and tried to keep his braves from going to the 'dance.' They nearly all went that were able except him. He moved his tents and family between the post and the agency. My desires often arose that they might be restrained. From all I can learn they are coming in peaceably.

I have seen much to make me hopeful, but there are many things to make me sorrowful. I believe the worst people we have here are some of the whites. May the Lord restrain them, and give me all the wisdom, prudence and moral courage that I need, and supply me with Christian and willing ones to assist.

I feel that I need a large portion of wisdom to conduct myself properly with the Indians, officers, and civilians, as well as to conduct the business of the agency, which is now just being permanently organized.

I still have the breaking plows running. I expect there will be more than 2,000 acres broken for cultivation next summer. The sod corn looks very well, and it pleases the Indians much.

We are about three miles south-east of Post Wichita. The Indians are nor h and north-west of it. I do not apprehend any danger to us, but the soldiers often aggravate them very much, stealing from them and abusing them. The officers, though, I think, are desirous of doing what is right."

THE EVERLASTING FATHER.

There is a phrase used in the Scriptures that affects me very much. It is the expression—The Everlasting Father. The Father always! The fatherly heart forever! A man may have a child that has wandered into the paths of vice, a prodigal son, and yet, at the first sign of penitence in his boy, his fatherly heart is affected, and he forgets all his misdoings. But there may come a time when the father's patience is exhausted, when he casts his son from him, when he ceases to be a father to him; but the Saviour is an everlasting Father—he loves always, and he loves forever. When he was on earth, he showed his affection for us in that he opened the eyes of the blind, healed the lame, cured the sick, visited the houses of the afflicted, alleviated every form of sorrow and prayed for his persecutors: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." But now, that he has passed through the tomb, what change is wrought upon him? He died, as truly as any of us can die, and yet he had the same affections; he still loved his disciples; he recognized Mary as she stood in the morning by the tomb, and spoke to her with the same sweet voice she had often heard; he sent a message to his disciples by her; he sent the message especially to Peter, that Peter who had denied him.—Bp. Simpson.

ON PUBLIC ASSEMBLIES FOR THE WORSHIP OF GOD, AND ON THE PREACHING OF THE GOSPEL.

BY JOSIAH FORSTER.

With their views of the supremacy and spiritual government of Christ in his Church, our early Friends withdrew from those communities to which they had belonged. Many of them had felt the insufficiency of those forms and observances to which they had been habituated, to satisfy the wants of an immortal soul. They met together to wait upon the Lord, and to worship Him in solemn silence; and He owned them in their coming together to their spiritual comfort and strength.

George Whitehead, in the early part of his biography, entitled "Christian Progress," bears testimony to the value of the meetings for Worship, held in those days of the infant Church amongst us. In the first chapter of the "Life of Christopher Story" is a very interesting account of the early settlement of a meeting in Cumberland, which he attended. Robert Barclay, in the eleventh chapter of his "Apology," when writing on worship, gives some striking particulars of the Meetings for Worship among Friends of that day; Isaac Pennington and William Penn bear ample testimony to the value of reverent waiting in stillness before the Lord in meetings held for the worship of God. These views of the character of assemblies held for this solemn purpose became the accepted profession of the body of Friends. They have been maintained in great simplicity and singleness of purpose from that day to this. The observance of the great Christian duty of the public worship of God has been long a prominent feature of the counsel conveyed in the Epistles of our Yearly Meeting. More especially has it been consolingly and instructively set forth in these salutations of later years.

Honoring the steadfastness of our early Friends, and their testimony to that worship of God in spirit and in truth which is enjoined under the new covenant, may we, in the simplicity of faith and with true sincerity of heart, adhere to those views and practices of unitedly presenting ourselves before the Lord by which Friends have ever been distinguished. It is one of the many advantages of coming together for the worship of our Heavenly Father, that, as all seek to draw nigh unto Him, an evidence is at times granted that He draws nigh unto us; a solemnity prevails in the assembly, even when no words are uttered.

How clear and full are the words of the Apostle James: "Draw nigh to God and He will draw nigh to you." Another Apostle says, "Through Him who is our peace, we, both those who are afar off, and those who are nigh, have access unto God." These and many other Scripture passages bear ample testimony to the prominent character of the Gospel, that it is spiritual in its essence, that such is the economy of grace under which it is our privilege to live. The declaration of our Lord to his immediate followers, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them," is an experience not at our command. But it has been realized by multitudes who have gone before us; and many of the present day have been consoled by such an experiance. They have known what united spiritual worship is; they would feel it ingratitude to our Father in heaven to deny that He has granted them at times an evidence of His love, and that their coming together has been to the renewal of their strength.

It is true that all who attend our religious meetings are not converted men. But, as those who have tasted that the Lord is gracious wait in reverence and in true humiliation of soul upon the Lord, the exercise of their spirits is at times blessed to the more worldly-minded in the congregation; from whom the awakening conviction of the Holy Spirit is not altogether withheld. The influences of the love of God have, I believe, been so granted, as that even some of these have felt that they have not always met in vain. Such have also been in the way of hearing at times that awakening ministry of the word which has been uttered under the constraining influence of the love of Christ, and it has been blessed to their souls.

I know that, sometimes, our meetings for the worship of God are held from one week to another, and some even from month to month, without any voice being heard in them. No one will, I hope, venture to deny that, in these assemblies, spiritual worship has been performed to the refreshing of the souls of many who have thus met. At the same time I am free to acknowledge my belief that it is contrary to the design of our merciful Heavenly Father, that the disciple of Christ should be indifferent to the eternal interest of his fellow-men.

"It is out of the abundance of the heart that the mouth speaketh." Can it then be right when we have tasted of "the bread of life and of the water of life," that we come together for the worship of our Heavenly Father, without sometimes manifesting a Christian interest for the growth in grace of those we meet with—without telling unto others what the Lord hath done for our souls? This is not to be done in a superficial manner. It may be in a few simple words; but, coming from the heart, it reaches the heart of a brother or a sister. It is not necessarily of the character of preaching the word, for every one is not called to the ministry of the Gospel, nor need it always be in the assembly. Such an intercourse strengthens the bond of Christian love and fellowship. May it increasingly prevail amongst us.

The words of the prophet apply with peculiar force to meetings for the worship of our Father in heaven: "Come ye and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob, and He will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths." Whatever may be the discouragements of any who are members of small meetings held in silence, and there are cases in which these feelings will not be small, I can sympathize with them. In my early life I was for several years a member of a meeting of this description.

On a view of the varied circumstances of my friends, I invite all, in the love of a brother, not to withdraw from the regular attendance of their meetings for worship. What instruction and comfort are contained in the following passages: "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength." "My soul, wait thou only upon God, my expectation is from Him." "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light." "He that drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst. It shall be in him a well of water, springing up unto everlasting life."

The reading of the Bible in our meetings for worship has been occasionally pleaded for in the course of the present century. Highly have I long valued the possession of Holy Scripture; increasingly do I feel my debt of gratitude to the Author of all our blessings, for free access to these invaluable writings, in private, as well as on numberless other occasions. I am incapable adequately to set forth the blessedness of these records in the great work of the soul's salvation, when applied to the wants of man by the power of the Holy Spirit. What sublime, what consoling truths are conveyed to us in those words, handed down to us by the prophet, "Thus saith the Lord, The heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool. . . . To this man will I look, even to him that is poor, and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word." How true it is that the words of the Lord Jesus have been felt to be spirit and life, when inwardly applied, while met with our fellow professors for the public worship of God.

I fear, nevertheless, that the stated introduction of these writings, into our assemblies held for the worship of our great Creator, would be the lowering of our profession of a simple dependence upon the immediate presence of Christ among his believing disciples. Its direct tendency, in my apprehension, would be eventually to lead away from the heart-searching work of the Spirit, from that confession of sins unto our Father in heaven, from that sense of the all-sufficiency of God, which man is more especially called upon to exercise when he thus presents himself before the Lord.

"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." With such heavenly promises, why need we attempt to provide stated arrangements, however well intended, to fix the thoughts on God. Would it not in many hearts become an interference with that work of the Spirit which is especially adapted to the true worship of God?

Meditating upon "that work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope" in the Lord Jesus Christ, to which it is my heart's desire that you, my dear friends, may every one of you be brought, I afresh remember that in the wisdom of our Heavenly Father it is his design that man should be helpful to his fellow-men in the things of religion. It was, as I have already remarked, the experience of our early Friends when met for the worship of God, not only that their souls were refreshed by a sense of the presence of their Lord, when sitting together in silence before Him; but through the goodness of Him in whom they trusted, men and women amongst them were constrained to tell unto others what He had done for their souls. Ministers were raised up from their midst who diligently labored to strengthen their brethren, and to turn men from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God. At no period of the existence of the Society has it been without ministers of the Gospel. I do not undertake to say either that all who have been so recognized have been called of the Lord to the work, or that those who have been rightly called have always spoken in the authority of Christ. Such are the infirmities of our nature which clings to us in our best estate, that it would be very unsafe to make such an assertion. Nor would I say that all the blessed truths of the Gospel have on all occasions had their right place assigned to them. And I further believe that some humble, sincere followers of our Lord, accepted of Him in the sincerity of their hearts, may not at all times have seen with equal clearness the full force of the whole plan of Christian redemption, salvation, and sanctification. But in this I take comfort, and that with a thankful heart, that, in a loving spirit, a watchful care has been and still is exercised against the introduction amongst us of unsound ministry or unsound principles.

"Instrumental ministry in the life and power of the Gospel is a great favor to the church."* It is to the strengthening of my faith and to the rejoicing of my heart that there are amongst us at this day, as I believe, of the Lord's preparing, by the immediate working of his Spirit, beloved brothers and sisters who are enabled to preach Christ crucified, calling sinners to repentance, comforting the afflicted, and inviting all to come unto Him, who, in his own emphatic language, is "The way, the truth, and the life." More than a few have, of later days, believed that it has been committed to their trust to testify to the glorious Gospel of the blessed God. What patience and Christian feeling should those exercise who sit as hearers. In some they may rejoice; of others they may have their fears and doubts; whilst all are to be tenderly judged of.

It is my warm desire that, whilst faithfully using the gifts bestowed, all who are thus engaged may be kept from entangling themselves with the affairs of this life. Whilst all the believers in Christ may enjoy the privilege described by our Holy Redeemer, "When He putteth forth his own sheep He goeth before them, and the sheep follow Him, for they know his voice," it is especially important that those who feel it to be their duty to testify to the unsearchable riches of Christ should be earnest to be of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord. If it be so in preaching, it is no less their duty when offering prayer on behalf of the assembled company. May they approach the throne of grace in simple petitions, rather than in the declaration of sacred truths, however excellent. It does not often happen that congregations, even if earnest to unite in prayer, are in a condition to adopt long prayers. How edifying has unpremeditated prayer often been felt to be when uttered in an assembly for worship under the constraining love of Christ! How often has it been blessed to the congregation!

May our dear friends who are ministers of the Gospel, walking in humility, in all lowliness and meekness, not exceed the measure of their gift in delivering the message. May they all be concerned so to be preachers of righteousness that they may adorn in life and conversation the doctrines which they declare, seeking to be clear and concise in what they may feel called upon to impart. Waiting for renewed qualifications from on high, to testify to the Gospel of the grace of God, may they commit all their labors of love to Him who is rich in mercy, and who blesses, as He seeth meet, the work of faith of his confiding, dependent children. Great is the peace, blessed is the privilege of those who in the obedience of faith surrender themselves to the guidance of the Heavenly Shepherd.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, EIGHTH MONTH 28, 1869.

OUR TWENTY-THIRD VOLUME.—The reason which prompted the establishment of this periodical, the motive for conducting it for these two and twenty years, and for now entering upon a twenty-third volume, may be given in a few words of the Apostle Paul—because we love the brethren. The object steadily aimed at can be stated in other words of the same eminent disciple: "Endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." "By this bond of peace," says Adam Clarke, "we are to understand a peace or union where the interests of all parties are concentrated, cemented and sealed: the Spirit of God being the seal upon this knot." In view of this "consummation so devoutly to be wished," and full of desire that unto God might be "glory in the Church of Christ Jesus throughout all ages," the apostle poured out his expanded, regenerated heart to the brethren, in earnest tenderness of beseeching "that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love."

Established from such motive and with such object, there has been no variation in design, though human imperfection in carrying it out could have been safely predicted, and will by candid minds be amiably pardoned.

It has appeared a desirable thing to interest, so far as is practicable, the members of our religious Society all over the land at the same time, in the same contributions of Christian literature, in the same items of intelligence of especial denominational bearing, and in the same hints with regard to the snares, the hopes, the prospects and the duties of the day. With this view we would wish, if practicable, like Moses, to speak "in the audience of all the people;" and to find access as a recognized visitor in every family, side by side with contemporary publications.

It is attempted to sustain the Review as a journal of elevated tone. The habits and the principles of Friends alike tend to make them a thinking people; and a community who could read appreciatingly and with delight the works of Penington and Penn, of Barclay, Story, Woolman, Gurney, and Dymond, requires and deserves a periodical devoted to its objects, that shall aim above sectarian gossip, political strife, the pursuit of money, and mere material for small talk. We are gladly conscious that we have a class of readers to whom "the light of pure and lofty science is the quickening impulse and the genial nutriment." We have practical men, earning their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, who, though they never entered college or aspired to rank among the literati, have higher interests and purer aims than the masses of those not more educated than themselves, and who require a style of reading such as we endeavor to place before them. And it is a gratifying consideration that we have a vast army of teachers, and a large number of cultivated minds, for the benefit and pleasure of whom the more scientific contributions of the Review are adapted.

It is our pleasure, therefore, weekly to spread an intellectual repast adapted to the varied tastes and requirements of the several classes of subscribers, always seeking the edification of all, not without a prayerful solicitude that something may be found in every number that shall minister grace to the reader.

Of the religious platform of the Review it can scarcely be needful to say more than that it is that of the New Testament, as spiritually understood and practically illustrated by the Society of Friends. We repel with honest warmth any insinuation that we would place any sectarian dogma above the teachings of the Holy Scriptures; and holding no man as authority from whose ipse dixit or whose example there must be no appeal, we conduct our paper in the interests of that religious Society which we regard as the most scriptural of all, believing that it has been Providentially raised up as an important portion of the Church, and that to it have been assigned services not be neglected and not to be spared, and principles precious and pure. We wage no aggression upon other Christian bodies, nor question that they have their place and services assigned to them by the Spirit of the Lord. We rejoice when through their instrumentality repentance unto life is granted to any awakened souls. Those organizations have their representative publications. Our province is to watch in love, to represent and cherish that Christian body to which Charles H. Spurgeon addressed the words: "It would be a great calamity for your Society to cease to be, until its great fundamental principle is accepted by the whole Church. . . . I am sure, Friends, that if God shall multiply you greatly with truly godly converts, there are thousands of the Lord's people who will be thankful for it, and will only feel that an increase to your numbers will be an indication of the advance of true spiritual religion."

Occupying the humble position of a watchman, walking about the walls, telling the towers, giving, if need be, the signal of alarm, the Review will aim to encourage whatever shall tend to the healthful growth and increase in pure vitality of the religious Society of Friends. Trusting that our object and plan are generally appreciated, we desire the sympathy of all true-hearted Friends.

Letters to Friends in Great Britain, Ireland and America, by Josiah Forster.—We are indebted for a copy of this book to the beloved and venerable writer, who, with the evening shadows closing peacefully upon him, calls to mind Jacob's words: "The God who fed me all my life long unto this day,"—and in thanksgiving to our Father in heaven breathes a prayer for blessings and protection to be extended to the class to whom these pages are addressed. They are a simple presentment of religious views, the writer speaking of things which he knows and which his hands have handled. There can be few if any in our Society better entitled to a candid hearing than this dear Friend, who has been so long and so disinterestedly a faithful servant of the Church. Those who are perhaps more impulsive in the warmth of youthful zeal, may well bend respectfully to listen to the counsel of years and garnered experience, assured that it will be sincere and safe, and that it comes from one whose loving heart very fervently prays for the peace of Jerusalem. The sixth letter will be found in the present number.

North Carolina.—Towards this commonwealth we always turn with love and with a memory of the noble stand which has been made within its borders for the testimony of Truth against oppression and the bloodshed resulting therefrom. We do not fear to weary our readers in bringing its affairs to their notice, for the whole Society of Friends has an invested interest which no one, we think, will ignore, in the work which has been so efficiently undertaken in North Carolina. It is vitally connected with the well-being of our brethren there, and with the spread of sound religious and moral truth in the South. In the thirteen Southern States, with a population of eleven millions, we have only the Yearly Meeting of North Carolina (embracing part of Tennessee) and the small but lively one of Baltimore upon the northern boundary. An intelligent Friend from that section writing to us respecting the South generally, says: "The abolition of slavery is making a radical change, but the nature and extent thereof is yet to be determined. Now is the time to work and shape the future." This sentence may furnish a text for every Christian philanthropist in our Society to ponder.

The subject is brought to our present notice by the letter from our much valued friend Francis T. King, which will be found in the department of Correspondence, and for which highly interesting paper we bespeak the attention of all who see the Review. Jos. Moore, the first Superintendent of Education in North Carolina, was present on the interesting occasion described in the letter, and had the gratification to witness the establishment of the work which he inaugurated and to which he devoted so much time.

We earnestly hope that Friends in each Yearly Meeting will continue their truly Christian and enlightened labors on behalf of the freedmen and the free-born, and that they will feel bound to sustain with energy the Baltimore Association in its well-directed labors for the uplifting of a community so long depressed by cruel surroundings, especially in its efforts to educate the thirteen hundred children in membership with Friends in North Carolina and Tennessee. If these are cared for through this transition state, who can estimate the probable blessed results?

We need to have in the heart of the South a lively intelligent body of Christian Friends who will steadily display a right banner because of the Truth—who will uphold sound religious and moral principle—sympathize with and wisely aid the freedmen after the special Governmental protection shall be withdrawn, and when these people shall have come directly under State and local legislation, as is already the case in Maryland, Kentucky and Delaware.

The mission of Friends as a people has never been merely to fold around themselves a cloak of isolation, leaving the rest of mankind to find for themselves the dove-like wings with which they might soar from earthly to heavenly things. It is their duty to constitute a portion of the salt of the earth, and if true to their inspiration they will be "as a dew from the Lord in the midst of many people." And they have always been called upon to bear an expensive testimony to truth and right. In their own days of persecution they bore the spoiling of their goods and the confiscation of their estates by writs of premunire; and by this costly subscription to the needs of their day, they purchased civil and religious liberty for untold thousands. To-day, it is required of them for the testimony's sake to make voluntary distraints upon themselves to speed the Lord's work upon the earth—and let them not do it sparingly; let it not be said of them that they need the persecutor's heavy hand to levy upon their perishable riches for the carrying forward of works of mercy.

The subjoined Agricultural notice must be regarded as an interesting and satisfactory evidence of progress.

NOTICE TO NORTH CAROLINA FRIENDS.

The Baltimore Association has purchased thirty tons pure Peruvian Guano, and will be prepared by Ninth month 1st to sell it at High Point at cost and expenses, for cash only, upon delivery. The great success of the shipment of last year has led to this one; and as we have had to borrow the money to do it, we hope Friends will be prompt in their purchases. No other shipment will be made this year.

Camp Meetings—The Jewel Consistency.—Religious meetings in the open air have been held, upon occasion, during human history. Bryant commences one of his finest bursts of poetry with the words:

"The groves were God's first temples."

The one held by Geo. Fox under the Flushing Oaks is historic, and dates back considerably before the days of Wesley. In the forests of Guilford Co., N. C., and in various parts of the Western States, there are great worshipping assemblies of our people, for whom the blue arch is the only canopy.

For seventy years the Camp Meeting has been considered by the Methodists a favorite means of grace, immense gatherings having been held at the close of the last and beginning of the present century in our Southern States, at one in Kentucky at least twenty thousand being present. Lorenzo Dow introduced them into England, but in 1807 the Wesleyan Conference issued a declaration, which has never been revoked, disclaiming connection with them. This was owing to alleged irregularities, and prominent ministers were expelled from the connection, owing to their persistence in holding them. They are sanctioned in England by the Primitive Methodists, organized in 1810. (See McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia.)

The Methodist, published in New York, has a strongly-written editorial protest against the holding of Camp Meetings on the first day of the week, as involving the inordinate pursuit upon that day of secular bnsiness.

"At our camp meetings which are held on the Sabbath, the butcher brings his meat, the baker brings his bread, the boarding-tent keepers cook large numbers of meals which they sell for a stipulated sum,—selling the food and receiving the money the same as on any other day, only working a great deal harder and handling a great deal more money. Sometimes the refreshment stands are opened and their wares publicly offered for sale; often railway trains and steamboats make excursion trips; good people hire carriages at livery-stables, and make long journeys to reach the ground; the roads for miles in every direction are crowded with vehicles of every description, these vehicles filled with the profane as well as the pious. All this labor, trafficking, riding and confusion are occasioned by the Sunday Camp Meeting: no one pretends that they would exist if the camp were closed." . . . "Imagine a Methodist butcher or baker selling meat or bread on the Sabbath at his place of business, a Methodist restaurant-keeper with his establishment in full blast on that day; or Methodist people at home marketing and trading on Sunday."

The hint appears seasonable. Let worldly business upon the day set apart for worship and rest be limited to works of mercy or necessity. Poor human nature is liable to inconsistencies, and needs frequent reminders.

In all kindness we call the notice of the same class of Christian professors to another point. Subject, in common with their neighbors, to sickness upon the first day of the week, it often happens that they send to the Pharmacist for physic, but, for want of looking at both sides of the question, many invariably defer payment, and this on the ground of mistaken conscientiousness. Mistaken, we say, for if the chemist as an act of mercy accommodates them with medicine, why should he be compelled (to save his "Sabbatarian" customer from the worldliness of handling money) to keep his books upon that day? They argue that they would remember and pay another day—but they would not.

It is an axiom in law and an adage in common sense, that "what a man does by another he does by himself." If there be any transgression in entering the charge in the blotter, it is done as their agent and the transgression is theirs. Whatever running accounts are kept on other days, let those who purchase on the First-day pay the cash and be done with it.

To the Chemists we would say, limit your sales upon that day to claims of necessity, and if practicable establish hours for keeping open, and close during time of public service. This plan works admirably. The apothecary cannot any better afford than the rest of the community to have the Sabbath dropped out of his week.

CANADA YEARLY MEETING.—Of the opening of this body on the 25th of Sixth month, an account was published. Although we had further accounts in our correspondence, we waited for the printed minutes, which have been unusually delayed. A brief concluding notice must now suffice.

A satisfactory paper of Christian counsel was received from the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders. The following paragraphs, embodying the exercise attendant upon answering the Queries, were adopted in the form of an address to subordinate meetings:

"While the state of our Society was under consideration, much tender counsel was imparted by concerned Friends. The neglect of attending religious meetings was felt to be a loss, and when indulged, a decline in religious life will be apparent, the result of coldness and want of love to God. Other things will enter and occupy the heart. A fear was expressed that it was increasingly becoming the besetment of the present day, from the fact that mid-week meetings are so much neglected—an evidence that the love of the world is prevailing over the love of God with not a few amongst us. Let the inquiry be instituted in every heart, whether the love of the world or of the Father have the ascendancy. May we remember our accountability to God, not only that we are bought with a price, but that without His blessing our efforts to provide for our temporal wants will be unavailing, for He can blast a great deal, or bless little. We were reminded that He is a care-taker, and a covenant-keeping God, and that many of our small meetings held in the middle of the week are seasons of Divine favor, but sadness and loneliness was felt by reason of the absent brethren. If the faithful in this particular witness gain by an increase of spiritual strength, the unfaithful must sustain a great loss. The promise to the 'two or three' is as new and valid as ever. Gathered from the world in the name of Jesus, His love filling and animating our hearts, is to us evidence of His sure promise, 'There am I in the midst.' Such meetings will be lively, and all drowsiness will be expelled. These blessings are made available to every one of us by the rich mercies of God in Christ Jesus our Lord, and as we wish to be clothed with His Spirit, the legacy of peace will be ours that the world cannot give or take away. Let those who mourn in Zion because few come to her solemn feasts, be faithful in the discharge of Christian duties towards the more unfaithful ones. The path of duty is the path of safety. If we accept Jesus as our Counsellor and our Guide, we shall be directed in right paths, and the Comforter will make these paths pleasant.

"Love is of God, and 'is the fulfilling of the law;' 'he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen.' We are as prone to sin in this direction as in any other, for we are 'by nature children of wrath, even as others,' from which we need redemption and Divine preservation. The overcoming of this we may accept with all thankfulness, as the fruit of the Spirit, as an evidence that 'we have passed from death unto life,' and that we love the Saviour. 'If a man love me he will keep my words,' and He has commanded us to love one another. 'Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life.' May all be concerned to labor for these precious attainments, and pray to be preserved therein.

"A desire was expressed that we might be established on the only sure foundation, having the law of the Lord in our hearts; and not only that the pure mind should be stirred in us, but that we should diligently teach our children right principles, and train them for heaven. As our stay here is but short, and we shall soon have to appear before that tribunal whence there is no appeal, and as the new birth is essential to salvation, may we exercise an earnest care that our children may be prepared for the solemn event; and may we, by example and precept, be faithful in pointing them to Jesus, and in directing their minds to the teachings of saving Grace, inculcating the principles of the Christian religion, as professed by us, and, in practical detail, give to them the reason why we may not indulge, in conformity to the world, in vain sports, games of chance, in music, the theatre, and similar practices, that alienate the mind from the love of God. We should bear in mind that our children have a fallen nature, and have need to be protected from the evil influences that surround them.

"The salutary restraint imposed by our Discipline in reference to a consistent plainness of speech, apparel and demeanor, with the tender care of religious parents, have been the means of preserving many of our youths from hurtful practices and associations. We believe that in Divine wisdom this hedge was early established in our religious Society, and the beneficial results from the right maintenance thereof, not only to Friends but to the world, for the space of two hundred years, cannot be questioned, and none of those testimonies which have been transmitted to us can be spared now. The follies and vices of the world, the tendency to ritualism in the church, and the temptations that surround us, demand a close adherence to our principles and faithfulness to Divine guidance, and may our example be the beacon to our children and to others to follow us as we have followed Christ. The offence of the cross has not ceased, and a fear was expressed that not a few are shrinking from it to their own loss, and their consequent lack of usefulness in the church.

"The importance of right connections in marriage was brought to view; being a Divine institution, designed to promote the happiness and usefulness of mankind, may our young Friends seek for right direction in these important engagements, so that their peace and happiness may not be marred.

"And may all of every class consider our high calling and be faithful to every duty."

The report upon First-day schools showed 13 such schools, 68 teachers and 454 scholars.

A satisfactory report from the Book and Tract Committee showed a considerable distribution of Tracts, Bibles and other books, and a purchase of fifty copies of the useful compilation, "Day by Day."

The Boarding-School question claimed attention, and progress was made towards the establishment of the Institution.

The following paragraph, expressive of sympathy with Friends of the United States relative to the Indian interests, was appended to all the Epistles to American Yearly Meetings:

"We have been introduced into a feeling of tender sympathy with our brethren of other Yearly Meetings, who have assumed the highly responsible position of having an official care of a portion of the Indian tribes of America. Our prayers are to the Ruler of the universe—the Father of mercies—that He would grant to our beloved Friends, who are engaged in the good work, wisdom to guide in the service, and strength to perform the work, according to His will, and that He would be pleased so to influence the hearts of the rulers and of the people, that the great object in view may be crowned with complete success, to the glory of His great name."

The statistical reports show 492 families, 1523 members and 319 children—one Monthly Meeting making no report.

At the request of Yonge Street Quarterly Meeting, the Quarterly Meeting now held at Pickering in the Ninth month is to be held at the usual time at Mariposa, where it is to convene next month.

A committee was appointed to visit in Christian love the meetings and families composing the Yearly Meeting.

The adjourning minute thankfully acknowledges the holy help which graciously enabled them to conduct the business of the church in harmony and love.

THE DESCRIPTION OF THE ECLIPSE by S. J. Gummere cannot fail to gratify our readers. A pleasing paper upon the same subject, by D. Satterthwaite, appeared in The Herald of Peace of 15th inst.

PALE INK and faint writing tax an Editor's eyes severely. The contents of an article thus written ought to possess extraordinary merit to compensate for the pain inflicted upon the over-strained optic nerve.

DIED.

BRACKETT.—In Berwick, Maine, on the 8th of Seventh month, 1869, Joseph Brackett, an esteemed member of Berwick Monthly Meeting. Through his suffering the traits of the Christian were manifest, and his end was peace.

COPELAND.—Near Rich Square, N. C., on the 5th of Seventh month, 1869, Sarah Carter, wife of Henry Copeland, Jr., aged 27 years; a member of Rich Square Monthly Meeting. Whilst yet in unimpaired health, she was of exemplary Christian deportment. In the last family Scripture reading in which she participated, she addressed her friends, quoting the text, "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus," &c., in the course of her remarks saying that her race was nearly run. She was then apparently well. To her bereaved husband and family the sweetest consolation remains, in the assurance of her perfect peace.

HANSON.—In Farmington, N. H., on the 18th of Fourth month, 1869, Anna Hanson, a member of Dover Monthly Meeting, in her 96th year. [Age misprinted in former notice.]

MENDENHALL.—On the 1st of Third mo., 1869, Bettie Mendenhall, aged 63 yrs, 4 mos. and 16 days; an elder and member of Cedar Creek Monthly Meeting, Ohio. In the death of this dear parent we deeply feel our loss. She was from early life a regular attender of religious meetings, and was deeply concerned for the welfare of the Church. She was a friend to all, ready at any time to contribute to the poor. Although her last sickness was of short duration, we have not a shadow of doubt that her end was peace.

PEASLEE.—On the 29th of Sixth month, 1869, Elizabeth A., daughter of Jacob and Abigail Peaslee, in her 31st year; a member of Seabrook Monthly Meeting, N. H.

SHIELDS.—On the 4th of Seventh month, 1869, Hannah, widow of Wm. Shields; a member of Dover Monthly Meeting, Ohio. Enabled through Divine grace to take up her cross in early life and follow her Lord, she pursued the even tenor of her way with Christian consistency. Whilst health permitted she was observant of the reasonable service of presenting her body a living sacrifice, in the worshipping assemblies of her people, and in her home was often heard in prayer for patience to wait the Lord's time.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

Ohio Yearly Meeting, held this year at Mount Pleasant, Jefferson Co., Ohio, commences on First-day, the 5th of Ninth month, 1869. Select Meeting at 10 A. M., and Meeting for Sufferings at 3 P. M., the day previous.

Friends coming to attend the Yearly Meeting will find conveyances awaiting them at Portland Station, on the river division of the Cleveland and Pittsburg Railroad, on the arrival of the trains on Sixth and Seventh days, the 3d and 4th prox., at 10 A.M. and 6 P.M. 2t

DELIRIUM TREMENS IN THE NEW YORK HOSPITAL.

Dr. Roosa contributes to Putnam's Magazine a pleasant historical sketch of the New York Hospital, in which several incidents of practice in that venerable institution are narrated. The following passages describe the scenes in one ward:

"The ward devoted to sufferers from mania potu, or delirium tremens—the 'del. trem.' ward, as the nurses and house doctors were apt to call it—would alone furnish scenes for the pencil of the artist which might surpass those of Hogarth or Holbein, so frightful is the demoniac appearance of man when the victim of his passions, and overcome with awful dread at the horrid shapes which his diseased brain has pictured. The visitor to such a ward, when it is well filled, would almost imagine that he had entered one of the portals of the regions of the lost.

One poor victim lies muttering to himself, and constantly picking his bed-clothes, now and then rising up and fixedly staring, with horror delineated in every feature, on some fancied demon emerging from a crevice or corner. Another is hurling back, with awful blasphemy, the taunts and jeers with which his imaginary enemy is tormenting him, while in the grated room of the main ward, reserved for the most violent cases, a poor fellow is rushing madly about, fighting a mortal combat with what seems to him a real enemy. The straight jacket and well-padded walls, however, protect him from doing himself any harm, while the strong men chosen as nurses for these patients cow them down with a steady look, and preserve a Satanic order in this pandemonium. Occasionally, however, a sufferer from the effects of strong drink, instead of fearful shapes and imagination, sees gentle spirits and dreams delightful dreams. A smile is constantly playing on such lips, and he seems like a child dreaming of angels. I well remember a poor artist who had often suffered from delirium tremens, who told me that in his hours of insanity he saw images that Raphael or Angelo might have traced, and that visions of artistic beauty floated before him which he could never execute in his sober hours, and yet the period of remorse and intense physical suffering came to him all the same.

It is said that one patient has been in the hospital more than a dozen times; but, as a rule, two or three attacks finish a career. The writer once heard an eminent Professor of Medicine say that he had no hopes whatever of the reform of a man who had once had delirium tremens. But this was before the days of inebriate asylums."

In recording the decease of our late dear friend, James Backhouse, we wish to express our sense of the loss the Church has sustained in the removal of a diligent and faithful minister of Christ.

Our beloved friend was the son of James and Mary Backhouse, of Darlington, and was born there on the 8th of the Seventh Month, 1794. He feared the Lord from his childhood, and was early called to the public preaching of the Gospel. He first spoke as a minister at Norwich, when about twenty years of age. He removed to York in 1816, and was recorded a minister by York Monthly Meeting in 1824. In the same year, he obtained a minute for visiting the families of Friends within its limits. Thirty-nine times between the years 1824 and 1865, he received the sanction of his Monthly Meeting for varied engagements in the service of his Lord.

His most extensive mission,—one that occupied nine years of James Backhouse's meridian life,—was the visit he paid to Australia, the Mauritius and the Cape Colony, in company with his friend George Washington Walker. They visited the various convict stations, laboring not only amongst the members of their own religious Society, but also amongst the prisoners and the general population of these distant colonies. James Backhouse returned to England in 1841.

Whilst careful diligently to exercise his gift in his own particular meetings, both in ministry and discipline, he often felt called upon to resume his missionary labors: visiting many of the meetings of Friends in England, paying several general visits to Friends and others in Scotland, and in 1843 attending the Yearly Meeting in Dublin. In 1853, and again in 1860, he paid an extensive Gospel visit to Norway. In his many journeys he was a constant tract distributor, judicious in selecting, and often accompanying the tract with kind words of Christian counsel or sympathy. His intercourse with men in many climes, and in varied positions in life, furnished him with a large store of anecdotes; many of them he put forth in instructive little tracts, illustrative of Christian doctrine and practice.

The cause of Temperance had in James Backhouse an earnest and consistent advocate wherever he labored. Early convinced of the misery and the sin resulting from intemperance, he entirely abandoned the use of alcoholic drinks.

The last time he obtained a minute from his Monthly Meeting, was in the Ninth Month, 1865, for "Service in some parts of Great Britain." In returning this minute by a letter to the Monthly Meeting in the Sixth Month, 1867, and thus withdrawing from the field, he wrote as follows:—"I greatly rejoice that the preaching of the Gospel devolves on many others. I earnestly desire their encouragement, and that they also may be enabled to do their day's work in the day time, and at its close, be favored with a like peaceful release from the field of labor, to that which our good Lord and Master has mercifully granted me, feeling, as I also do, that I am an unprofitable servant, and that wherein I have failed to do my Lord's will, it is of his unmerited mercy that I have forgiveness, and that wherein his will has been done it has been by the help of his grace, and that therefore to him alone belongs the glory."

In attempting briefly to depict the inner life of our dear friend, and the spirit in which he labored in the Gospel of Christ, we adopt some of his own characteristic reminiscences, as well as his peaceful and happy experience, in the near prospect of death. Referring to his youthful days, he made the grateful acknowledgment, "In early life I was permitted to hear the Spirit and the Bride say, Come, and I was enabled to yield a willing obedience, which has been fraught with blessings." This early turning of the heart to the Lord was followed by continuous inward growth, manifest through a long life. The simplicity of childlike faith which marked his reception of Christ as his Saviour, characterized his ministry, and especially qualified him for the service before mentioned among the poor outcasts, and the down-trodden in Australia and South Africa. To this part of his work he thus referred:—"When George Walker and I were in Australia, frequently going out in the early morning, and passing along from one party of road-convicts to another, the sense of the Divine presence with us was most remarkable, enabling us to enter into sympathy with them, and not unfrequently to rejoice in hope." This sense of the Divine presence was a marked characteristic of our dear friend's daily life. James Backhouse's simplicity of faith, his unquestioning reception of Gospel Truth, combined with great mental activity, and a naturally hopeful temperament, enabled him to manifest, from youth to old age, the chastened joyousness of the Christian. To him the service of his Lord was no painfully exacted task, it was willingly and cheerfully rendered. Referring to the discouragements under which some labor, in the work of the ministry, he said, "My own course has been very different, I have labored in the fulness of joy."

In his last illness, he frequently quoted and dwelt upon those glorious words of Gospel Truth, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have eternal life."

His occupation as a nurseryman ministered to his admiration of the works of creative wisdom and power. "The Great Creator," he said, "pronounced them all good, and I have found them to be so. The study of them has been, not only a source of great pleasure, but of profit also."

In the early part of his illness he described himself as "dwelling in the land of Beulah, under a canopy of peace;" and this was his dwelling-place and his covering, till called to cross the river.

One day, as the end seemed to be drawing very near, he said, "I feel like a man about to set off on a very pleasant journey;" and again, "I have nothing to ask for now; thankfulness and peace are the covering of my spirit."

He died on the 20th of First Month, 1869: aged seventy-four and a half years.

RIFT IN THE CLOUD.

"So dreary and dark," were our words that day,
Again and again repeated;
As the hours wore on, and the tall old clock
Told them, and their duties completed.
"Such a dismal day"—for the clouds were dark,
And the rain, in its wearisome falling,
Dripped an answer in tears to the desolate cry
Of the blast through the roof-trees calling.
Not a glimpse of blue—not a gleam of gold
In the arch above us bending;
Only the clouds in their drapings of gray,
Sad with grief that seemed unending.
So the day crept on, and we talked of the night
In darkness upon us stealing,
And wondered if brightness would come with the dawn,
Much of beauty, now cloud-veiled, revealing.
"There's a rift in the cloud," called a gladsome voice,
And the words had a setting of sweetness,

That rounded the jubilant tidings she spake
To the fullest grace of completeness.
"A rift in the cloud"—and it spread as we gazed,
Till the west was a marvel of glory,
Where the broken clouds in the sunlight gleamed,
Pauses bright in the golden-writ story.
"A rift in the cloud"—the words crept back
Through many an after-time thinking,
And a sweeter meaning lent them grace,
Its truth to their loveliness linking.
And I thought when hours were dark with fears,
Or draped with a mantle of sorrow,
How a word of cheer is "a rift in the clouds,"
Fair type of a bright to-morrow.
A whisper of love—a smile that is sweet—
A deed that is sympathy's token—
Little aids that give to our weakness strength,
So the power of temptation is broken;
These are "rifts in the clouds," and they come to our lives
Amid woes and stern lessons of duty;
Amid wearisome labors and hopes that are vain,
As perfected glimpses of beauty.

NOT KNOWING.

I know not what shall befall me, God hangs a mist o'er my eyes,
And so each step in my onward path He makes new scenes to rise,
And every joy He sends me, comes as a strange and sweet surprise.

I see not a step before me, as I tread on another year,
But the past is still in God's keeping, the future His mercy shall clear,
And what looks dark in the distance, may brighten as I draw near—

For perhaps the dreaded future has less bitter than I think,
The Lord may sweeten the waters before I stoop to drink,
Or if Marah must be Marah, He will stand beside its brink.

It may be He has waiting for the coming of my feet,
Some gift of such rare blessedness, some joy so strangely sweet,
That my lips shall only tremble with the thanks they cannot speak.

O restful, blissful ignorance! 'Tis blessed not to know,
It keeps me so still in those arms which will not let me go,
And hushes my soul to rest in the bosom that loves me so!

So I go on not knowing; I would not if I might;
I would rather walk in the dark with God, than go alone in the light,
I would rather walk with Him by faith, than walk alone by sight.

My heart shrinks back from trials which the future may disclose,
Yet I never had a sorrow but what the dear Lord chose,
So I send the coming tears back with the whispered word "He knows."

THE GREAT TELESCOPE AT CHICAGO.

The University of Chicago possesses one of the largest telescopes in the world—perhaps the largest.

The destined work of this wonderful telescope is to make, in connection with the nine chief observatories of Europe and America, an entirely new catalogue of 250,000 stars, determining the right ascension and declination of each particular star; so that by observing its position, astronomers may, in far-off ages, be able to pronounce authoritatively on its motion, and to declare in what direction it has proceeded through the illimitable voids. At this moment it is slowly and silently performing its sublime work, and furnishing those far-off astronomers the data upon which to base their calculations respecting that mighty problem, the direct motion of the sun through space. When this is solved, data will also be abundant for locating the position of the great central sun, around which millions upon millions of other suns, popularly denominated stars, do in all probability revolve. The great work being divided among the ten principal observatories of the world, will make the share of it falling to the Chicago Observatory 25,000 stars, upon each one of which the most careful observations will be made and recorded. It will require about ten years to accomplish this stupendous work, and when it is done we may expect some most important astronomical discoveries.

SAVING THE FRAGMENTS.

I remember a busy man, who had very little time for reading or study, but whose mind was a perfect storehouse of information on almost every subject.

"How does it happen that you know so much more than the rest of us?" I asked him one day.

"O," said he, "I never had time to lay in a regular stock of learning, so I save all the bits that come in my way, and they count up a good deal in the course of a year."

The other day I heard a little boy explaining the meaning of several geographical terms to his brother.

"Where did you learn that?" I asked in surprise.

"O, Miss Wells teached it to the big jography class, and I fought I'd 'member it, too," said he.

I knew a man who could tell every wild bird by its note, and tell you where it built its nest, and what color its eggs were; who knew every tree of the forest by its leaf and its wood; and could tell the name of almost every flower that blossomed from April to October, and just when its time for blooming came. And yet he was a busy man, too, and all these things were as foreign as possible from the work that kept his hands constantly occupied. His knowledge was all gained by

Save up the fragments, boys and girls; don't let anything worth knowing escape your eyes and ears. These little floating seeds of thought that go sailing past you like thistle down, may prove as valuable as the great fields that are more carefully sown.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—European advices to the 23d inst. have been received.

GREAT BRITAIN.—Reports from all parts of England in relation to the crops have been published. With the exception of wheat they are thought to be at least as good as the average.

IRELAND.—The municipal council of Dublin has adopted an address congratulating Ministers and the country on the passage of the Irish Church bill. The Conservative members absented themselves when the vote was taken.

FRANCE.—Gen. Le Bœuf has been appointed Minister of War, to succeed Marshal Niel, deceased.

The council of Ministers and the committee of the Senate have come to an understanding on all the points of the proposed senatus consultum or decree, and the discussion upon it in the Senate is to commence on the 30th inst. The article relating to the responsibility of Ministers has not been altered by the committee.

SPAIN.—Some of the bishops have obeyed the Regent's decree requiring them to warn their clergy against insurrection, but others still remain silent. The Bishop of Jaen denies the jurisdiction of the present government, and has appealed to the Pope. The government is taking extraordinary precautions to prevent the assembling of the Carlists in La Mancha, though it is still asserted that the movement is believed to be ended, and that most of the Carlist bands have dispersed. The Cortes have been summoned to meet 5th mo. 15th, on account of the urgency of affairs. The French authorities have arrested several Carlist leaders, who were attempting to cross the frontier into Spain.

AUSTRIA.—At a cabinet council at which the Emperor presided, it was resolved that the present military organization on the frontiers shall be gradually abolished. Some important towns are to be placed under civil governors directly.

GERMANY.—It is reported that the North and South German States have agreed on common action with respect to the coming Ecumenical Council at Rome, if the resolutions adopted by that body on the question of the temporal power of the Pope should threaten the peace of Europe.

A remarkable address has been presented by the Roman Catholic laity of the diocese of Treves to their Bishop, expressing an earnest desire that the approaching Council should leave no doubt of having renounced all desire to revive the theocratic governmental forms of the middle ages. "The chief cause," they say, "of the alienation of men's minds from the Church at this day, is the fear of a return to those times when the power of the State enforced, by coercive measures, the teachings and laws of a religion based on a supernatural revelation, when the conscience was consequently bound, and the dignity of religion itself, which cannot exist without the voluntary devotion of the faithful, free from all legislative restraint, was gravely compromised." They recognize the existence of the State as having a religious foundation, in so far as the social order and magisterial power rest on the recognition of God, and of the moral law implanted by Him in the soul; but they are convinced that the sphere of the State extends only to those intellectual opinions and moral principles which the natural mental powers of man may grasp; and that State is the most Christian which scrupulously respects those limits, and while assuring to the different confessions complete freedom of action and the protection of their rights, avails itself, so far as it can be done without violating the principle of equality before the law, of the religious sentiments of its people to understand better the law of nature, and to embody it more clearly in its statutes.

TURKEY.—A complete reconciliation, it is announced, has been effected between the Sultan and the Viceroy of Egypt.

CHINA.—A terrible flood has occurred on the Yangtse river, covering the country with water for miles back of the usual channel of the river, and causing great destruction both of property and life.

JAPAN.—Intelligence to the 29th ult. has been received. The civil war, it is stated, was entirely ended. Prince Satsuma had been appointed treasurer of the government, Prince Choisiu to the command of the army, and Prince Losa to that of the navy. They had issued a manifesto requiring all the Daimios to disarm immediately, and several had left Yeddo in consequence. The Admiral, Ennomato, and other leaders are to be tried and punished. It was reported that Slotsbashi, the late Tycoon, would accept a position under the government of the Mikado.

SOUTH AMERICA.—The 47th anniversary of the independence of Peru, the 20th ult., was celebrated at Lima by the opening of the first exhibition of Peruvian products and manufactures. There were 400 exhibitors, and many applications were refused for want of space. A grant has been made of the privilege of laying a submarine telegraph from Callao to Panama. Slight earthquakes were frequent in the region of Cuzco and Arequipa, and considerable anxiety prevailed generally on account of the publication of a prediction by a German Professor, Falb, who has propounded a new theory of earthquakes, that severe shocks would occur about the 10th or 11th inst., the forerunners of more destructive ones about the end of 9th month. Many families were leaving Callao and Lima for the interior. Gen. McMahon, U. S. Minister to Paraguay, having been recalled, arrived at Buenos Ayres on the 17th ult. on his way home. In taking leave of President Lopez, very friendly sentiments were expressed on both sides, and the reports which have been circulated of his ill-treatment and forcible detention by the Paraguayan President are now shown to have been incorrect. At the latest advices, Lopez continued at Ascurra, strongly intrenched in the mountains, where it was said the Brazilian cavalry could not act. The provisional government has been formed by the Allies at Asuncion. A bill changing the capital of the Argentine Republic to Rosario to take effect 1st mo. 1st, 1873, had passed both Chambers, but had not received the Executive sanction at the latest accounts. In Uruguay, an attempt at revolution has been defeated, and peace restored.

CANADA.—Prince Arthur, the third son of the Queen of England, arrived at Halifax, N. S., on the 22d inst. in the steamer City of Paris, which made the passage from Queenstown in 6 days, 11½ hours, being 7½ hours less than any voyage previously made. The Prince is expected to remain some months in the country. He is 19 years of age, and is an officer in the army.

ON REDEMPTION THROUGH CHRIST.

BY JOSIAH FORSTER.

In what full and comprehensive language did the Lord Jesus, "when God had raised Him up, having loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible that He should be holden of it," address his Apostles when He said unto them, "These are the words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me" —when He opened their understandings that they might understand the Scriptures, and said unto them, "Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day, and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations." It may be sufficient not to add more, on the present occasion, as descriptive of the promised Messiah, than to adduce the solemn truths uttered by the prophet Isaiah in the name of the Most High. I quote them in some fresh sense of the blessedness of their import: "He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with His stripes we are healed. All we, like sheep, have gone astray: we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all."

What further confirmations of these heart-cheering Gospel truths are presented to us in the Epistles of the New Testament! The Apostle Paul writes, "He was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification." "We have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of His grace." The Apostle Peter uses these memorable words, "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sin, should live unto righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed." Again he says, "For Christ also hath suffered, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us unto God." In the Epistle of the beloved disciple we meet with these precious declarations, "If we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin:" "If any man sin we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world."

How precious, how unutterably precious, is it to the truly awakened sinner that in every conflict, in every humiliation, in every confession of his iniquities, he may turn unto his gracious Omnipotent Saviour, who is one with the Father, whom the Father heareth always—that he may, through Him, his ever-blessed Mediator, have access unto the Father of mercies, helped by the Holy Spirit, and pour out his soul before Him, and know the Spirit of Truth to guide him into all the truth; and as he continues steadfast in his allegiance unto his Holy Redeemer, that he may, at the end of his day upon earth, through the infinite mercy of Him who died for us, be forever with his Lord in His kingdom. May this be the blessed inheritance of us all!

LIVE, LET LIVE AND ENJOY.

From multitudinous voices comes the instinctive cry of "Crush me not." It is but a spontaneous outbreak from nature asking of nature, according to her law of right, for that sympathy and protection which is due to all things animate. What a sad mistake is made when people lose sight of the beneficence of the Creator, and undertake to control evil by opposing it with a force equal only to itself. In the religion of Jesus Christ there is ample space to live and enjoy good according as that religion teaches. "Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal? Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law, dishonorest thou God?" Alas! that it should not be remembered that the best way to overcome evil is with good. Touching this matter, how fitting the words of Jesus, "Follow thou me!" In a circumspect walk the Christian is found observing the law of right, which now, as anciently, teaches in this wise: "Keep thee far from a false matter; and the innocent and righteous slay thou not." To misjudge or misrepresent, as well as to accuse, may harm some one, without ill intent. "To err is human." Therefore humanity should seek to become humane—rich in benevolence of feeling toward all, giving space where scope is required, and prescribing limit when restraint is needed. A beautiful illustration of this mode of working is given in the instance of Abraham, who said to Lot, "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen, for we be brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left." The result of this proved, that for each family a blessing attended the attempt to avoid strife in the pursuit of things that make for peace. Admitting that Abraham and Lot, with their large and inharmonious retinues, might by dwelling apart find the peace they desired, difficulties often arise between individuals, which nought but the balmy oil of righteous condescension and the untiring virtue of endurance can remedy. Thousands there are who may be viewed as creatures of circumstance. These need the help of Christians, such as, having the mind of Christ in doing his will, in all things obey the Divine precept, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

Man being of finite and limited capacity, has no power to create. If he kills, he cannot make alive. Therefore he should ever bear in mind that when he covets power he covets a position of danger, wherein unfitness to exercise authority is often proved to the injury both of the oppressor and the oppressed.

The Christian longs for the establishment of the peaceable kingdom of Christ, when the prophecy shall be fulfilled, "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

BY WILLIAM BALL.

Although Ritualism, on the one hand, makes such large demands upon faith, yet now, also, on the other, freedom of thought is let loose, even in the things of God. There is movement in the air; not from the unfurling of the banner of faith, but from the fluttering of the flag of liberty.

Certain symptoms give me to fear that this Sign of the Times may be seen, in degree, on our own Society. I had hoped that the obvious relaxation of our later day, under which even the young take their own lines of action, as well as of thought, would have been found consistent with unswerving allegiance to Christ himself, and to his doctrine according to the Scriptures that testify of Him. I had supposed that the devising of new plans of usefulness, and the exertion of independent action in new spheres of service, were but the exercise of a healthful freedom. Some circumstances, and especially some discussions in our Yearly Meeting, has given rise, however, to the apprehension, that the strike for liberty has gone beyond what was imagined; and may extend to matters of faith as well of practice. For the mind that has escaped restriction will be apt to delight in a freedom that rejects limitation; and may even come to sympathize with universal license of opinion and belief. Under these conditions, disappointment may be in store for those who had relied, should defection in Christian doctrine appear among us, that the "children of our people" in this day would have been as decided, as earnest, and as faithful in their manifestations against it, as were the same class in our Yearly Meeting sixty years ago. Then, their public testimony came loyally "to the help of the Lord against the mighty;" and the absence of it, in days considered to be more doctrinally enlightened, should the occasion arise, could hardly be followed by a blessing.

With the popular ideal of freedom of thought (free-thinking) there is also a popular ideal of charity; both alike spurious.

When the terms of union in a Christian Church are broken by overt acts against Christian doctrine, the union is already virtually dissolved: "charity is no fool," and sees it to be so. So it has been deemed, within my recollection, when our distinguishing views have been publicly impugned; and the discipline has been put in motion by the Yearly Meeting itself through its own committee, over the head of subordinate meetings and committees. Let us hope the day will never come when our terms of union shall ignore Christianity, and when any who impugn that whereon it rests—the authority of Holy Scripture—shall possess an immunity denied to the opposers of our own special principles.

How far the wide range of reading, by the present educated generation, may tend to land in that unlimited license of thought, the influence of which is thus apprehended, becomes a serious question. It is a perilous license, pervading the literature of the day. Not merely the "verifying principle" of Colenso, which subjects Holy Scripture to the test of our ideas of fitness; and the scarcely disguised materialism of Huxley; but the "breadth" of Stanley; and the theories of Bunsen as to "reconciling Christianity with the thought of the age," are current among us; and, awakening a keen interest, may leave their mark. There can hardly be a more enriching and fruitful treasure (I believe it to be a gift from heaven, never refused to humble prayer,) than the mind that is sensible of a prompt and decisive recoil, on the first presentation of sentiments that would sap the foundations of its Christian faith. In the childlike, who love their Saviour, there is, by this holy instinct, a quickness of understanding in their Lord's fear, whereby they perceive and reject the insidious germ of unbelief.

Between Christians, and those who attack the foundations of Christian hope, there can be no compromise. Is it the part of animosity to tell the truth? The Apostle answered that question long ago. They who know that the gulf cannot be bridged by palliatives, by resorting to conciliation, and temporizing as with admissible diversity, may be deemed harsh and narrow; but they think it no true kindness to conceal the peril of the malady, and can pray for those against whom they are bound to testify.

I have often thought, in such cases of open defection in the doctrine of Christ coming before a Christian Church which has a discipline provided for them, that no little perplexity might be spared to those who have to act for the Church, and who really hardly know how to act, if they were to give full consideration to what must be involved in the teaching of our Lord, as to the direct effect of his coming and of the introduction of his doctrine. The operation is, in its nature, in the wisdom of God, to create division. We must not be stumbled, if such be the working of a faithful upholding of sound doctrine to the present hour. "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace but a sword: for I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law: and a man's foes shall be they of his own household."—Matt. x. 34–36. It is clearly undeniable that He whose thoughts and ways are higher than ours as the heaven is high above the earth, who himself is emphatically Love, accounted the setting up and support of his doctrine paramount to the consideration of all consequences, nay to the certainty that the result would be the destruction of peace, even in the tender relations of family life. And it is to be seriously observed that this remarkable utterance of the lip of Truth and Love, is introduced by language which associates with it the obligation of personal allegiance to Christ,—"Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven; but whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven."—Matt. x. 32, 33. Not less striking is the declaration with which the same remarkable utterance of our Lord closes, evidently designed to enforce his own claims, as paramount to all others, upon his followers, whatever might be the painful extremities, even in private and social life, into which the separating nature of his doctrine might bring them,—"He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me: and that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that taketh not his cross and followeth after me, is not worthy of me; he that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."—Matt. x. 37–39.

Thus briefly, and inadequately, has a Sign of the Times, and of our Times, been brought into view; with a glance at what may be its tendencies, and possible influence upon the character of our own Church; more especially as respects the uncompromising support and vindication of its Christian doctrine. And though it is easier to go with than against the stream, yet, if a phase of opinion or feeling overtake even religious society, whereof evil results, however unsuspected, can be predicated, it might not be right to suppress a cautionary hint.

There is comfort in the assured conviction, as respects any who, if members of a Christian Church, publicly place themselves in a false position, that (whatever may be the duty of that Church in their case,) whenever the time shall come of their reduction to the child-like state which only is receptive of the truth of God,—whether by further experience, providential dispensation, or the immediate work of the Spirit, so that the true cry for Divine assistance is raised in the contrite heart,—that cry will ever be answered by "help to unbelief."—Friend's Quarterly Examiner.

"BE STILL."

How much is contained in these two little words! Have you ever realized their meaning and learned what it is to "be still?" Then you are indeed blessed, my Christian friend. You have that sweet, enduring peace which the worldling knows not, and never can know, and which is worth all, more than all it has cost you. Cost? yes, for it was not learned in the sunny hours, in the days of prosperity. You thought you knew your own heart; you had given yourself to God, had committed all that you held dear to a kind Father's keeping, and now, with resignation, with patience, you could say, happen what might, "Thy will, not mine, be done." You thought your faith very strong, but, when God laid the heavy hand of chastisement upon you, it was sorely tried; you found it difficult to "be still," for stillness is more than a mere submission because we cannot help ourselves; is more than acquiescence in His dealings, because He is the author of them. We may be very still under calamity and humiliation, and yet very rebellious in our hearts against God; may utter no complaints in the hearing of man, while our hearts are swelling, oh! almost breaking, with bitter, bitter thoughts; and God, who in mercy and love has sent upon us the trial, knows and hears the lightest whisperings of our hearts. To "be still," is to believe that our affairs are in wiser and better hands than our own, and, while we look on in wonder and amazement, not to doubt, but to see and understand that "He maketh all things to work together for good to them that love Him." How sweet the thought, "All things for good!" All God's chosen ones have suffered. All whom He ever loved He chastened. Many of His most glorious saints perished by violence. God's ways are not as our ways. He knoweth our hearts and what is best for us. Though we cannot understand his dealings, though we may never while on earth know why we are so sorely afflicted, yet let us never despair. In the midst of the storm, though the waves ride mountain high, threatening to overwhelm, let us pray to our Father in heaven that we may "be still" and know that He is God. And then when the stillness of heart comes, when the spirit, quieted and soothed by the presence of the Holy Dove, sees God's love in all that has disturbed it, and mingles with its submission a patient waiting upon the Lord for the manifestation of His goodness and wisdom, we shall fully realize what that peace is which passeth all understanding.—*E. A NEW THEORY OF EARTHQUAKES AND VOLCANOES.

Blackwood's Magazine has a paper with this caption, too long for the columns of the Review. The ideas of the writer, although they claim only the character of theory, are plausible. He rejects, and gives philosophical reasons for rejecting, the opinion of Humboldt and others "which ascribes earthquakes to the action of a central mass of fire in the earth—in which molten mass the action of the moon and sun occasions tides and such like variations just as it does in the waters of the ocean." He also combats the hypothesis that volcanoes (which have been styled developed earthquakes) are occasioned by "an inburst or infiltration of the waters of the sea into the burning caverns of the earth, generating immense volumes of gas and aqueous vapor, which force their way in explosions to the surface." For dissenting from the latter notion, he instances inland volcanoes, in the very heart of Central Asia, more than a thousand miles from the ocean.

Our writer, after devoting some pages to atmospheric and electrical phenomena, proceeds to explain his theory, of which the following passages may afford an insight:

Now let us come to the cause of Earthquakes. We have removed from the question the central sea of fire or molten matter; we have replaced it by a zone of electric action, close to the surface, and wholly independent of the internal condition of our planet, whatever that may be. This is alike more probable from a cosmical point of view, and also the action of this electric zone (as we shall show,) as the cause of earthquakes, is far more reasonable and intelligible than the supposed tidal movements or other changes in the imagined central sea of fire. Earthquakes are results of the grander electrical disturbances which from time to time take place in the zone of rocks immediately subjacent to earth's surface. And in accordance with the parallel which we establish between the electrical phenomena in earth and in the atmosphere, we may aptly describe earthquakes as thunderstorms in the earth.

In ordinary times and circumstances, the electric currents which regularly circulate in earth's crust—in that outer vein of our globe specially affected by solar and planetary action—ebb and flow quietly and noiselessly, as the similar currents usually do in the atmosphere. Indeed, in the earth their movements are in ordinary times much more silent and steady than in the atmosphere: partly because in the former case they act in or through matter much less mobile and disturbable, and also because rocks are better conductors of electricity than air is,—so that the fluid (so to call it) is less liable to insulation and local accumulation, and therefore flows more steadily and quietly. But ever and anon, when electric action to an unusual extent takes place in the earth's crust, this steady flow of the currents is broken, and then violent concussions necessarily follow. Just as a quiet-flowing river, when inundated, encounters more impediments than usual,—the bridges, for example, being too small to permit the passage of its waters so readily as usual,—whereupon the waters accumulate at the point of resistance until they acquire sufficient power to sweep away the obstacle by a mighty rush; even so, when, owing to unusual solar or planetary action, electricity is developed to an excessive degree in the crust of the earth, the conductive power of the rocks becomes inadequate to pass the currents with sufficient rapidity to maintain the electric equilibrium. In the mobile elements of the atmosphere we see some parts, usually in the form of distinct clouds, become overcharged with electricity, and regain their equilibrium by lightning-flashes, sharp electrical discharges. The same thing takes place (though for reasons above stated, less frequently) in the solid earth. The electricity, not being transmitted in sufficient quantity through the adjoining rocks, accumulates at such places until it acquires the power or tension requisite to overcome the resistance; and thereupon it forces a passage explosively, or by a grand discharge,—more terrible by far than if the whole artillery of the world were discharged in a concentrated volley. What is the result? A vast heat is generated (electricity fuses everything—it is the grandest heat-developer in nature;) the rocks are expanded, rent, in some cases actually fused: the subterranean lakes and rivers—the reservoirs of water which exist everywhere below the surface, and which in Genesis are called the fountains of the great deep—are vaporized, instantaneously converted into steam: and the result of this great expansion, or explosion, in the ground beneath us, is a concussion or rupture of the subjacent rocky strata, the effects of which reach the surface, producing the various phenomena of the earthquake.

Sometimes these subterranean convulsions manifest themselves on the surface only by noises—generally dull rumbling sounds, but occasionally in a succession of abrupt detonations, like subterranean thunder-peals. In other cases the ground perceptibly shakes in harmless vibrations. But in severe shocks these vibrations swell into waves of commotion, shaking down whole cities in ruins; while the solid ground cracks and opens under their influence into chasms, which (usually) instantaneously close again, engulfing both men and buildings. In other cases the subterranean convulsion is still more powerfully manifested on the surface by an actual explosive movement,—a phenomenon remarkably manifested in the earthquake which destroyed the town of Riobamba (in 1797,) when the bodies of some of the inhabitants were found to have been hurled into the air to the height of several hundred feet. Sometimes the ground itself is upheaved to a great height, in the form of volcanic cones or mountains, which give an outlet for the subjacent disturbance. In this way the volcano of Jorullo, in a single day, was thrown up to the height of 1700 feet above the surrounding plain; and the immense conical volcano of Fusi-yama, 11,000 feet high, is said by the Japanese to have been thrown up during a single night!—nearly three times as high as any mountain in the British islands! How stupendous the force to produce such an upheaval! But there is yet another form of these subterranean convulsions. Instead either of direct upheaval or of waves of commotion extending on the surface in concentric curves around the centre of the disturbance, the earthquake sometimes manifests itself by a rotary motion (as in the terrible earthquake in Calabria in 1783) —a circling storm in the earth, exactly parallel to the cyclones or rotary storms in the atmosphere. And like the cyclones this is the most destructive form of the earthquake. Humboldt says, "The circling rotary commotions are the most uncommon, but at the same time the most dangerous." Such earthquakes we hold to be identical in nature with the rotary electric phenomena in the atmosphere,—which rise in intensity from the tiny swirls on our arid roads to the great "dust-storms" of India, the water spouts in the ocean, the sand-pillars of the desert, and the cyclones of the tropics. . . . .

The First Friends.—They were at a word in dealing, nor could their customers with many words tempt them from it, having more regard for truth than custom, to example than gain.—W. Penn.

Hume, in his History of England, describing a Friend, says: "He never asked more for his wares than the precise sum he was determined to accept. This maxim is laudable, and continues still to be religiously observed by that sect."

FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND.

It will cheer their colaborers in this land to learn that our English Friends continue their First-day School work with faithful diligence and many consequent blessings. The following information is condensed from the twenty-second annual report presented to the Annual Meeting of the Association, held at Ackworth the 30th of Sixth month, 1869. The report is signed by Joseph Storrs Fry, of Bristol, Secretary of the Central Committee.

The statistical tables show a total of eighty-five schools in sixty-nine places, with 1120 teachers and 13,387 scholars. "The Committee think that their friends will consider the steady maintenance of the number of teachers, and the increase which has taken place in the number of scholars, to be satisfactory and indicative of a general sound and healthy condition of the schools: especially so as the year just elapsed has not been marked by many circumstances tending to arouse fresh interest in the cause."

The report does not include the varied and extensive mission-work among the poor in which many Friends are now engaged, and the Committee believe that the tables present an under rather than an over-statement of the school-work proper. The Committee observe with satisfaction that the number of women Friends engaged as teachers shows some increase;—and they especially call the attention of these to the girls employed in mills, factories and warehouses, as a very large and probably increasing class greatly in need of their loving Christian care. They find no cause for surprise in some of the schools being carried on under feelings of discouragement. "Who is there, indeed, that has not experienced these feelings himself? Scholars are inattentive—those of whom we had hoped better things turn away from the holy commandment—our fellow teachers leave us or grow cold in the work—and we ourselves may feel less capable of successful teaching than once we were—the deep-seated corruption of our own hearts may be afresh shown us, and our own exceeding need of instruction very keenly realized. Dear fellow-teachers, let none of these things move you. They are the common lot of those who in various ways engage in the Lord's service. You may be ready to say,

> "Lord, in Thy field I work all day,
> I read, I teach, I warn, I pray,
> And yet these wilful, wandering sheep
> Within Thy fold I cannot keep."

No, you cannot keep them, nor keep yourselves; but the Lord is able and ready to keep them and you, to strengthen you in your weakness, to comfort you in your trials, and to show you in the end that you have not labored in vain."

In several of the adult schools visits are paid by a committee of the scholars themselves to such of their number as are absent for two consecutive weeks.

The Bedford Institute (London) publishes its own report, giving a complete account of the agencies in connection with it, including the First-day schools. The laborers in the great metropolis appear to be abundantly blessed and strengthened. Earnest efforts are made to promote temperance principles among the scholars, by encouraging "bands of hope," by the delivery of lectures, and by the formation of temperance libraries.

The Committee desire to express their cordial sympathy with their American brethren.

The report fitly closes with a brief tribute to the memory of another beloved Friend gone to his eternal home. "The long familiar and honored presence of John Pease is no longer with us. Resting in the evening of his life from the distant and arduous services to which he had largely devoted the prime of his days, he took a fatherly interest in the home work of his younger friends, and especially in the First-day schools of his own meeting. He was also a frequent attender of these annual gatherings. Thus the Lord is removing his servants from earth to the higher services of heaven, and calling on those who remain to follow their faith, and to consider the end of their conversation."

THE CONVERTED ROBBER.

It is an old story, which may be true or not, that when St. John was returning from Patmos to Ephesus, after the death of Domitian, he was surrounded and stopped by a party of theives. Their captain was a young man, and to him the disciple addressed himself with words full of earnest admonition and counsel. So faithfully did he preach Christ, praying also for the Holy Spirit's aid, that the astonished thief was brought to repentance, and received Christ as his Saviour. Then in turn he went to the members of his band and confessed the evils of his past life, urging them to renounce it as he had done, and seek and find the same Saviour. So powerful was the influence of this confession, that there was a wonderful revival among the banditti.

A confession of sin, and a decided purpose to turn from it, is one of the most powerful sermons to the unconverted. Those who are sincere in their purpose to serve the Lord will not find it hard to make such confessions. When a great skeptic had been led to bow at the foot of the cross his first desire was to seek out some hundred or more associates, whom he had helped to harden their hearts in unbelief. So faithful were his labors for their conversion, that many were led to rejoice with him.

No one is better fitted to labor among the hardened and profligate than those who have been snatched from their ranks, as brands from the fire. A former associate can realize the peculiar temptations, and know how to meet the objections such people offer to those who seek their salvation.

Perhaps nowhere else is the duty more binding to "confess your faults one to another."

Sunday School Times.

HISTORY OF A COTTAGE MEETING.

It was in the winter of 1866-7, that owing to peculiar circumstances, some Friends found themselves located, for a few months, in the very isolated and bleak village of Middleton-one-Row. While there, a poor woman solicited their laundry work, and in talking to her, a tract was offered, with a few serious remarks. The woman appeared touched, and after some further talk, not only asked for a tract for a neighbor, but begged these Friends to go over to Oak Tree (two miles distant), where she lived, saying she believed "any of the people would lend them a cottage, where they could read to them altogether on Sunday afternoons;" she also gave a slight sketch of the neglected state of the people there. Some were too infirm to walk to a place of worship, the nearest being more than a mile distant, others had young children whom they could neither leave nor take, and probably few had a desire to attend public worship.

These Friends thought much of the poor woman's request, but from illness and other causes, no way opened for them to go for some time; still week after week the poor woman spoke of the want, and received very gratefully the tracts offered. The clergyman of the parish and some others were spoken to about this place, but their reply was to the effect, that the Oak Tree people were "such wretched beggars, and so dirty, nothing could be done with them."

At length, one First-day afternoon, our Friends felt they could go, and greatly were they shocked at their first visit to this neglected place, where the people seemed truly to be living in forgetfulness of God. The men and boys were playing in the road before the houses; the women, as dirty and unkempt as could be, washing clothes, making bread, &c.; the children were past description, they and the dogs were treated alike. The Sabbath was apparently entirely ignored. They called at some of the houses; and sat down, and read a chapter in the New Testament to one family; and returned home feeling something must be done for these outcasts.

The next First-day afternoon they again went, having previously arranged with the washerwoman to invite as many of her neighbors as liked, to come to her cottage. Those who have engaged in similar work, will readily understand the feelings of our Friends at this time—their own utter nothingness, and the need for entire dependence on Him who alone can help; and earnest were their prayers that God would be with them to guide them, and that He would graciously bless the work. Only a few were present that afternoon, but they sat very still while listening to the chapter that was read from the New Testament, and all kaelt while prayer was offered to their "Father in Heaven."

From that time to this, the meeting has been held, without exception, every First-day afternoon; a few Friends having very kindly entered into the work with them, so helping one another. Their place of meeting has varied; for some time they met in any of the cottages, whichever the people liked to prepare, and it was an interesting sight to see the poor people gathering to the room, bringing chairs, stools, babies, as the case might be. Now, a small cottage is rented, and roughly furnished with benches, to accommodate the increasing numbers of the congregation. The poor people, once so miserable-looking, make quite a respectable appearance now, and speak with pleasure of their nice chapel. Several persons who live in the neighborhood also attend, some coming the distance of a mile and a half to two miles.

Oak Tree consists of about nine or ten cottages. Many are the outward improvements in the place. The Sabbath day is observed, the people and their cottages are cleaner in every way; and may we not reverently and thankfully believe that some spiritual good has also been graciously permitted to follow this effort, however feeble, to bring souls to Christ? Some of the poor people have been removed by death to their last home, and good hope is entertained, that to some of them, the change has indeed been a glorious one. To God be all the glory!

The mode of holding the meetings is very simple, our Friends have not even introduced hymn-singing. All sit down in silence; frequently prayer soon follows, then after another pause a portion of the Scriptures is read, and the people are addressed, as ability is given, and again silence is observed for a few minutes; sometimes prayer is offered near the close. As the people leave the meeting, tracts, &c. are generally distributed, and gratefully received. At one time, our Friends read a tract, or a portion of the "Sinner's Friend," as well as the Bible, but they have given that up now. The meetings are remarkably quiet, notwithstanding the number of children who are present. The numbers attending vary from 30 to 50; there have been as many as 60 or 70 occasionally. Some recorded Ministers of Darlington Monthly Meeting and elsewhere, have visited Oak Tree, and had good service there.—The Monthly Record.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, NINTH MONTH 4, 1869.

THE WEATHER.—There are few occasions in life more calculated to illustrate the dependence of man upon the bounty of Divine Providence than when, in the words of Moses, "the windows of heaven are stopped, and the rain from heaven is restrained." At such times the Christian believer can trust in the promise: "I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase." Paul, in addressing the disputers at Athens, quoted the rain from heaven and fruitful seasons not only as the gifts, but also as the witnesses of God. So infinite is His goodness and His wisdom, that whatever the atmospheric dispensation, or however apparently grievous, we may be absolutely certain that it is ordered aright and for "the greatest good of the greatest number." Is there any presumptuous person so over-weening in his self-estimate as to think that, were he permitted to control the weather, he could change it to advantage? We may be well assured that it is right as it is. It is in the ordering of One whose care is perfect over all His works—who neglects nothing, forgets nothing, slights nothing. Heat and cold, sunshine and cloud, hail, snow, rain, vapor and stormy winds, all fulfil His word, are all ordered according to an unerring balance of relations, and all merit the thankful exclamation so often raised by the Psalmist: "Praise ye the Lord." The drouth which has held the inhabitants of this city ("a place of broad rivers and streams" as it certainly is), in some approach to terror, lest a sudden conflagration should sweep with destruction from the mere lack of water to arrest and quench the spreading flames, is, we may be certain, a wise and good Providence ordered in love. It may not be ours to interpret the design, but be it ours to trust perfectly, knowing that His ways are true and righteous altogether. It is for even our material good, as the results will prove. And there is much value in this lesson of patient submission and entire trustfulness.

> "What is this creation, less > Than a capacious reservoir of means > Formed for his use, and ready at his will?"

For all the phenomena of the weather we may render adoring thanks. Their tendency is always for the greatest good, even though individuals and communities may repine and be restive. Perhaps ere these lines are placed in circulation, the Psalmist's words may be applicable: "Thou, O God! didst send a plentiful rain, whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance when it was weary."

Meanwhile our counsel to the reader is—never repine at the weather, or think that thou couldst make profitable suggestions to Him who "looketh to the ends of the earth and seeth under the whole heaven, to make the weight for the winds; and He weigheth the waters by measure; when He made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder."

The teachings of nature are ever applicable to spiritual instruction. As we earnestly watch the gathering clouds, and look for them to "pour down rain according to the vapor thereof," to renew the water springs and to fill the wasted brooks, to swell the rivers and to revive the hopes of the husbandman, so should thirsty souls be raised God-ward with the language: "All our springs are in Thee!"

> "Man's weakness waiting upon God
> Its end can never miss,
> For men on earth no work can do
> More angel-like than this."

Let it ever be remembered that there is in the Saviour's gift water that can assuage forever the soul's thirst, and which shall be, in the recipient, "a well of water springing up unto everlasting life." And as we learn that God placed the rainbow in the clouds for a pledge of the continuance to man of the outward blessings attendant upon rain, so let us gratefully dwell upon the glorious iris formed of the "exceeding great and precious promises" which pervade the inspired Scriptures, and let us love to think of our glorified Redeemer, as depicted Rev. x. i, with "a rainbow upon his head," and of the "rainbow round about the throne" which the Evangelist saw when the first voice called to him, "Come up hither." To the showers promised by such prisms as these, we can apply the explanation of John, "This spake He of the Spirit which they that believe on Him should receive." "The river of God is full of water." "Thy mercy, O Lord, is in the heavens; thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds. How excellent is thy loving kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings. They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house, and thou shall make them drink of the river of thy pleasures; for with thee is the fountain of life, in thy light shall we see light."

National Educational Convention.—Evidence of a prevalent and wide-awake interest in the cultivation and elevation of the American mind was given in the Educational Convention which opened in Trenton, N. J., Eighth month 16th, continuing to hold three sittings a day through the week. Twenty-five years ago from that city went forth over the land the memorable words: "The Public School is common not as inferior, but as the light and air are common." The animus of that noble address seemed to have become pervading as the atmosphere, as the throngs of large-minded men, State superintendents, professors, teachers, legislators, &c., flowed from all parts of the Union and took possession of our neighboring capital. "Such a convention," said the N. Y. Tribune, "means business, and if the first day's proceedings are a fair sample, the forty-eight columns of the Tribune would scarcely contain a full report of its daily doings." Where so much is to be said, we will only attempt to show that earnest workers, with a strong and well-directed will, have taken hold of a subject of vast importance, and that an influence is certain to be felt throughout the land. May that influence be so guided by principle pure and high, that it shall prove altogether for good.

On the fourth day of the Convention, Gen. O. O. Howard spoke at length with excellent effect upon Education in the South, particularly among the colored people. He gave an impressive history of the work, and bore this tribute to the teachers sent from the North: "I have watched them with great interest, and I have never seen exemplified any where else such Christian constancy and fortitude. They have demonstrated by their work what their principles are." He had been instrumental in obtaining the appointment of a School Superintendent in each of the Southern States, the results of which had been most beneficial. "I have been told since I came here," he said, "that the present Legislature of Tennessee is pledged to repeal their school law, and that the Superintendent of Education elected there is an ignorant man. If I could reach the Legislature of Tennessee today, I would say to them, Consider your responsibility to God, and break that infamous pledge."

We make place for the concluding words of Gen. Howard:

"Increase our educational advantages, and you will increase our material prosperity in proportion. But we must not subordinate man to his uses. It seems to me, sometimes, that I hear nothing but Practical—practical—practical! But education is truly practical only when it gives a man life-power, and a man will make a better blacksmith who knows something else besides blacksmithing. A true man must be a little, at least, above and beyond the work in which he is engaged. You are all teachers, employed in a noble work, and going forth to exert a vast influenee. Is the ultimate object of education confined to this life? No, my dear friends, it looks higher—it looks beyond. It is not religiousness that we want, but Christian education. The teachers who have gone South with infidel principles or demoralizing habits have utterly failed and been repudiated by the people. Remember always, as you teach, your individual responsibility to God, and that you are to live with Him throughout the ages of a never-ending Eternity."

As might be reasonably expected, the Convention included many Friends, among whom may be named Barnabas C. Hobbs, State Superintendent of Indiana, Jos. Moore, President of Earlham College, and Francis T. King. From the days of Geo. Fox and those of Murray and Lancaster to the present date, education has been a part of our Society's mission. It is trusted that in this we shall not be outstripped by the age.

The address of O. O. Howard above quoted was given before an audience of over two thousand persons. Our friend F. T. King was then introduced as President of the Friends' Association for the Advancement of Education in the South, and spoke with much ability in reference to the work among the whites in that section. It was a useful presentation of the subject, and we are glad that he was there to give it. The operations described by him are familiar to the readers of the Review. When he told of the extension of educational labors by Friends beyond their own membership, much satisfaction was shown by the Convention.

Among the resolutions adopted were the following, which were offered by our Friend Barnabas C. Hobbs:

"Whereas, Many of the Southern States have, during the late Rebellion, lost in various degrees their public school funds; and whereas, the happiness, prosperity, peace and permanence of our nation depend on the scientific, literary and moral instruction of the whole people; and whereas, the children of the Southern States who have thus been deprived of the means provided by the fraternal bounty and wisdom of the nation for their education, are in common with those of other States objects of national solicitude and hope; therefore,

"Resolved, That this Association requests Congress to take such action as they may deem best calculated to give substantial aid, by grants of land, or otherwise, to the educational interests of those States, in order that systems of popular education may be put into efficient operation as speedily as possible.

"Resolved, That a Committee of three be appointed to present this expression of the sentiment of this Association to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States."

The following was also adopted on the motion of the same Friend:

"Resolved, That sacred literature is entitled to a place in the curriculum of study for the academy, the college and the university, and that the Bible should not only be studied, venerated and honored, as a classic for all ages, peoples and languages in these institutions, but devotionally read and its precepts inculcated in all the common schools in our land."

A fact much to be regretted was developed before the Convention, that the educational laws adopted by the Southern States are nearly all of them inoperative for want of funds. The general well-being of the Nation seems to require the Governmental aid which is proposed.

The proceedings when officially printed will include valuable papers upon various branches, prepared and read by some of the ablest men.

DIED.

BAILEY.—On the 18th of Sixth month, 1869, aged 67 years, Lydia, wife of Dr. Jesse Bailey, and daughter of Joseph and Sina Townsend, (deceased,) a member of Flushing Monthly Meeting, Ohio. She was a meek though active Christian, earnestly desiring the promotion of the religion of Jesus and the advancement of His kingdom. So unobtrusive was her zeal, so humble her estimate of her own ability and influence, so careful her watch over her daily walk, so close her communings with her Heavenly Guide, that it seems peculiarly fitting to say of her that her "life was hid with Christ in God." In her is lost a noble woman, a faithful wife, a most tender and careful mother, and a sincere friend: but she left to those who mourn her loss the consoling assurance that her "sins were forgiven through the one Atonement," and expressed her confidence that all would be well, whether it should please God to restore her to health, or to take her to Himself, saying sweetly, "He knows best—altogether best."

BUTLER.—On the 14th of Sixth month, 1869, Emeline, daughter of Mahlon and Eunice Butler, in the 19th year of her age; a member of Sugar River Monthly Meeting, Ind. This dear young Friend was for some years nearly deprived of her sight, but was an example of patient aad complete submission to the Divine will, often expressing thankfulness that the spiritual eye was not blinded.

HUNT.—At Monrovia, Ind., on the 24th of Sixth month, 1869, of pulmonary consumption, in the 42d year of her age, Mary Jane, wife of Dr. Wm. Hunt. The resignation and patience with which she was enabled to bear her sufferings gave a remarkable verification of the Scripture, "My grace is sufficient for thee." Being aware of the near approach of her dissolution, she at various times had her family and relatives gathered around her, and gave them much edifying counsel, committing them in prayer to her blessed Saviour. Her last hours were calm and peaceful, and her latest words were, "Come, Lord Jesus, I am ready."

STOKES.—On the 16th of Seventh month, 1869, Lydia W., wife of Carleton P. Stokes, in the 63d year of her age; a member of Woodbury (N. J.) Monthly and Particular Meetings. She was a bright example in the attendance of religious meetings, and in upholding and supporting the doctrines and principles of our religious Society. In the removal of this dear Friend, her family and friends, the poor and afflicted, experience a great bereavement. But an abiding belief is felt that, having done her day's work in the day time, she has been permitted, by the mercy of God in Christ Jesus our Lord, to enter into everlasting rest and peace.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A Day with the Monks of St. Bernard.

Written for Friends' Review by Prof. A. R. Leeds.

Martigny, 7th mo. 10, 1869.—A lay brother descended the steps of the Hospice, and, unburdening me of my knapsack, led me through a stone passage into a large hall. Then, in answer to the summons of a great bell, a monk descended and received me in the most cordial manner. His appearance was striking and well worthy of description. He was clad in a black cloth coat, buttoned tight up in front and reaching almost to his feet. It was relieved by a narrow linen band, coming out from beneath the collar at the back and disappearing again beneath a fold of the coat at the waist. His cap was made of black cloth also, rising straight at the sides for about four inches and gathered square in by a button at the top. His face was remarkably handsome. His chin large and square, dipping into a deep groove, and then rising into the full but sharply-cut lips. His nose was straight and massive, and intercepted at a sharp angle the broad overhanging forehead. His physiognomy strongly reminded me of Canova's classic bust of Napoleon. Picking up a couple of candles, he conducted me directly to my chamber. It was a tiny dormitory, furnished with a couple of chairs, a wash-table, secretary, and a bed covered with a big down pillow in the German fashion. It was lined on all sides and ceiling with deal, and had a little double-sashed window looking out upon the lake.

After a few minutes' unpacking—I had no change of clothing, and my room was icy cold—I descended to the salle-à-manger. It was a large, comfortable-looking apartment, with a dining-table capable seemingly of seating about fifty guests, and with its walls hung around with engravings—the gifts of voyagers who had enjoyed the succor and welcome of the hospice. Shivering with cold, I cowered down on the floor before the ashes of the hearth, and tried to warm my stiff fingers into life. The same monk who had received me, and who appeared to be deputed by his brethren to fill the office of entertainer-in-chief—not knowing his name, I shall in future designate him as brother Napoleon—hastened to heap some blocks of wood upon the andirons, and with a bellows speedily blew the smouldering ashes into a bright blaze.

After a while I sat down to supper, along with an English gentleman, his wife and daughter, whose acquaintance I had accidentally made previously, brother Napoleon, for form's sake, taking a dish of tea with us. The conversation, which was carried on in French, turned upon the history of the monastery, its revenues, the perils of travellers in the winter season, the habits, real and reputed, of the St. Bernard dogs, and speedily became very animated and interesting.

I slept that night very soundly, and rose thoroughly refreshed to the sound of the bell calling the monks to a six o'clock mass. It was conducted in the large chapel which constitutes the east end of the hospice, by the superior, clad in the rich vestments of his office, the monks in long white stoles assisting. Some of them had rich, strong voices, and the chanting at times was beautiful. But leaving them presently, I tried to warm myself by taking a run down the side of the pretty little lake which occupies the summit-level of the pass. Along its sheltered banks the grass was very bright and green, and there was such a profusion of wild violets (the Viola Calcarata) as I have never seen elsewhere. In a few moments I had plucked my hands full of them, for a morning gift to my English acquaintances. Then I sat myself down on a pile of rocks at the water's edge, designing to sketch the monastery, but I relinquished the idea. The morning sun beat full in my sore and blistered face, and the hospice, despite all the associations which cluster about it, is of itself a very commonplace building. So I returned in time to join the three other guests and brother Napoleon to a frugal breakfast of coffee, bread and butter and honey.

Afterwards N. led me up stairs into the library. It contains about 12,000 volumes. The bulk of them treat upon religion, but I noticed that they were not by any means confined to the publications of the Romish Church, and included many of the principal works of dissenting theologians. There was besides a great number of books of travels, philosophy, history, mathematics and the natural sciences, botany especially. There were also some choice romances, the tragedies of Corneille, the poems of the English classical authors, and likewise a few such miscellaneous writings as the Thoughts of a Country Parson, etc. The politeness of the monks had probably placed these books here for the amusement of their transient guests.

There was also a very interesting collection of copper and silver coins, which had mostly been found in the little lake, and commencing with the Consular era, extended far down into the time of the Roman emperors. Among them are some of Celtic origin, and they are especially interesting because Livy mentions that the tribe of Veragres had a temple on St. Bernard. In the itinerary of Antoninus, moreover, reference is made to a Roman camp in this defile.

When I had finished examining the books and coins and a small entomological collection, brother Napoleon gave me a table which I might use as a place for work, and then revealed to me a secret catch in the lock, by which he might safely leave the key in the door, and by the knowledge of which I might go out and in the library whenever I chose. Then after giving me the keys of the mineral collection, he left me alone in the library and went to resume his meditations in his cell. I was disappointed in the minerals, for beyond some fine specimens of Pennite, Chalybite, Axinite and Dufreynosite, the remainder, in number about 1200, were quite ordinary and common.

Afterwards one of the monks, who was more particularly interested in botany, took me to his nicely warmed and comfortable cell. First he helped me to label, pack up and seal the Alpine plants which I had previously collected and pressed for my botanically-disposed brother at home. Then he took down book after book of his herbarium, and gave me several hundred specimens of the rare Alpine plants which adorn the rich flora of the Grand St. Bernard. Finally he made out for me a collection as large as two great folio volumes. I had had no other thought than to pay fifty or sixty francs for the superb treasure I was getting, but great was my dismay and astonishment when he refused to accept a single centime, adding that it was a pleasure to give them all to me.

Then the Superior of the monastery took me to his room, which is also a meteorological observatory, and after putting conveniences for writing and the observations which I was about to make at my disposal, left me alone and went out to take a walk. I had with me a hypsomometer, which I had purchased of the Society of Geneva for the Construction of Philosophical Apparatus, and which had been made under the personal supervision of Prof. Thury, the director of this most praiseworthy society. The tube of the thermometer, used in the instrument, was carefully calibrated throughout. It has two scales, agreeing between themselves, but both arbitrary of course, each commencing at zero, and the space between them occupied by a reservoir for receiving the unnecessary mercury. The graduation was effected in the following interesting manner. On the 28th of Sixth month, 1868, Prof. Thury, at the Observatory in Geneva, placed this thermometer in the tube above the boiler and carefully scratched on the glass the point to which the mercury rose when the water in the boiler below was in a state of regular ebullition. The barometer, reduced to zero, gave 731.00 m.m. at the time. He then carried the apparatus to the observatory on the Grand St. Bernard, and noted the point, several inches lower of course, which the mercury attained when the water at this place was boiling. The barometer here at the same time stood at 567.35 m.m. Now the number of degrees of temperature which correspond to this difference of atmospheric pressure of 731.00 m.m. and 567.35 m.m. or 163.65 m.m. can be calculated with the greatest accuracy. Hence all that was necessary was to divide the space between these two fixed points into the number of degrees corresponding to the calculated difference of temperature. The zero point was afterward determined by plunging the thermometer into melting ice. When the graduation was effected, it stood at 30°.00 on the lower scale. A year afterwards, through the kindness of Prof. Plantamour, the director of the Geneva Observatory, I repeated these observations at Geneva, and found the freezing point had shifted and then stood at 31°.20. As will be understood at once, this shifting does not at all impair the correctness of the instrument, and it is a slow change to which the best of thermometers are subject. It is only necessary to allow for the shifting in every subsequent determination of the boiling point.

I had used the hypsomometer to determine the altitude of a number of points in the valley of Chamounix, the Bagne and of the Rhone, and had been delighted with its accuracy. The hundredth part of a degree Fahrenheit can be read off easily upon it, and a difference in altitude of a few feet determined with certainty. It was no small pleasure with this instrument, which had been brought to St. Bernard in the process of manufacture, to determine the height of the same place as a test of its reliability. I have not as yet reduced my observations, but they stand thus: as the mean of four observations in Sixth mo., 1868, the boiling point at St. Bernard was 18°.26, the barometer reduced to 0°C., 567.35 m.m. On the 8th of Seventh mo., 1869, the boiling point at the same place was 18°.80, the barometer at 19°.6 C. standing at 575.6 m.m.

According to the calculations of Prof. Plantamour, the Hospice of St. Bernard stands at 2473 metres, or something over 7500 feet above the level of the sea. This altitude does not of itself alone explain the general rigor of the climate of St. Bernard. According to a resumé of the meteorological observations from 1836 to 1846, made by Plantamour, and which I have converted into ordinary degrees of Fahrenheit, the mean temperature of the entire year at St. Bernard is 29°.73. That of winter is 17°.17, of the First mo. 12°.74, of spring 27°.66, and of summer 42°.94. The range between the mean temperature of winter and summer is not very great therefore, being only about 25°–30°. It is curious to imagine living at such a place, where, in sight of vine, olive, fig and pomegrante, the average temperature during the summer is only ten degrees above the freezing point. The greatest cold experienced during these ten years was—17°, and the greatest heat 19° C. or 66° Fahrenheit. I think that this latter number must be a misprint, for at the very day on which I was at St. Bernard, the thermometer in the observatory stood at 19°.6 C. or 68° F. It will be noticed that these extremes are by no means as great as those we have even in Philadelphia, for, during my own recollection, we have had summers when the thermometer indicated 97°, and winters when it registered 10° below zero. But the passage of the St. Bernard runs N. E. and S. W., a direction common to the great valleys of Savoy and Valais, and as the wind takes a course parallel with great mountain chains, it results that the icy blasts often sweep through this passage with terrific violence, and hurl down whirlwinds of snow upon the affrighted traveller.

The sun was already half-way down the western sky before I had finished examining all that was of interest at St. Bernard, and I was determined to reach Martigny, 25 miles away, and a large part of the distance on foot, that night. So I dropped all my money, except a trifle sufficient to carry me to Martigny, into the alms-box of the church, and putting my knapsack, now swollen into twice its former dimensions, on my back, my tin box under my arm, hammer into my belt, Alpine stock in my hand, and bidding an affectionate farewell to brother Napoleon, rapidly descended along the roaring torrent of the Dranse towards Martigny and the Rhone.

GUILFORD Co., N. C., 8th mo. 26.—I have been sent out on an appointment to visit our scattered members, which has caused me to traverse many miles of country. I do not think I have ever seen a gloomier prospect for corn in our land than at present,—though, with a better wheat crop than usual, I hope none will starve. . . . W. B. HOCKETT.

FRIENDSVILLE, EAST TENN., 8th mo. 20, 1869.

Dear friend Wm. J. Allinson,—A few Friends have secured the refusal of a very valuable farm and water-power. It contains between six and seven hundred acres of the best of land, some of it at least unsurpassed for fertility in the United States. It is situated on the Holston River: the large and spacious brick dwelling is about three miles from Newberry Monthly Meeting house. There is about from three to four hundred acres in cultivation, two mill streams running through it into the Holston River. About one mile of it borders on that river. It had been worked by slave labor until the close of the war, when the owners left for the South. It is now all offered for $18,000, and is considered very cheap. Upon it are two fruit orchards, and at least four excellent springs of pure water. It will divide conveniently into four or five farms, if desired, affording plenty of timber and water on each. There are, it is said, no doubt moneyed men here who will buy it when it comes into market at that price. Hence Friends have got the refusal, hoping it will suit some Friends to buy and settle on it. I much desire to see Friends come in and possess this goodly land. The interest in our Society still increases. Our Quarterly Meeting last week at Lost Creek was largely attended by the public. There is much need of skilful, earnest lahor; the harvest is plenteous, the laborers indeed few. May not the language apply with full force, "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers into his harvest"? Several of our new members attended Quarterly Meeting. Some of them at least appear to be deepening in the divine life. None that I can discover are decreasing in their interest in our Society, though there is need of skilful nursing.

The article on Revivals, in the 49th No. of the Review, is as a cordial to my feelings. The wind bloweth where it listeth. Let none attempt to dictate for the Spirit, but let all obey Him in love, and the work of the Lord will prosper among us. He will then revive His work in the midst of the years.

Thy attached friend, JER. A. GRINNELL.

The wheat crop was good here, but the continued drouth forbids the prospect for much corn. Vegetables fail from the same cause.

FERRISBURG, VERMONT, 8th mo. 9, 1869.—Our dear Friends Rebecca Collins and Jane W. Ferris have been acceptably within the limits of this Quarterly Meeting. They have attended the two indulged meetings at Creek and Lincoln. Several meetings appointed for the public have been crowded, and eminently favored. When R. C.'s brother-in-law, Stephen Grellet, many years ago was here, he visited Joseph Hoag and his wife in their log cabin, and in a family sitting told the parents that if they were faithful, all their children would become prophets of the Lord. I must not omit to mention the attendance of R. C. and J. W. F. at the indulged meeting at Montreal, held in a building of Walter Marriage's. The congregation consisted of twenty-three persons, one of whom was "tent pitcher" for Samuel Capper during his remarkable tent meetings in England, Ireland, &c. Of this meeting I am free to say that I believe it was held in the Lord's power. At East Farnham they had a blessed meeting. At Lincoln a large company flocked to a public meeting, in which Christ was exalted as Head over all, to the glory of God the Father. The Methodist minister who usually officiates referred to former service of R. C. on the farm of Gov. Wise, five years ago, and expressed his thankfulness that the Lord had led her feet to this place to preach the gospel to his flock. Let the servants ever be faithful, and let all the honor be given to the Master who employs and qualifies them.

Friends of Ferrisburg Quarterly Meeting will not soon forget the occurrence of the Eclipse on the day of their Summer Quarterly Meeting in 1869, and the interesting picture presented by groups of Friends of all ages standing on the grass, and gazing through smoked glass at a phenomenon of which they had read the accurate pre-descriptions by the President of Haverford College in Friends' Review. A mysterious charm was added to our lake and mountain scenery.

New York, 8th mo. 23.

Ed. Friends' Review: Respected friend,—In looking over a file of recent numbers of the Friends' Review, I was particularly struck with the appropriateness of the remarks of Henry Dickenson at the London Yearly Meeting, as to the danger attending young Friends who emigrate to this country without any certificate of membership.

Perhaps the majority of those who settle here come out with that intention, and their certificates are sent over after their arrival; it is not to these I would refer. There are, however, numbers who arrive in the United States without any such fixed purpose: they come hoping for remunerative employment or a successful business;—they cannot decide at once to sever the ties of home and country; and so they remain five or ten years without any certificate being forwarded.

I need not particularize the dangers which beset a young man so circumstanced; he is without the oversight of any body of Christians; and may, probably will, entirely neglect his religious duties.

Permit me to suggest a plan which would cause an oversight of such young Friends, and prevent many from going astray:

Let a Committee or Board of Immigration be established in New York or Philadelphia, to whom such certificates shall at once be sent, and who shall forward such information to any town where said young Friend shall take up his temporary residence. Friends in Great Britain might be reminded of the necessity of a prompt attention to the case of those Friends who leave for a residence (it may be of uncertain duration) in the United States. Thine sincerely, E. B.

[The above remarks may be profitably suggestive.—Ed. Review.]

Letter from Dr. Test.— . . . . I have been looking through "Day by Day" with much interest. The list of writers, ranging over the whole period of the existence of the Society, and the appropriate and characteristic extracts by which each is represented, are well calculated to attract the profitable perusal, not only of members of the same household of faith, but also of fellow Christians of all denominations, who, by this introduction, may be led to cultivate a more extended acquaintance with the various writers here presented.

A BEAUTIFUL INCIDENT.

A naval officer being at sea in a dreadful storm, his wife, who was sitting in the cabin near him, and filled with alarm for the safety of the vessel, was so surprised with his composure and serenity, that she cried out,

"My dear, are you not afraid? How is it possible you can be so calm in such a dreadful storm?"

He rose from his chair, lashed to the deck, supporting himself by a pillar of the bed-place, drew his sword, and pointing it at the breast of his wife, exclaimed;

"Are you afraid of that sword?"

She instantly answered, "No."

"Why?" said the officer.

"Because," rejoined the lady, "I know that it is in the hands of my husband, and he loves me too well to hurt me."

"Then," said he, "remember, I know in whom I believe, and that he holds the winds in his fists and the water in the hollow of his hands."

A FAITHFUL CLERGYMAN.

One of the most trenchant things we have lately seen on the liquor question is the fearless funeral sermon lately delivered by Dr. Ward, of Genesee, at the burial of one of his dear friends who died of drunkenness. The sermon boldly and at length arraigns the liquor-sellers of the town as accomplices in this man's death by alcoholic poison. Dr. Ward says, "Were I asked for the proximate cause of this man's death, my reply would be, the imbibing of a poisonous liquid, sold or given to him when in a state of impotence of will, and that by persons in this village, who might have known what use would be made of the same, with its certain and direful effects, and who had no other motive than pecuniary gain of the most trifling amount." It would be hard to pack an indictment against the diabolical crime of dealing out death by measure for paltry pence into fewer words than the above sentence. But what about the men who license the drinking saloons?—T. L. Cuyler.

A PRAYER.

BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

Thou, who dost dwell alone;
Thou, who dost know thine own;
Thou, to whom all are known,
From the cradle to the grave—
Save, O save!
From the world's temptations,
From tribulations,
From that fierce anguish
Wherein we languish,
From that torpor deep,
Wherein we lie asleep,
Heavy as death, cold as the grave—
Save, O save!
When the soul, growing clearer,
Sees God no nearer;
When the soul, mounting higher,
To God comes no nigher;
But the arch-fiend Pride
Mounts at her side,
Foiling her high emprise,
Sealing her eagle-eyes,
And when she fain would soar,
Makes idols to adore;

Changing the pure emotion
Of her high devotion
To a skin-deep sense
Of her own eloquence;
Strong to deceive, strong to enslave—
Save, O save!
From the ingrained fashion
Of this earthly nature,
That mars thy creature;
From grief, that is but passion;
From mirth, that is but feigning;
From tears, that bring no healing;
From wild and weak complaining;
Thine old strength revealing—
Save, O save!
From doubt, where all is double,
Where wise men are not strong,
Where comfort turns to trouble,
Where just men suffer wrong,
Where sorrow treads on joy,
Where sweet things soonest cloy,
Where faiths are built on dust,
Where love is half mistrust,
Hungry, and barren, and sharp as the sea—
O set us free!
O let the false dream fly,
Where our sick souls do lie
Tossing continually.
O where Thy voice doth come,
Let all doubts be dumb;
Let all words be mild,
All strifes reconciled,
All pains beguiled.
Light brings no blindness,
Love no unkindness,
Knowledge no ruin;
Fear no undoing—
From the cradle to the grave,
Save, O save!

Ill that He blesses is our good,
And unblest good is ill;
And all is right that seems most wrong,
If it be His sweet Will.

PARAPHRASE, PSALM lxxxiv. 1–4.

How blessed, O my God, is Thine abode!
How sweet the comfort that Thy worship brings!
My fainting heart cries out for Thee, O God,
My soul aspires to Thee on joyful wing!

A longing Thou alone canst satisfy
Thrills through my being as I hear Thy voice,
Speaking in gentlest accents, "Here am I,
Come, seek my presence, worship and rejoice."

The little fluttering sparrow, wearied long,
Hath found a pillow for her panting breast;
Circling through stormy air on pinions strong,
The swallow for her young finds place of rest.

And more than these, O Lord, my soul is glad,
That 'neath the covert of Thine altar pure,
Thou hast for her a glorious refuge made—
A place of safety that shall e'er endure!

O. A. R.

When obstacles and trials seem Like prison walls to be,
I do the little I can do,

Youth's Department.

THE TRUE LADDIE.

BY JULIA M. THAYER.

Here's a laddie, bright and fair,
And his heart is free from care;
Will he ever, do you think,
Learn to smoke, and chew, and drink?
Make a furnace of his throat,
And a "chimney of his nose,"
In his pocket not a groat,
Elbows out and ragged toes?

Here's a laddie, full of glee,
And his step is light and free;
Will he ever, do you think,
Mad with thirst, and crazed with drink,
Stagger wildly down the street;
Wallow in the mire and sleet;
Hug the lamp post, and declare
Snakes are writhing in his hair?

Not an ill this laddie knows,
And his breath is like the rose;
Will he ever, do you think,
Poisoned by the cursed drink,
Fever burning in his veins,
Soul and body racked with pains,
Sink into a drunkard's grave,
Few to pity—none to save?

No; this laddie, honor bright,
Vows to love the true and right;
Keep his body pure and sweet,
For the Spirit's dwelling meet;
Never, never will he sup
Horrors from the drunkard's cup;
Never in the "flowing bowl"
Will he drown his priceless soul.

HAVE COURAGE TO SAY "NO."

You're starting to-day on life's journey,
Along on the highway of life;
You'll meet with a thousand temptations,
Each city with evil is rife.
This world is a stage of excitement,
There's danger wherever you go;
But if you are tempted in weakness,
Have courage, my boy, to say NO.

The siren's sweet song may allure you;
Beware of her cunning and art;
Whenever you see her approaching,
Be guarded, and haste to depart.
The billiard saloons are inviting,
Decked out in their tinsel and show;
You may be invited to enter;
Have courage, my boy, to say NO.

The bright ruby wine may be offer'd:
No matter how tempting it be,
From poison that stings like an adder,
My boy, have the courage to flee.
The gambling halls are before you,
Their lights, how they dance to and fro!
If you should be tempted to enter,
Think twice, even thrice, ere you GO.

In courage alone lies your safety,
When you the long journey begin,
And trust in a heavenly Father
Will keep you unspotted from sin.
Temptations will go on increasing,
As streams from a rivulet flow,
But if you are true to your manhood,
Have courage, my boy, to say NO.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—Advices from Europe are to the 30th ult.

GREAT BRITAIN.—An editorial in the London Times of the 25th, on the prospects of the prices for grain, said that a year of sufficiency, if not of abundance, may be looked for. The harvest is within 13 per cent. of an average, and a continuance of favorable weather may still further improve it. All the crops except wheat are luxuriant, and, with imported grain selling at a moderate price, the deficiency of wheat is compensated by plentiful food for stock and better pastures.

A new telegraphic cable is said to be projected from Ireland to America.

FRANCE.—The report of the committee on the senatus consultum has been read in the Senate, and the discussion on it was to commence on the 1st inst. Among the modifications made by it is one that the Senate may reject a law without giving reasons.

The official journal states that the recent amnesty granted by the Emperor does not extend to those who have been convicted of attempts to take the life of the Emperor or of any other political person.

The Emperor has been ill, it is said not seriously so, but considerable uneasiness was manifested in monetary circles on account of contradictory statements on the subject. The latest accounts reported an improvement in his condition.

The Empress and her son left Paris on the 23d ult. for a visit to Constantinople and probably some other points in the East. It was reported that they had intended visiting Jerusalem, but that the plan was given up. They embarked at Toulon on the 27th.

The Chinese Embassy is to leave Paris for St. Petersburg, on the 12th inst.

SPAIN.—It is reported that 6000 additional troops are to be speedily sent to reinforce the Spanish army in Cuba. Gen. Carbo has been appointed Lieutenant Governor of that island.

Several Carlist prisoners have been condemned to death, but the government, yielding to solicitations from all parties, has commuted the sentence of some clergymen among them, and there will probably be no more executions. Six bishops have returned unsatisfactory and defiant answers to the recent decree of the government.

PORTUGAL.—The session of the Cortes closed on the 26th ult. The King's speech declared that the government was making every effort to restore a financial equilibrium and revive the public credit, and that they would consider how to augment the revenues from imports, and diminish the expenditures.

PRUSSIA.—A meeting of 20,000 persons was held in Berlin on the 28th, to consider a series of resolutions favoring the suppression of convents and the expulsion of the Jesuits. After a long debate, the resolutions were finally adopted, but a protest was made by the minority. The resolutions were not directed particularly against any confession of faith.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.—The reply of the Viceroy to the Sultan's note was received at Constantinople on the 14th. It was conciliatory and even humble in tone, gave strong assurances of loyalty, and expressed a hope that the frank explanations given might remove any unfavorable impressions, and that his appeals to the Sultan's generosity would be heard and answered.

CHINA.—A late dispatch from Hong Kong, published in London, asserted that the Chinese government had refused to ratify the treaty concluded by the Burlingame embassy with the United States; but J. Ross Browne, late U. S. Minister to Pekin, who has very recently arrived at San Francisco in his return, contradicts the statement, saying that the ratification is only deferred till the return of the embassy.

A dispatch dated the 5th ult. from Hong Kong, said that the reports of the massacre of Christian missionaries in the province of Seehuen, in the western part of China, were confirmed, and that 20 were known to have been killed by the populace. The Chinese government had instituted inquiries concerning the outrages.

SOUTH AMERICA.—At the latest advices received via London, both the land and naval forces of the Allies were in motion, designing an attack on Villa Rica. No attempt appears to have been made on the position of Lopez, in the mountains.

CUBA.—The accounts continue vague and contradictory. The official paper of Havana, recently, in its monthly review for the steamer to Spain, expressed regret for its inability to send flattering notices regarding the suppression of the insurrection, but reiterated its assertion that the Spaniards had the ascendency in seven jurisdictions of the Eastern and Central Deparments. The forces on both sides have undoubtedly suffered much from disease, this being the sickly season.

HAYTI.—The government of President Salnave is involved in difficulties. Salnave himself, with his troops, is besieging Aux Cayes, which is occupied by rebels, and in consequence of serious disturbances at Port au Prince in his absence, the city has been placed under strict martial law. Financial matters also are embarrassed, and the government has become involved in disputes with the clergy, so that the President's tenure of office appears exceedingly uncertain.

DOMESTIC.—Two miles of snow sheds on the Central Pacific railroad, between Cisco and the summit of the Sierra Nevada, were burned on the night of the 24th ult. The track was also injured by the burning of many of the ties, and the bending of the rails. The temporary interruption was soon repaired.

The Governor of Florida has recently issued a proclamation for an election in the western counties of that State, to decide whether they shall be united to Alabama or remain as now a part of Florida. The election is ordered for 11th mo. 2, and if the decision be for a change, within 60 days after approval by Congress, all that portion of Florida lying west of the Apalachicola and Chattahoochee rivers will be transferred to Alabama, the latter paying therefor $1,000,000 in bonds bearing 8 per cent. interest, and payable in 30 years.

The official returns of the election in Virginia, held 7th mo. 6, have been published, and show as the whole number of voters registered, whites 149,781, colored, 129,120; votes cast, whites 125,144, colored 97,205. The votes for the Constitution were 210,585, against, 9,136, a majority of 201,449. The majority against the clause disfranchising those who as officers had taken an oath to support the Constitution and had afterwards engaged in rebellion, was 39,050; and against that requiring State officers to take an oath that they had not aided the rebellion, 40,902.

Charles D. Cleveland, the compiler of the well-known works, the Compendiums of English, American and Classical Literature, and for many years a distinguished and successful teacher, died in this city on the 18th ult.

Mary Tanner was the only daughter of the late Edward and Mary Gregory, of Yatton, and was born on the 28th day of Third Month, 1792. Her mother did not long survive her birth, and her early life at home was passed under the care of her valued relative the late Mary Mullett, and subsequently under that of her worthy stepmother Elizabeth Gregory. In the Sixth Month, 1814, she was united in marriage to the late Arthur Thomas Tanner, of Sidcot, where she resided up to the time of her death, a period of nearly fifty-five years.

But little is known of the work of Divine grace in her heart in the early years of her life; but the work was in progress, and a very gradual preparation for service was going on. Under the date 9th of Sixth Month, 1816, she writes, "Oh! for increasing strength to press forward while the day lasts:" and a month later, in a time of trouble, she alludes to the purpose of her Heavenly Father, "moulding" her "into some new form, for fresh service, to which," she says, "my nature stands opposed." "May I experience entire submission, and may his most holy will be done."

For fourteen years the prospect of service, here hinted at, rested with more or less clearness on her mind; but the care of a young family devolved upon her, and for a season her work for her Saviour was chiefly confined to the limited but highly important sphere of the family circle. Earnest were her desires "faithfully to discharge" her "duties to her beloved children," and "for their eternal redemption through Christ Jesus our Saviour." She writes, "Many are the fervent prayers that have been offered by their bedside, in visits to their chamber, when refreshing sleep has closed their eyelids for the night, while all that could feel within me bowed in reverent desire that these precious gifts may be kept from the evil, and live to the praise and glory of Him who created them."

This long period of abiding the appointed time drew to a close; before its termination a valued friend travelling on religious service intimated to her his belief "that the drops of heavenly dew which had already descended upon her head were but a prelude to the pouring out of the anointing oil." "Gratitude filled her heart," and her faith was further confirmed by an unexpected but very impressive visit from a pious person not in profession with us, though a frequent attender at our meetings, "who," she says, "while much a stranger to me, has been so impressed with a belief that it is required of me to express a few words in meeting, that he has given me a solemn caution not to resist, lest I should grieve and eventually quench the Holy Spirit, expressing his belief that it would be safest for me to close in with the opening, however small it might be, believing that faithfulness in the little would lead to my being entrusted with more. This has been to me a Gospel message, not to be disregarded."

Four days later, on the 14th of First Month, 1830, she records that, at their Monthly Meeting at Claverham, "The expression of a few words in the Women's Meeting, which appeared to me to be a required duty, was succeeded by sweet peace." From this time her gift in the ministry was freely exercised, and in reference to the service to which she felt called she says, "Oh! that deep humiliation of soul and watchfulness of spirit may be my experience, that so I may be preserved from bringing the blessed cause of my adorable Redeemer in any way into disrepute; that I may alike in the heights and in the depths seek the shelter of Emanuel's wing as my place of safety, and that I may, through close attention to my spiritual Counsellor, know when to speak and when to be silent." Our friend was recorded a minister at the Monthly Meeting held at Chew Magna on the 11th of Fifth Month, 1831.

Next year, in company with her mother, Elizabeth Gregory, M. T. was engaged, with the concurrence of her friends, in holding meetings with the inhabitants of the mining villages of Rowborough and Shipham. Speaking of this little labor of love she says: "I think we had some evidence of being owned by Him who goes before his own when He puts them forth: it is a kind of service from which my nature much shrinks, but strength was made equal to the day, and peace, sweet peace, with which the stranger could not intermeddle, has been the result. How is it we do not more often, and more largely, partake of this soul-enriching peace? Surely it is because we do not pursue, with undivided hearts, the way in which it is to be found: we form our own plans and follow our own inclinations, and we eat the fruit of our own doings, which is often very bitter; whereas, were we found diligently running in the way of the Lord's requirings,—were our souls in a state of spiritual health, so that doing his will were our meat and drink, and if one act of dedication succeeded another, in the beautiful order of the waves of the sea,—then might we know our peace to flow like the noiseless passing away of a deep river."

For a long series of years, until the close of 1859, our dear friend was engaged in a succession of ministerial services, beyond those which devolved upon her in her own particular meeting. The records of our Monthly Meeting contain many notices of such service, especially within what may be called a "home district," comprising most of the hamlets and villages in the neighborhood of her residence. Besides the meetings for worship to which the public were invited, she felt it her place, on more than one occasion, to sit with the families of her neighbors in their own homes. From this latter service, she says, "I recoiled even more than from holding meetings, and earnestly did I desire a supply of that light, which alone can prepare me, to divide the word aright." At its conclusion she adds, "Instead of having paid to the full the debt of Gospel love, I am sensible that I owe more than before, especially to some of the poor of this world, to whom my spirit did seem to be knit in that love which binds together the followers of the Saviour; and the work from which I most desired to be excused,—the sitting down as a fool in the sight of some who were unacquainted with this mode of proceeding,—yielded the most solid peace in the retrospect, and is remembered with the most comfort."

In the spring of 1835 M. T. paid a visit to Friends of Dorsetshire and Hampshire and of the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, in the retrospect of which she had thankfully to acknowledge that, though she was permitted at times to get into very dark places,—having her way hedged up on every side,—help in the time of need was, in unmerited mercy, extended, and the light commanded to shine, so that her path was again and again made plain before her, where no way had for a time been seen. In the end a peaceful release from this field of labor was thankfully experienced. In the autumn of the same year she paid family visits to Friends of Bristol. No service in the Church demands larger faith, more constant watchfulness, or a closer following of the Heavenly Guide, than that of breaking spiritual bread from house to house. It was an arduous undertaking; but one who saw the labor of love testifies that "for days in succession she appeared wonderfully enabled to hand the spiritual food that was needed."

In 1842, accompanied by her husband, she visited Ireland, and attended the Yearly Meeting of Dublin. She paid a second visit to Ireland, of two months' duration, in company with her son William, in 1859. Besides holding large public meetings in the province of Ulster, they had social gatherings of young friends in Cork, Limerick and Dublin, and two meetings for worship with the younger members of our Society in the latter city. On returning from this service she records "a reverent thankful belief that, having gone out in the apprehension that I did so at the bidding of the Good Shepherd, He has, in infinite condescension, accepted the offering and owned the work."

It was the last time she was called to such a work. She felt it "a little evening sacrifice," and "trusting in her Saviour's all-sufficient grace," she had entered upon it with "strong desires that the remainder of her days might be spent in the seclusion of her own loved quiet home, without taking any conspicuous place in the service of the Church." Her desire was granted; but her work was not done. For a "little while" it was yet her's "to sow the seed" in hearts prepared, we thankfully believe, to receive it. Her communications in her own meeting continued frequent, and were, as ever, strikingly adapted to the varied states of those around her, full of the ripened experience of the aged disciple, yet so simple that the child could understand, and so lively and varied as to secure unwavering attention. Who can over-estimate the value of the privilege of such a ministry in a meeting largely composed of the inmates of a public school? With gratitude to the Giver of every good and perfect gift, we record the well-founded belief that by her many a lamb has been availingly invited into the fold, and many a drooping plant refreshed with living water.

Nor was her interest in Sidcot School confined to the preaching of the Gospel: her sympathy was warmly called out for any in affliction, and for those about to leave the school and enter upon untried spheres of life: these she would invite to her house, and her counsel was often accompanied by some little token of her affectionate interest. In 1865 she writes, "Very earnest desires often clothe my spirit that all the arrangements in the school may be made under the direction of that wisdom which comes from above. A lively interest in that institution and this meeting, closely connected as the welfare of each is with the other, has been, I believe, deepening its roots in my heart for more than fifty years; . . . . and I cannot look forward to leaving it forever without a sense of tender solicitude for the future, and a fervent wish that I could see the vacant places of many who once stood as pillars here—and are now, I confidently trust, pillars in the House of our God, to go no more out—occupied by a large number of those, who, yielding to the forming hand of the Great Potter and to the sanctifying operations of the Holy Spirit, could give decided evidence of being under the preparing hand for service in the Lord's vineyard, and openly show themselves on his side."

Towards the close of 1867 the increasing weakness of age and nervous pain in the limbs confined our dear friend to the house. A slight attack of paralysis in the spring of 1868 still further prostrated her, and though she was favored to experience a partial recovery, she was left very feeble and liable to sudden paroxysms of severe pain.

Very grateful was she for the sympathy of her friends, and very refreshing was it to those who were at times privileged to see her, to mark the trusting confidence with which she was ever able to commit herself to Him in whom she had believed. "'The Eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms,' is a declaration that has arrested my attention, accompanied by an intense desire for ability to accept it as addressed to me; and a sense of trembling trust that it may be even so, through the merits and mediation of the pardoning grace of our Holy Redeemer, has at times filled my heart, with a joy with which no stranger could intermeddle: it is enough for the most timid and weakest child in the family to know that, whatever dangers await us, — whatever temptations may assail the traveller Zionwards,—the door of mercy is ever open into this hiding place, whereunto we may continually resort and find safety."

M. T. has left several volumes of memoranda, ranging from the year 1816, when she was twenty-four years of age, down to within a few weeks of her death. These strikingly evince a growth in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; and as years roll on they set forth, with increasing distinctness, her appreciation of his atoning sacrifice, as well as of the comforting and sanctfying work of the Holy Spirit. No less strikingly do they evince the earnestness and holy diligence with which, throughout life, she day by day sought for fresh supplies of the heavenly manna, literally rising "before the sun was up," in order "to make all other duties subservient to this." "In the freshness of the morning air, in the stillness of the house, I feel," she says, "alone with God;" and again refers to "the dear old roof which has sheltered me for more than half a century, and from which the daily and nightly tribute ascends to my Father in heaven for all his goodness and mercy, which have followed and still follow me." Here we believe she found the streams of living water that enabled her to maintain her fruitfulness in the field of offering and the holy Christian serenity that so peculiarly marked her.

The final illness was of short duration. A heavy cold, accompanied by symptoms of bronchitis, aroused the tender solicitude of her family circle. An accession of disease for the last twenty-four hours compelled her to take to her bed, and on the 15th of First Month, 1869, having, we thankfully believe, "served her generation, by the will of God," she fell asleep. Her remains were interred in the Friends' burial-ground at Sidcot, on the 22d of First Month, 1869.

"Hold thou me up and I shall be safe" are the words which most appropriately end her written record of the goodness and mercy that followed her all the days of her life. "Let us commit and commend one another to the care and keeping of the Good Shepherd, for time and for eternity," were among the last audible words of the tongue so often vocal with the praises of his redeeming love.

In commemorating the manifest tokens of a renewed and dedicated heart, in the life of our beloved friend,—her simple, childlike faith in the Lord Jesus, and her unreserved obedience to that into which her faith led,—we desire to magnify the grace by which she was what she was. In the unutterable riches of that grace, she has, we reverently believe, been permitted to join the countless company who now surround the throne, ascribing glory and honor, salvation and strength, to the Lord God Omnipotent and to the Lamb.

ON THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

BY JOSIAH FORSTER.

I wish to bear a testimony to the Divine authority of the Bible. Our Heavenly Father, in his infinite love to the children of men, has been pleased to grant us a revelation of his will in the books of the Old and New Testaments. The more these records are received in the simplicity of faith, and in prayer for the enlightening influence of the Holy Spirit, the more will their excellency and their appropriate application to the necessities of man in all the varied circumstances in which he is placed be accepted with heartfelt gratitude to God.

The early history of man, the continued narratives of the dealings of our Creator with his chosen people, the children of Israel, and the predictions of the coming of the Messiah, are interesting to the enlightened Christian beyond description. In the New Testament, the fulfilment of these prophecies, in the coming of the Lord Jesus, at the time and in the way appointed, as the Saviour of the human race, are facts of unspeakably solemn import to every one of us. I am conscious that the following is but a feeble and imperfect tribute to the invaluable contents of the New Testament.

How simple, how beautiful, and how excellent, are the truths presented to mankind by our Lord and Redeemer! What a summary of divine wisdom is presented to us in the fifth, sixth and seventh chapters of the Gospel written by the Evangelist Matthew! With what comprehensive beatitudes does "the Sermon on the Mount" commence! Some applying more especially to the duties of man in this life, others to that life which is to come; but all fraught with promises consolatory to the true followers of the Lord Jesus. How does He then proceed to correct and extend the precepts of the Mosaic Law, and to bring home to the conscience injunctions which, if faithfully carried out in practice, would change and beautify the whole character of civil society, producing pure morality, true devotedness and holiness of life, a resistance of the temptations of the devil, and an utter renunciation of that sin and wickedness to which the evil heart of man is continually prone.

The teachings, the miracles, the discourses, and the parables of our Lord, are indeed wondrous statements of heavenly truths. Our familiarity with them may be in danger of causing us to undervalue their excellency. Look at the spiritual character which so often marks the writings of the four Evangelists. More especially does this remark apply to the addresses of our Lord presented to us in the Gospel of John. How much in a few words is conveyed in the unspeakably important though brief narratives of the miraculous conception, the birth, the sufferings, the death, the resurrection and ascension of our blessed Lord, as recorded in the early and latter chapters of these four books!

In using the term spiritual, I wish to be understood as speaking of that which is in contradistinction to what is merely sensual, connected with the appetites, the passions, and the desires of the carnal, unregenerate mind, and even with the mere intellectual man. It is not that the reason and understanding are not to be exercised. These powers were bestowed by our gracious Creator, and are to be used in subservience to the guidance and government of the Holy Spirit.

I enjoy the Book of Acts. It is truly a precious record of the early spread of Christian truth and doctrine by the Apostles of our Lord.

What brief declarations of heavenly wisdom —what beautiful, tender, yet solemn and awakening, descriptions of Christian redemption—are presented to us in the Epistles of Peter, and of others of the Apostles! Often have I, to my instruction, dwelt upon the records of salvation and redemption to be found in the letters to the Churches, written by the Apostle Paul. After the strictest sect of his religion, he had lived a Pharisee, despising in the days of our Lord upon earth the heavenly truths which He had offered to the unbelieving Jews. Paul had been a blasphemer. After his miraculous conversion, to him was it more especially given of God to write and hand down to us those repeated and solemn, those full and comprehensive, declarations of the efficacy of the sufferings on the cross of our blessed Saviour when He offered himself a willing sacrifice for the sins of the whole human race. Meditate frequently, I entreat you, my dear friends, and that with reverent thansgiving and praise, upon this act of the Lord of the universe, who, in his perfect wisdom, in his unutterable love and mercy, gave his only begotten Son to redeem us from all iniquity, and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy.

Nor would I omit bearing a strong testimony how comprehensive and how excellent are the brief Epistles to the Seven Churches of Asia, presented to us in some of the early chapters of the Book of Revelations. In that book are recorded mysteries which are yet to be unfolded and fulfilled in the counsels of love, as the Most High seeth meet. At the same time it contains promises of unspeakable joy and happiness, which have in all ages yielded consolation and strength to the true followers of the Lamb in enduring the tribulations and the conflicts of life, and in looking towards a peaceful immortality.

Whilst I have been writing, the question has come again and again before me,—How are these glorious truths of Holy Scripture to be availingly received, and to be acted on? The simple answer is,—By the help of the Spirit of God. Though blessed with these invaluable records, man has no power to apply them to the necessities of his soul, unaided by this Almighty agency. He who created us, and has given us a revelation of his will and of his purposes, in the books of the Old and of the New Testament, offers to the children of men the enlightening influence of the Holy Spirit. In the infinite kindness of our gracious Heavenly Father, the rays of the Sun of Righteousness shine upon the dark heart of man; and that from the earliest dawn of reason. As the evils of our nature are resisted, quietness and love take the place of trouble and sorrow, a calming influence is granted in which peace and tranquillity are enjoyed, and the truths of Holy Scripture are often found to be unspeakably precious to the soul.

ON COMPLETENESS OF CHARACTER.

BY PROF H. HARTSHORNE, M. D.

Often persons of strong convictions, on matters of belief, trouble themselves because they cannot understand how others, of quite heterodox opinions, exhibit much beauty of character. But is there not such a thing as character as a fine art? The æsthetics of character remain to be written, as a system; but fragments thereupon have appeared from time to time, even from remote antiquity. There are those amongst philosophers who refer all our affections, desires and emotions to variations and manifestations of the one principle, self-love. That this cannot explain all, is plain; that it may originate much, far beyond the sphere of gross and palpable selfishness, is equally certain. Epicurus, who maintained that there is no evil except pain and fear, and that happiness is the one supreme good, enjoined, on that ground, the virtues of temperance, justice and benevolence. No wonder, then, that the elegant poet Horace, as well as the moderns, De La Rochefoucault, Fontenelle and Rousseau, found in his philosophy much to admire. "Know thyself," taught Socrates; for in that knowledge is the key not only to the best attainable happiness, but also to wisdom and duty. "Love thyself," said Epicurus; and, by prudence, wisdom and virtue, achieve the greatest happiness. Are not many, very many, of those who honestly bear the Christian name, standing, living, on no higher platform? Is not this, and this only, conveyed by the often current phrase, "self-respect," as a motive?

Very handsome things have been attained, sometimes, under the domination of the worldly code of "honor." No trifle, surely, is it, for a man who loves the pleasures of this life, to risk it, under and for that name. Yet it is only because he "feels a stain like a wound," and cannot bear life under disgrace. "Noblesse oblige,"—a fine phrase is that,—which has driven many men to do deeds having the flavor of patriotism, generosity, and self-sacrifice. It regards wholly the respect and valuation of self in this world. But Kingsley is certainly right in his witty transposition of meaning in the word "other-worldliness." Is the far-looking self-seeking, less selfish, when it stands alone as a motive? I think not; it is only more deliberate, less irrational. To do all that is done, for the sole purpose of reaching heaven, is as truly selfish as is the pursuit of riches, or fame, or power; but it is less unwise, at least in appearance. Even to labor, merely and solely for ourselves, to acquire for ourselves the qualities laid down in holy writ as fitting us for heaven, is only a grade better than Epicureanism, under a more imposing name. It is still a form, a mode, of selfishness. "One thing thou yet lackest," —though "all those things thou hast kept from thy youth up."

But, turning from these comparisons for a moment, let us consider what wisdom and capacity do lie in this self-culture;—this cherishing and self-elevation of character. Who does not know well the truth conveyed in the old line—

"To learn the luxury of doing good?"

The world is so ordered, and we are so made, that all noblest things are the happiest. "Fear not," said the ancients; "the gods always protect the brave."

It was a sweet old fable of those two,
Eros and Psyche; who, though parted oft,
Love ever, and at last their joys renew,
Being, by Hope, through all ills borne aloft.
E'en thus, to Virtue, Happiness is plighted;
And, to each other only, both belong.
So Virtue, lonely ofttimes and benighted,
Through darkest hours will suffer and grow strong,
Deaf to the revel-taunts of Pride and Wrong.
Wouldst thou win bliss? Then never seek thine own.
Coyest of all coquettes is Happiness,
Pursued, though madly, for herself alone;
But heaven is in her eyes, their hearts to bless,
Who, in full love unfeigned, are Virtue's own.

Short of this total devotion to Virtue, however, in doing and being what other men admire, and what we approve and gratulate ourselves upon, there are luxuries, great and refined; almost enough so to tempt men to martyrdom. Was it not this that made Père Lacordaire, the saintly Roman Catholic priest, exclaim, "I could wish that my body were nailed upon a cross?" Must not the vestal have rejoiced in her virginity,—and the wife Penelope in her long-tried constancy, —as much at least as the mother of the noble Gracchi did in her wealth of sons? Therefore, we may conceive of men, and women, holding up to themselves an ideal of personal character, high, pure and noble, and devoting themselves to it with an enthusiasm as intense as that with which others pursue pleasure, wealth, fame, or the prizes of ambition. Truly it is the grandest object of them all:—if it be infirm, it is "the least infirmity of a noble mind."

Were one to try thus to place perfection or "completeness of character" as a goal for the mind's conception, it may be hard, in view of its distance, to say or know just what or where it is. Not everywhere is it regarded, among men, as the same. Examples are familiar, showing what different standards prevail. Thus, Darius once asked the Greeks what sum of money would induce them to eat the dead bodies of their parents? They replied that nothing would bribe them to it. He asked a barbarian tribe, with whom that was regarded as a duty, what would induce them to burn their dead? They shrank from this, with equal horror and repulsion.

Still, in our prized civilization and world-wide intercourse, men do agree upon many things; Christians, upon most of the elements of estimable character. The opposition between "the world's" ideal and the New Testament standard of manhood and womanhood is not, essentially, so great as Dr. Paley would have made it out. "Piété, Charité," inscribed under the Empress's portrait at the Louvre, in Paris, are true Christian virtues. "Honneur, Patrie," named under the Emperor's, are so also, though far from comprising all the Christian character. Were we all to be as complete as our standards are, it would be well.

What makes character? This must have much to do with its facts, and with its accountabilities. But it is a subtile, difficult question. No one answer will suffice. Inheritance, organization, education, companionship, and circumstances, all bear parts in it. Conventionality, custom, fashion, whose authority is often more potent than that of law or gospel, even among those who acknowledge both,—these are wonderfully capricious and unequal in their prescriptions and in their tolerations. By them it would seem to be determined what serious vices may be overlooked, what minor weaknesses tabooed, and what personal failures ostracized. To them, therefore, must be owing much of the incompleteness of character which prevails; simply because men and women are not always courageous. It requires, sometimes, more moral courage to judge others justly, against a prevailing conventional code, than even to act ourselves, rightly, in defiance of public opinion. We dread so much being thought to have too low a standard, that we flee from the ghosts of our own mercies.

But, over this problem we may ponder long without solving it. Where will we find completeness of character? Is it in those around us? Wait till their lives are ended; for the golden bowl is not rounded and finished till the potter's hand is ready to break,—and, in breaking, to transfigure it;—nor is the pitcher filled full at the fountain till the silver cord is loosed that lets it fall, and he who had thirsted is made to drink of the pure water of life forever. Believing in the possibility of human sinlessness, we also believe in its very great difficulty and rarity; and, moreover, if it should exist near us, our imperfect faculties might not appreciate it; especially before (as Whittier wrote of Joseph Sturge)

> "Death has moulded to a calm completeness
> The statue of his life."

Do we find completeness of human character in history? Remember only some of the "follies of the wise and weakness of the great." Moses, forbidden, for his error of impatience and presumption, to enter the Promised Land. David, most favored, and yet not found worthy to build a temple to his God. Solomon, with all his wisdom, falling a splendid victim to abounding luxury. Peter, with his most treacherous denial. Even Paul, groaning under the thorn in his flesh. Luther, escaped from Papal dogmatism, himself at times a violent dogmatist. Calvin, a persecutor. Where shall we stop? Truly there is none good;—perfect, no, not one. Hard must it be, surely, to find perfection under so lofty and pure a standard as the Christian;—as Paul, for example, set it forth. "Though I bestow all my goods upon the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, I am nothing." We understand by this charity the perfection of Christian, Godlike love.

There is, then, after all, but one channel into which our thoughts, upon this theme, must inevitably come to flow. We long for perfection. Not the fairest beauty of face or form, though conceived in the imagination and caught by the hand of a Raphael, will content us. Not the strength of Hercules, nor the majesty of presence of the Olympian Jove. We must have spiritual beauty,—that is all glorious within. Said even Byron,—

> "O that the desert were my dwelling-place,
> With one fair spirit for my minister."

Is there such beauty, then? Is it a vain cry that comes up from every land and from all the ages,—and most clearly and loudly always from the truest and the most refined, —"Give us something that is perfect,—without fault—divine?" No; it has been once given;—and it lives for us forever. Christ is that perfection. In Him the mind discovers the ideal of its purest imagination; the heart an object of endless adoration and love. We may be satisfied, even in this world, when we awake and behold His likeness. Nor is this all. His perfection is ever redundant and all-sufficient. Away with all false ideals; away also, in His sight, with all devious and self supported pursuits after the true. No more, in any narrow sense, of mere self-culture. Instead, self-abnegation. We say with George Herbert's hymn:

"Lord, mend, or rather make us; one creation
Will not suffice our turn;
Except thou make us daily, we shall spurn
Our own salvation."

Only looking, with daily, all-embracing, prayerful scrutiny, into our motives, trains of thought, habits and actions,—that "every thought may be brought under subjection to the obedience of Christ:" so that He, at last, may become alone complete in us,—as we are, even now, or may be, if we will, by hope and through faith, "complete in Him."

THE SUEZ CANAL.

The oldest canals of which we have any record were those of Egypt. The mode of agriculture, by irrigation, no doubt first suggested the leading of the Nile waters away from the basin of that famous river. We have really little authentic knowledge of the occupations of the Egyptian thousands, though research, comparison and reasonable inference are supplying the gaps in knowledge caused by the neglect of historians to describe the lives of the common people. Among recent discoveries it is ascertained that the famous papyrus must have been a cultivated plant, and not a spontaneous growth of the Nile banks. And it must have grown in pools or trenches of stagnant water, since the Nile current would not have permitted its vegetation. This discovery, or inference, if correct, accounts for the disappearance of the plant which gave the name to paper, one of the prime necessaries of life, now furnished in quantities of which the Pharaohs never dreamed.

The early Egyptians were not a maritime people, and had, indeed, a horror of the sea, and an indisposition to seek foreign alliances and connections. But canals for irrigation were utilized as the routes of domestic intercourse; and they served the additional use of impeding the march of foreign armies across the country. It is common to speak of the present Suez canal as a restoration of the canal of Sesostris. But research places the old Suez canal at a date centuries later—say five to six hundred years before the Christian era. The project seems to have been entertained, but abandoned, for fear that the canal would open a highway for the ships of foreign "barbarians." It was not fully completed—to whatever stage of completion it may have reached—until the time of the Ptolemies. They, themselves foreigners, had none of the native fear of foreign incursions, but invited commerce with the world. Another "lion in the way" was the fear that the waters of the Red Sea, once let in, would drown the country. And this delusion has been perpetuated by writers, who, taking the impression for a fact, have imagined that the canal was in places literally built—being formed by embankments raised on either side of the bed of the waters. And this mode of construction was supposed to have accounted for so complete a disappearance of the old canal, that its very existence has been disputed. But the shifting sands of the desert, which have buried Egyptian pyramids and other structures, were quite sufficient to have obliterated the traces of a ditch.

The old canal did not connect the two seas, but the Nile with the Red Sea. It was not the work of the nations outside to make a route through Egypt, but a channel of domestic travel. Its western terminus was at Babaste on the Nile. And in all probability, the beginning of the work was in a canal from the Nile eastward to such a distance, for irrigation and transportation, that the after-idea occurred of constructing another canal from the Red Sea westward to meet it. And it is by no means certain that the two branches were connected. There was probably some land carriage in the middle of the route. It is worthy of notice that there was, at the time of the commencement of the present canal, a fresh water canal from the Nile, running eastward. This the French engineers have continued to a station on their works called Ismaila. It runs nearly at right angles with the Suez Canal, and by the erection of water works is made to distribute the water which, before the extension of this canal, it required three thousand camels and donkeys to transport for the sustenance of the laborers. An immense force is employed in the various departments of the present undertaking, which was commenced about ten years since. We do not hear of any extraordinary mortality among the laborers under the present contractors, but it is said that Necho, one of the Egyptian kings, "expended nearly one hundred and fifty thousand men in the work of excavating the original canal." All the wonderful appliances of modern art and science are employed in this triumph of modern skill, an enterprise more remarkable than all the pyramids. One of the most simple, and at the same time most serviceable, is a steam dredging machine, which combines the office also of a steam gun. Our readers have noticed the work of dredging machines in the Delaware and Schuylkill. Let them imagine the earth, when brought from the bottom, instead of being "dumped," driven by steam through a long tube, any distance desired, within two hundred feet, and they will understand how the canal is protected. A ridge is thus formed on each side of the canal, compact and firm, and in some places full fifty feet high. And thus the work is sheltered both from the constant need of repairs caused by drifting sand, and from the obliteration which has followed the work which cost the lives of the old Egyptian thousands. We need not say that no place has been found where the surface of the ground will serve for the bottom of the canal.

The route of the present Suez Canal was surveyed in 1846, by a commission composed of Robert Stevenson, on the part of England, M. Talabet on the part of France, and Signor Nezretti on the part of Austria. Nothing further than the survey was attempted. Eight years later, M. Ferdinand de Lesseps interested Mohammed Said in the enterprise. In 1858 the present company was formed, and the completion of their work is expected in October next. The canal is a hundred miles long, has an average depth of twenty-four feet, is three hundred feet wide at the top, and about half as wide at the bottom. In its route it connects four natural lakes, and a channel through each has to be deepened. At Port Said, on the Mediterranean, and at Suez, on the Red Sea, immense docks have been formed by the running out of jetties or piers. Every mechanical appliance suitable has been employed, and not a few have been originated. M. Lesseps and his colaborers have left their impress on the famous land, "shadowing with wings" to more purpose than all the Pharaohs, and Hermes Trismegistus besides.

Mr. E. Hepple Hall has travelled over the route, and interests himself in making its particulars known to the American public. Appleton's Journal of July 31 contains an article from his pen, with engraved illustrations. We observe that it is proposed in New York to form a company, of which Mr. Hall will be a member, to charter a steamer to make the voyage from New York, visiting Great Britain and Ireland, thence up the Mediterranean, reaching the Suez Canal at the time of the formal opening. Through the canal, down the Red Sea, across the Indian and Pacific Oceans, and home via San Francisco and the Pacific Railroad, is the route indicated. Cleopatra could offer to Antony no such treat as this, though she dissolved pearls by the pint. A company has been organized in New York, under a charter from the Legislature of that State, to establish a line of steamers between Norfolk and the Mediterranean ports, the end of the voyage being Port Said. Another line is proposed to connect Suez with the Pacific steamers at Hong Kong, China. Other similar lines, either by corporate or individual enterprise, will also probably be undertaken.—Public Ledger.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, NINTH MONTH 11, 1869.

"Unbecoming Behaviour."—At a Quarterly Meeting held very recently within the limits of Phila. Yearly Meeting, an exception was made in the answer to the first Query, owing to an individual who omitted the customary token of unity and of reverence to the Supreme Being in time of prayer. It is not as a compliment to any Friend publicly engaged to address the throne of Grace on behalf of the people, that the congregation rise and uncover the head, but as a token of adoration to the Divine Majesty thus addressed. But to withhold this mark of respect on account of any dislike or prejudice towards the person vocally engaged, is a sorrowful yielding to feelings which are not fruits of the Spirit. The Apostle Paul declares that "Charity," (by which word he means LOVE, in its fullest significance, both to God and man), "doth not behave itself unseemly," and we are elsewhere told that "God is not the author of confusion." The Church has long placed its mark of disapproval upon anything that shall thus obstruct pure worship, and the semi-annual answering of the Query whether "unbecoming behaviour" is avoided in religious meetings, induces an honest investigation in every congregation, and should arrest every tendency to violate the beautiful order inculcated by "the peaceable Spirit and wisdom of Jesus."

The Yearly Meeting for "East Jersey, West Jersey and Pennsylvania," held at Burlington in Seventh month, 1704, sent down to its subordinate meetings the following clause of discipline, which, having never been repealed, remains in force:

"Concerning any ministering Friends, not disowned by Friends as such, wee advise that our ancient testimony be strictly kept to against any who shall take upon him publickly to oppose any such Friend in his preaching or exhortation, or to keep on his hatt, or to shew any other publick dislike against him in time of prayer, &c. And if any so do, that they speedily be dealt with as disorderly persons, and testifyed against, unless they as publickly condemn the same."

A minute of Phila. Yearly Meeting in 1719, incorporated in the present printed Discipline, embodies the same rule in different words, prefacing it with the appropriate sentiment,—

"As the occasion of our religious meetings is solemn, a care should ever be maintained to guard against anything that would tend to disorder or confusion therein."

A similar admonition is contained in the Discipline of other Yearly Meetings: that of New York says:

"None are to oppose in a religious meeting a Friend when publicly speaking, whether he be an acknowledged Minister or not, whilst in unity as a member; nor, in time of prayer, keep on the hat, nor show any marked disapprobation."

An individual may doubt the proper qualification of a person who engages in vocal prayer. Let him bear his burden for the body's sake, which is the Church, and forbear any restive or unseemly deportment which would disturb the devotions of others whose hearts may be really lifted in prayer, and rather keep under an awful sense of the greatness and holiness of the One to whom supplication is made. At such a time let the mind be emptied of self, and a desire cherished that He who is the Head may order the assemblies of the people according to the counsel of His will, and that forward spirits may be restrained and reclaimed. In pity and tenderness an occasion may be sought to express the uneasiness to the one who has caused it, or to mention it to the elders, and leave the concern to the consideration and action of those appointed to watch over the ministry.

In the well-ordering of Society at large, religious as well as civil, it is essential that the individual should yield to the community a portion of his private right of action. In civil society it is not allowable for a person to take the law into his own hands. This, which is popularly called Lynch law, leads to evil, and is subversive of the general weal. Nor is it less so in religious matters. "Obey them that have the rule over you," said Paul, "and submit yourselves, for they watch for your souls as they that must give an account." And Peter emphatically exhorts: "Yea, all of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud and giveth grace unto the humble. Humble yourselves, therefore, under the mighty power of God . . . casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you."

The Yearly Meetings of Ohio and Iowa simultaneously opened on the 6th inst. Our dear friends Henry Binns and William Robinson, of England, who arrived in New York on the 24th ult., after a short tarriance in this city, proceeded to Oskaloosa, in Iowa. Our dear friends, Amos and Edith Griffith, have returned in safety from their foreign mission in time to be at their own Yearly Meeting. Trusting that both these annual assemblies, and those which are soon to follow them, may be held in the life, power and spirituality of the Gospel of Christ, and tend to the cementing of our fellow-professors as one united and harmonious people, we hope to be able to present our readers with a report of their proceedings.

An humble trust in the continued gracious presence and presidency of the Head of the Church in these gatherings of the people for the transaction of His work, is warranted by the experience of past years, when those who assembled in discouragement and fears, proved Him to be strength in weakness and a present help. And such help and strength we may humbly, yet confidently, look for, if a practical faith be observed in the great doctrine so precious to our religious Society, the influence of that Holy Spirit which our risen Saviour has given unto men. That Church will prosper in the Truth whose members dwell under this anointing, and all of whose expectation is from this Source. The language will apply to the Church and to the individual member: "To be spiritually minded is life." May such be the engagement and the experience of Friends everywhere. We look with intensity of interest toward the several approaching Yearly Meetings, at which many thousands of our members are expected to convene; fervently craving that they may be so gathered in the dear Redeemer's Name that His Presence in their midst, by His Spirit, may be a blessed certainty. Thus shall the promise be realized: "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children."

DROUTH AND FLOOD.—In the department of Correspondence will be found an affectiug statement, by E. Payson Hall, of the destitution caused in some parts of the South, by the failure of the corn crop, through drouth, and the great flood, by which an area of "about 12 by 27 miles" was devastated, at least one-third of the people of Rowan and Iredell counties being included among the sufferers—the injury by drouth being much more extensive, as indicated in the last No. of the Review. E. P. H. graphically depicts the blank dismay and almost despair of the freedmen. The claim upon a sympathy that shall be substantially evinced is clear and strong. We are permitted to state that contributions for the relief of the sufferers may be sent to Mary Ann Loyd, 1309 Filbert St., Philadelphia, or to Alice Lewis, 109 N. Tenth St.

THE WORKMAN THAT NEEDETH NOT TO BE ASHAMED.—Correspondents from various quarters express a warm approval of this instructive essay, which occupied some recent numbers of the Review. Others wish to be informed respecting the author. As we cannot reply personally to these several correspondents, we take this means of informing them that we know nothing about him,—not even his denominational belonging; but considering his treatise to be edifying, we advise those who have read it once to re-peruse it. Never mind who wrote it—ponder its truths.

MARRIED.

On the 4th of Third month, 1869, at Friends' Meeting-house, Damascus, Ohio, ROBERT T. CREW, of Short Creek, Ohio, to ANNA E. HOLE, of Damascus, Ohio.

DIED.

KELLY.—Of pulmonary consumption, on the 25th of Eighth mo., 1869, David C., son of Samuel and Mary Kelly, of Bloomingdale, Ind., in the 26th year of his age. He declared himself ready to depart, and his prospect was bright and glorious.

MICHENER.—On the 6th of Seventh month, 1869, after a lingering illness, Susannah P., wife of John Michener, and daughter of William and Catharine Pearson, aged nearly 52 years; a member of New Sharon Monthly Meeting. Her friends have the comforting trust that she was fully prepared for the change.

HORNER.—On the 25th of Fifth month, 1869, near Thorntown, Indiana, Joseph Horner, a member of Sugar Plain Monthly Meeting. This dear Friend moved from Warren Co., Ohio, to his late abode, when the country was quite new and society rude. He endured the hardships of the country, and settled a large family. He was upright and exemplary in all his dealings and intercourse with men. Later years found him concerned for himself and others, and though naturally of a modest and unassuming character, yet he often was constrained to speak a word in the name of Jesus. He experienced his last days to be his best days, and that he had his day's work done. As a shock fully ripe he was gathered into the heavenly garner.

CORRESPONDENCE.

From letters of Edward Payson Hall.

Salisbury, Rowan County, N. C., 6th mo. 16th, 1869.—"The most tremendous freshet that has passed over this country since the memorable flood of 1850, and in height equal to, while in extent of damage far surpassing that, is now bearing away indiscriminately the ripened wheat, the growing corn, and countless panels of fences, all along our numerous and sturdy water-courses. With blank dismay the freedman beholds his corn engulfed in wide waves, knowing alas! too well, that no more fence-rails or corn will be brought there till next spring. How many, very many sad souls this morning contemplate the ruin, would not be easy to estimate. It is to most of them as if they had not even planted or sowed, but had sat idle in their cabins for a whole twelvemonth. This is beyond dispute the direst calamity which has befallen our population since the war. No room is now left for doubt that more destitution and want will prevail next winter than ever before. And if such misfortunes did not fall more especially upon a class already unable to cope with their disadvantages, our regrets would be fewer and less prolonged.

"7th mo. 24th.—The flood carried away no dwellings; but it will hereafter render homeless many poor creatures whose employers otherwise might have permitted them to stay had they succeeded in making a crop. The credit of the freedmen is already so much injured by the ruin of the corn (which was his security for pay,) that the destitution is increasing rapidly. He cannot buy corn on credit now, as he could before. His horses are dying with hard fare, and sometimes entire starvation. His children are sick with the summer diseases incident to the climate, and the doctor is slow to ride for him when corn is washed away and drought prevails. He cannot work as he did—his heart sinks within him; and, worse than all, it is so hard to rouse him out of this lethargy of despair. But the ultimate and dreadful effect of the flood will be felt in the fall and winter. I find the cry of want increasing all around me.

"8th mo. 16*th.*—It has not rained to wet the ground since the 15th of 6th month, the date of the flood. We are literally burning up. The corn-fields, already so much injured that the yield must, even in the event of rain, be sadly diminished, seem destined to be parched and dried up entirely.

"I know families of freedmen who, under the present aspect of things, seem to have no more chance for bread than if they were in the midst of a wide and actual desert. To be more definite, I will describe the case of my own renters, who are very fair specimens of the condition of the greater part of the freedmen in this and adjoining counties at the present time. They had a fine growth of corn on twenty acres of creek-bottom previous to the flood; this was swept away. They replanted three several times, and have utterly failed to get a stand on all that twenty acres with all their labor of rebuilding fences and planting over and again. I have no idea that unless rain comes soon, a single bushel of corn will be made. The young corn withered away on the hot sand, on which no drop of rain lately fell." In describing the dry uplands, E. P. Hall states: "They were scorched by the sun until not only the corn, the potatoes, the garden vegetables, grass and weeds died, but great hardy trees in the woods were struck dead one after another; in some places forming an autumn landscape in the midst of summer—and that without frost."

"Blank dismay is now the habitual expression of these poor renters' faces; though they toil on at anything they can do, without stopping to grumble or complain." After speaking of assisting them, E. P. Hall says: "Now if I were to send them away to-morrow, they could not get another place in the country; and were my resources to fail, they would inevitably starve. Cheated out of everything they made in 1865, 1866 and 1867, they came to me in 1868 destitute of clothing and provisions. A great part of their time last year was occupied in building, clearing and fixing to live; their crop was consequently small. This spring they were making fine progress toward independence when the flood came, succeeded by this terrible drought."

A letter from E. P. Hall, dated 8th mo. 21st, says: "The drought continues fierce, unabated, alarming. There will be no extenuating the cry of the poor now."

Kickapoo Agency, 8th mo. 23*d.*—We had the very acceptable company of Thomas Wistar and Enoch Hoag last First-day. They attended an Indian meeting which was conducted with much gravity. Our friend T. Wistar spoke very feelingly to them through an interpreter. The presence of "the Great Spirit" was realized to bless. On Second-day morning we called a council of the chiefs. Our Friends laid before them our object in coming among them.

THE TOTAL ECLIPSE.

BY CHARLES WILLIAMS.

A total eclipse of the sun is so rare an event for any given portion of the earth, and a phenomenon of so impressive a character, that whenever it occurs in any civilized country, the path of the central shadow is thronged with thousands of eager observers. They come from the ranks of scholars, from the lovers of nature's finer features, and from all the more intelligent classes of society. Curiosity and love of the wonderful often prompt them to travel hundreds of miles, to see what few persons are ever permitted to witness more than once in a lifetime, and the great majority of the human race—perhaps ninety-nine hundredths—can never see.

The 7th of last month was a day that will live in the memory of this generation, of that portion of it at least which inhabits a belt of our country 140 miles in width, embracing the great bulk of Iowa, and extending from thence to the Atlantic coast; including large portions of Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky and the Carolinas. Over this broad belt of our thickly-peopled land swept the dark shadow of the moon in its rapid flight of forty-four miles in a single minute of time. The duration of total darkness, during which the body of the sun was covered, was very brief, in no place amounting to quite three and one-half minutes, and varying from that to a little over two minutes, along the central line of the eclipse.

Yet that brief period has given to thousands upon thousands of all classes of our population, from the highest to the lowest, a new experience of life, a new demonstration of the mysterious powers that lie locked up in nature's inscrutable arcana. It has left upon their minds impressions which, like the touch of Destiny in the old mythologies, can never be erased. It has touched them with emotions and feelings unknown before, and has opened up to them new fields of beauty and sublimity in nature's wonderful economy.

Partaking as I did of a full share of the curiosity that prompted so many of the lovers of nature to leave their homes and witness the great phenomenon, I joined the countless throng that poured from all our northern and eastern lands, and hasted to throw themselves on the destined path of the dark shadow, as the eventful day approached so long foretold in the prophetic annals of science. They declared that at a definite moment of that day, fixed with all the precision of mathematics, with all the certainty of an event already past, the moon should appear as a dark spot on the western edge of the sun, and, creeping slowly and gradually over its disk, should at a certain moment totally hide it from view, blotting it out from the heavens, and involving the whole visible face of nature in the shadow of a night that knew no parallel in the memory of any living observer:—a transient night, not of blackness and darkness, not for the repose of the weary or the reviving of exhausted nature, but a night of more than usual gloom, of fearful and awful obscurity, of sombre shadows, and of ill-defined and aimless terror:—to be quickly succeeded by the dawn of another transient day that should chase away the fancies and fears which that mysterious night had engendered, and restore to the landscape once more the full glory and beauty of that blessed light, for so brief a space withdrawn.

I have seen large eclipses before. I have seen the light of day fade and wane, as the blank body of the moon crept like a dark curtain over the sun, and let fall its ominous shadow, like the sadness of melancholy, over the fair face of nature. I have seen the landscape draped in the sombre hues of mourning as this wonderful veil fell on mountain and valley, on city and plain, but I can now declare that the general countenance of even a very large eclipse bears no more comparison to the night of the total shadow than does the twilight gloom of our quiet parlors to the darkness and terror of an approaching thunder-storm.

Having long cherished an intense desire to see the grandeur of a total eclipse, I could no more have consented to remain at home on that memorable day than I could to have lounged away the holy hour in that glorious evening when, a few short months ago, the Aurora was flashing from pole to pole, throwing up streamers that flew to the very zenith, to be there interwoven in a crown of surpassing glory;—flinging out its banners of crimson and purple, and anon of snowy fleecy white, that went floating away as the magnetic powers directed; and surging up its waves of ethereal light, that flashed and foamed to the upper heavens, and were lost in the deep expanse of night's unfathomable sky, like the waves on the ocean of human life, that roll in ceaseless succession and break in silence and gloom on the viewless shores of eternity:—no more than I could have lolled on my couch during that other night, even more impressive, when the meteors were flashing athwart the heavens, like sparkling fragments of brighter creations thickly strewn by the hand of God,—His fireworks for our pleasure and instruction, glowing with celestial beauty and radiant with unbounded glory. No: it seemed that the very necessities of my nature impelled me to that narrow strip of earth doomed to be swept, as science told me, by that dark cone of the Shadow of Death, that ever swings through space, blank, terrible and chill, behind the pale-faced moon.

When the sun goes out in dim eclipse,

"and, from behind the moon, Disastrous twilight sheds on half the nations," if it really, as the poet says,

"with fear of change

well may the common mind be pardoned for indulging in the deep emotions which those great events inspire, and that, too, without adopting the courtly dogma, that the monarch's mind is of necessity the finest or the strongest of its class.

In company with an intimate friend, I went to Louisville for the purpose of choosing a favorable place for viewing the eclipse, as near as circumstances would permit to the centre of the line of total darkness. After looking over several different localities, and balancing their advantages and defects, we selected a hill which overlooks the cities of New Albany, Ind., and Louisville, Ky., together with a large expanse of the valley of the Ohio river. A range of lofty hills shoots out from the river a few miles below the former city, and stretches far away to the north, bordering a beautiful plain that expands into a wide horizon almost at the limit of vision. Two spurs spring out from the parent range, and, projecting far into the plain, terminate in rather abrupt promontories perhaps two miles from New Albany.

On one of these high points a committee of a scientific society of the latter place had chosen their position. They cordially invited us to join them, and share the advantage of their instruments, and assist in their observations. A promiscuous crowd, however, was gathering around the enclosure, the company itself was large, and we preferred a lonely and retired place, where we could enjoy the solemnity of the hour, and observe the approach and progress of the eclipse without restraint, and be at liberty to note every feature that arrested our attention, untrammelled by any obligation to confine our notice to certain features. We accordingly retired to the corresponding point of the other hill, and found a situation that far exceeded our expectations. Indeed we came to the comfortable conclusion that no better could be found.

From our lofty position the two cities lay in full view to the east, respectively two and five miles distant, divided by the sparkling waters of the Ohio as they rolled and tumbled over the rapids which here drive navigation into the canal; the range of hills which bordered our view to the west became a lofty wall fringed with green curtains, and was lost in the northwestern horizon, and the wide plain lay between it and the river, where the hand of cultivation had strewn the choicest gems of the artist's skill,—beautiful homes interwoven with gardens and orchards, and fields of grain ripe for the harvest, or already cut and waiting to be garnered. Our horizon, from the west to the east, thus embraced a circuit of perhaps fifty miles, and within that space we commanded a view that combined in a peculiar manner the beauties of art and of nature, of city and of country, the rugged features of an upland region and the softened tone of the cultured plain.

Our chief object was to get a position where we could see the approach of the dark shadow as the moment of total darkness arrived, and its retreat when the first gleam of daylight peeped from behind the moon. This has been described as most impressively sublime,—as the chief feature in the grandeur of a total eclipse; and, like every other thing really great in itself, has been exaggerated by the buoyant fancy and swelling language of those who have witnessed whereof they speak. When seen from lofty points commanding extensive eastern and western views, it is said to appear like a general wreck of nature, those portions of the landscape successively involved in its sombre pall seeming to be falling away into chaos, and breaking down as the shadow rushes forward, as if "the besom of destruction" were indeed sweeping over the earth; and when the shadow strikes the observer, it is as if the chill of annihilation had instantly arrested the course of his emotions, and he stands in blank and speechless terror.

WHAT I SAW OF INDIAN ZOOLOGY.

I read with interest, in the "Leisure Hour" of last year, a series of papers on the Familiar Natural History of India. Being written by a naturalist, these papers contain much useful and curious information. It occurs to me, however, that some readers would like to hear the experience, not of a scientific observer, but of an ordinary resident.

I went out to India with the idea that it was the land of wild beasts. I well remember, when travelling up to Raneegunj from Calcutta by the railway, which at that time went no farther, how I kept looking out of the carriage window, expecting to see at least a few wolves, if not a tiger or boa-constrictor. As the day was cloudy, I think I did succeed in discovering one or two jackals, looking, as they ran away from the train, very like the almost-homely fox. But when I asked my fellow-travellers if I might hope to see the expected objects of terror, they only laughed at my ignorance, and told me how one might live for years in India without ever seeing anything of the kind. They said that they had, in fact, seen more of them in England by visiting the various zoological gardens.

After a long residence in all parts of North India as a missionary, I found this to be quite true. Once or twice, when out in tents, I have heard the distant cry of the wolf; I cannot remember ever to have seen one; and as for the other animals, I only heard of them from gentlemen who had gone up to a particular district, the Terai, or hill jungle, near the Himalaya, where, after some search, they had succeeded in disturbing and shooting a tiger or a bear. These two wild animals are well known by the natives; but I have seldom met any native who had ever heard of such a thing as a lion.

In the same way, when I have told them of the very large serpents whose stuffed skins I had seen in museums at home, the majority could hardly believe that such things existed in any part of the world, much less in India, while a few had heard of them under the Persian name of "dragon."

It is well, then, that people in England should know what their friends in North India are exposed to. In addition to the fearful heat and the dazzling glare of the burning sun, they have annoyances much more diminutive but not less real than the tiger or the boa-constrictor.

First, there is the scorpion, whose sting, as bad, perhaps, as that of ten hornets, is followed by the most agonizing pain for about twenty-four hours, and which sometimes causes the injured part to mortify if not properly treated. These repulsive-looking insects come into our houses chiefly during the rains, and nestle themselves under the rugs and mats, and run over our bath-rooms in a manner which makes it quite dangerous to move about. As for walking in stocking-feet in our bedrooms, we dare not think of it. Some of them take it into their heads to climb up on our doors, from which, when suddenly shut or opened, they sometimes fall off. I remember once a horrid creature fell in this way on my neck. The effort to keep my hand from rising to brush it off was most painful. The itching sensation and the dread of an immediate sting made my blood run cold. However, I fortunately had presence of mind enough to leave it alone till I had beckoned to a servant, who most cleverly, with one quick sweep of the hand, knocked it on to the ground, and then stamped it with his shoe.

Another scorpion found its way into the inside of my wife's soft sponge, leaving nothing but its sting exposed. During her short stay in India she had not happened to see one of these dreaded insects. What, then, was my horror when, coming into our room, I found her, after washing her face with the sponge, feeling at something which she described to me as "so hard and so sharp." I went over to look, and there was her finger on the very sting itself, which just then began slowly to move, for the creature was quite alive. But, as the native servants said, God gave her power over the scorpion that it could not hurt her. I took the sponge, saying it was some nasty insect, and, going outside the house, shook out the deadly, creeping thing, and killed it with a stick. It was about two inches long. Two hours after I told my wife what an escape she had had, and to this day we keep the sponge as a token of God's goodness to us on that occasion.

The scorpions are numerous in our gardens, and it is most wonderful how the poor native gardeners escape. They are constantly thrusting their hands into rat-holes and other places where such things are lying concealed. One day my native groom stooped down to fill up a hole in the earth which I had observed, and directed his attention to. He instantly started up with a bitter cry. He had been stung by a large black scorpion; while the gardener, who was near, told me that for thirty years he had been constantly putting his hand into such holes, and had never once been stung.

But this reminds me, as I walk about our pretty fruit-garden, I hear a little bird making an unnatural, gurgling noise. Looking round, I see it fluttering about three feet over the ground, and in a state of great excitement. I know at once by the well-known sound, that it is being fascinated by a snake. Calling aloud ("Koi-hai," or "Qui-hye") for my dark-colored and ever-watchful servants, I run with my stick, and with one blow just on the neck, disable a serpent about seven feet long. It is of the largest kind I have ever seen in their natural state. These are not poisonous; they sometimes, however, give a very severe blow with their tail. The dangerous kind are much smaller, from six inches to three feet long, and are not so common as the larger kind. These reptiles also at times come uninvited into our houses.

One morning, after a night of heavy rain, I was walking up and down one of my rooms reading an important letter, and, wishing for more light, I turned suddenly to open a Venetian door, outside which some natives were sitting. The shock brought down a little snake about a foot and a half long, and very poisonous, which must have been on the top of the door. It fell on my arm, and gliding round to my hand, felt so cold that I dashed it off to the ground with great force. The natives outside shouted out first that I had been poisoned, for they saw by its spots what a venomous snake it was. When, however, I quietly walked over to them, they said that by the power of God I had shaken off the serpent. Many who have been long in India become so accustomed to keep their eyes on the ground, for fear of treading on a snake, that they could not possibly advance on foot with their gaze on any object above the earth. The attempt to do so is just like trying to keep the eye from blinking.

There is another most disagreeable nuisance, experienced only by those who go out in tents or sleep under trees. It is the black, hairy caterpillar, called by the natives "Kamla." This it so very poisonous that if it only falls on any one, or if even a single hair touches the body in any part, it produces a most irritating rash, which spreads rapidly over the whole body. I did not believe this latter fact about a single hair till I had myself experienced it in the following way. One day I saw a small insect of this kind creeping across my verandah. Knowing well how they ought to be avoided, I got a bit of stick to push it away. I had killed it and got it to the edge when the stick broke, so I gave it one touch with my slipper. Immediately after I wiped the slipper carefully on a mat and examined it, to see there were none of the hairs sticking to it. I could see nothing of the kind; but one at least must have remained, though perhaps invisible, for a few days afterwards, having occasion hastily to change my clothes, some part of them touched the slipper, and then was drawn along my leg, and as it touched, the poisonous rash arose on the skin, and for several days I was almost helpless, finding relief only from constant applications of butter. How this homœopathic dose of poison acts on the system I leave for cleverer heads to find out.

The centipede is another most annoying insect. It sometimes creeps over the face and hands of a person lying asleep, who wakes up in the morning with a most painful itching, which gradually rises into a dangerous rash. Should the sleeper awake at the time and attempt to pull the insect off, it fixes its poisonous claws all the more tightly into the skin, and will scarce let go when touched by a red-hot iron. I have myself escaped this torture, but have often witnessed the sufferings of my friends.

There is another very small persecutor, which gives annoyance chiefly to ladies—the flying bug. This little insect, something like a diminutive beetle, comes flying into our rooms, during the rains, as soon as the lamps are lit, and drops on our plates and dishes, and even into our tumblers, leaving behind a very strong and disagreeable odor. It is sometimes almost amusing to observe the confusion caused by a few such little torturers at a dinner-party.

I was going to speak of mosquitoes and other minor zoological annoyances, but I have already said enough about what I may call the too familiar natural history of India. —Leisure Hour.

CLOUDS.

BY CHARLES A. WALTERS.

PART I.

March had passed,—March, chill and dreary,—
With his blasts of snow and rain;
And the fairy feet of April
Lightly pressed the verdant plain;
Lightly, as a dancing wavelet,
On the surface of the sea;
While behind her, gladsome Nature
Tuned her harp strings merrily.
And the modest violets, springing
From beneath her gentle tread,
Hailed their morn of resurrection
From the regions of the dead.
Phœbus, in the azure heavens,
Sat enthroned in kingly might,
All the realm of space illuming
With a cheerful, mellow light.
Yet, anon, his brightness vanished,
While some slowly passing cloud,
Hanging round its sombre drapery,
Folded him, as in a shroud—
Till again, his face appearing,
Brought to earth her former smile,
And the songsters of the forest
Chanted forth their notes the while.
Here and there, like silvery network,
On the blue-arched vault above,
Other clouds, of varied colors,
Helped to fill the heart with love:
Other clouds, of golden brightness,
Coming full before the sight,
Seemed as footsteps of the angels,
Printed there in waves of light.
Such the gentle poet, Wordsworth,
Prized all other clouds above,
Reading in their silent faces,
Volumes of unbounded love.
Then we asked ourselves the question,
"What are clouds—for what designed?
Do they furnish aught of wisdom
For the ever-searching mind?"
They to earth the gayest shadows
And the grandest glories show;
Rolling in the dark'ning tempest,
Or at evening bowing low.
Is there not resplendent beauty
Ever present in the skies,
Which, without the clouds appearing,
We are ever slow to prize?
Take the darkest cloud of summer,
Moving quickly on its way;
Rolling up athwart the heavens,
Shutting out the light of day;
While the forkéd lightning flashes,
And the heavy thunder roars,
Shaking earth, and driving ocean
Far upon her trembling shores.
If 'tis true that blessings brighten,— "Brighten as they take their flight,"—
How, when such a storm is over,
Will we hail again the light!—
How, by contrast, will the sunlight
Shed around a richer glow,
While the sky above will deepen
With a lovelier shade of blue!
Thus the clouds, though dark and gloomy,
Seeming messengers of wrath,
Leave a beam of beauty, floating
As a day-star in their path;
While the sky is rendered brighter
By the thickest-hanging cloud,
Earthward, too, a blessing hastens,
Guided by the hand of God.
Clouds are reservoirs of gladness,
Floating silent in the air,
And the earth, when parched and thirsty,
Oft receives a plenteous share,
Which the lowly shrubs inhaling,
And the lofty forest trees,
Open wide their folded leaflets
To the coolness of the breeze.
As the Israelites, when fainting,
To the serpent looked for aid,
And perceived the cure effectual
For the wounds which sin had made,—
So the plants, when dry and with'ring,
Seek the aid nought else can give
In the cloud above, which bids them
"Look with faith to it, and live."

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—European advices to the 6th inst. have been received.

GREAT BRITAIN.—The Marquis of Hartington, one of the Cabinet, in a recent speech at Sheffield, said that the task of the next session of Parliament would be the settlement of the Irish land question, and expressed a hope that it would be discussed with as little political feeling as possible, as it had never been made a party question, and statesmen of various opinions showed an honest disposition to grapple with the difficulties attending it.

The total amount to be paid by the government for the purchase of the telegraph lines will be nearly £7,000,000, (about $35,000,000), but the Post office officials estimate that the net income of the first year will pay 3½ per cent. on the cost, leaving some surplus; and the profit will probably increase in future. The principal immediate advantage, however, will be the additional facilities afforded for telegraphic communication with all parts of the country, as public accommodation, not profit, will be the main consideration. It is proposed at once to increase the number of places served by the telegraph from 1882 to 3376, with a greater proportional increase in the number of branch stations; furnishing an office for every 6000 of the population. The uniform rate of one shilling for 20 words for all distances, will be adopted at first, and this may probably be reduced hereafter.

IRELAND.—Cardinal Cullen, the head of the Romish hierarchy in Ireland, has issued a pastoral letter forbidding parents of that Church to send their children to National model schools, on pain of a deprivation of the "sacraments." The schools thus denounced are not sectarian, neither inculcating nor attacking the tenets of any particular denomination, and they furnish the only opportunity for literary instruction accessible to many of the Irish people. The Roman Catholic bishops have met in Dublin, and adopted resolutions demanding an exclusive Roman Catholic College endowment by the State, the division of the property of royal and endowed schools, the alteration of Queen's Colleges to denominational institutions, and a general land bill for Ireland.

France.—The Empress has given up her eastern tour, and returned to Paris after proceeding only to Ajaccio in Corsica, where it was announced that she was indisposed. Public uneasiness continued to be felt respecting the Emperor's health, although he was said to be improving, an impression being prevalent that the truth was concealed; but so far as appears, no immediate danger was apprehended.

The discussion of the senatus consultum commenced in the Senate on the 1st inst. Prince Napoleon, (the Emperor's cousin, son of Jerome Bonaparte,) made a speech, in which he declared his devotion to the Emperor and the Prince Imperial, and gave his complete adherence to the proposed reforms, adding a hope that they were but a beginning for others. At a subsequent session, he made another very liberal speech, urging additional reforms, including greater Ministerial responsibility. The Minister of the Interior protested against these views, and declared that they would never govern the Council while the present Ministers should retain the Emperor's confidence; but it was reported that the Emperor had expressed his approval of the ideas advanced by the Prince. The Senate, on the 4th, rejected, by a vote of 113 to 9, an amendment to the senatus consultum proposing liberal reforms in the constitution of the Senate. A dispatch of the 6th inst., announced that the Senate had adopted the document by a vote of 134 to 3.

Spain.—Don Carlos is said to have embarked at Guipuscoa for England, and to have abandoned for the present the attempt to provoke a rising in Spain.

Proceedings are to be commenced directly against seven bishops who were apprehended for disobeying government orders.

Austria.—The celebration of the 500th anniversary of the birth of John Huss, commenced at Prague on the 5th inst. A large number of strangers collected in that city, including many Russian Sclaves. The character of the celebration was rather political than religious, seeming to have an anti-German tendency.

Turkey.—The Sultan is said to have replied to the Viceroy of Egypt, by expressing satisfaction with his assurances of loyalty, but commanding him to sell or transfer to the Turkish government the iron-clad vessels and the arms ordered in Europe, to keep his forces within prescribed limits, abate taxation, publish his annual budget, and abstain from negotiations with foreign governments He is also said to have required of the Viceroy, in a second letter, that the latter shall contract no European loan without his sanction. The Viceroy is reported to have assented to this, and also to be about to visit Constantinople.

Domestic.—Jno. A. Rawlins, Secretary of War, died at Washington on the 6th inst., in his 39th year. He was a native of Illinois, and had been closely associated with the President during the rebellion, as a member, and in the latter part of the time the chief of his staff.

Attorney General Hoar, at the request of the late Secretary of War, furnished an opinion on the question whether the members of the Legislature and State officers elected in Virginia under the new Constitution, are required, before entering on their duties, to take the oath disclaiming any participation in the rebellion, (popularly known as the iron-clad oath.) He says that the parts of the Constitution adopted by the popular vote, if they shall be approved by Congress, will be the Constitution of Virginia, under which its officers must act, and by which their qualifications as well as duties will be determined. After Congress shall have approved the Constitution and admitted the State to representation, thus fully restoring it to the Union, no requirements can be imposed upon its officers other than may be required of other States. He is of opinion, therefore, that the oath in question is not to be required of the officers and Legislature elected under the new Constitution; but it was not intended by the act that such Legislature should exist and act, until reconstruction was completed, except for the limited and qualified purposes requsite to reconstruction. He agrees with Gen. Canby, commanding in Virginia, that under the reconstruction acts no officer or legislator can exercise his functions in the State, except so far as those acts provide, without taking the oath. The act of 1869 requires the Legislature to meet at a specified time, and a previous act requires it to act upon the 15th amendment as a preliminary to admission to representation in Congress. It may meet, organize and act on that amendment, but until Congress shall have approved the Constitution and the action under it, and restored the State, the Legislature is not entitled to transact any legislative business, if the test oath has not been required of the members, nor can any State officer elected assume his office without taking that oath, while the military government continues.

The "Western Pacific Railroad," completed on the 6th inst., makes a railroad connection of the eastern shore of the Bay of San Francisco with Sacramento, and therefore with the Central and Union Pacific roads, so that cars may travel continuously from that point to Philadelphia, New York and Boston.

The statement of the public debt for the 1st inst. showed a total amount of $2,626,653,870.31; cash, sinking fund and purchased bonds in the Treasury, $150,691,368.81; leaving a surplus of debt of $2,475,962,501.81. Decrease during the past month $5,601, 234.79, and since the 1st of Third month, $49,500,758.51. The bonds issued to the Pacific railroads amounted, with accrued interest unpaid, to $61,463,331.25, and the interest paid by the United States and not yet repaid by transportation of mails, &c., to $3,409,856.77.

A dispatch from Mount Washington, N. H., on the 31st ult., reported a heavy storm there, when ice formed two inches thick on the telegraph wires, and in some places the thermometer fell to 28°. Unusually cool weather for the season prevailed generally about that time.

On the 6th inst. a fearful disaster occurred in a coal mine at Plymouth, a few miles from Wilkesbarre, Pa. A "strike" of the miners had existed for nearly three months, and work had been resumed only that morning. About 10 A. M. a fire broke out near the bottom of the shaft, 327 feet deep, which formed the entrance to the mine, and the flames rushing up the shaft, consumed the buildings which covered it, and the hoisting apparatus, and cut off the only avenue of escape for 200 men who were at work below. Some hours elapsed before the fire could be extinguished, and then it was found that the poisonous gases made it impossible to enter the mine. An engine and fan were prepared as soon as possible, by which air was forced down, but up to the evening of the 7th, it had only been possible to penetrate a short distance, and none of the miners had been reached. The general belief was that all must inevitably have been suffocated.

THE AMERICAN SCIENTIFIC ASSOCIATION.

BY PROF. H. HARTSHORNE, M.D.

Some information concerning the annual convention held at Salem, Mass., from the 18th to the 25th of last month, may interest the readers of the Review. The Association convened is a large one, numbering several hundred members; of whom more than two hundred, from almost all parts, not only of the United States, but of North America, assembled this year. Nor were their contributions confined in origin to this continent; as two observers reported results of personal explorations in South America, one of long travels in China, and two of visits to islands of the Pacific. Many veterans in science, as Joseph Henry, L. Agassiz and B. Pierce were there; but with them scores of younger men, ably and zealously engaged in original inquiry in the different departments of science. No less than 137 "papers" were received and approved for presentation; of many of which only abstracts could be read in the sections into which the association was divided. It was pleasant to see the names of two women as authors of communications so recorded; Grace Anna Lewis, the accomplished ornithologist of our own State, and the lady so well known as the author of "Lincoln's Botany." Maria Mitchell, of Vassar College, has long been a member of the Association; and was present on the day set apart, in one section, for the discussion of the eclipse. At the house of a friend at Lynn (whose generous hospitality is well-known to Friends) it was very interesting to hear M. Mitchell's account of her visit to the West to observe the eclipse, in company with nine of her pupils; some of whom could only afford the journey after denying themselves luxuries for a year or more in anticipation. What zeal for science must have been inspired, that would lead to such a sacrifice and a journey of more than a thousand miles for a three minutes' experience!

Upon the eclipse, reports were made by several astronomers of different parties. Prof. Hough, of the Coast Survey, described what are called "Bailey's beads" as being seen on the advancing edge of the moon, five seconds before totality. His conjecture is, that they are due to the projection of mountains from the moon's surface. But his own description made them out (as it seemed to the writer) too regular for that explanation. Before the eclipse began, Prof. Hough saw a single peak from the moon cut the margin of the sun. Venus was seen by him eight minutes before totality. The number of "protuberances" was stated by Prof. Murray of the same party to have been seven. They were seen for nearly six minutes; one of them must have been many thousands of miles in extent; and through this largest one, or in it, three black spots or marks were visible for some seconds. A notch in the disk of the moon to the left of the great protuberance was also mentioned; and this observation was confirmed by Professor Joseph Moore, of Earlham College, who sat during part of the discussion by the present writer's side, recalling his experience of the eclipse in North Carolina.

The "corona" was described by all very much as Prof. Gummere has already clearly placed it before the readers of the "Review."

Four long diverging "prongs" were said to pass out to a distance from it, one of them being curved. These were called by one observer "petals," from their resemblance to those parts of a flower.

Spectroscopic observation was found by C. A. Young, of the Nautical Almanac party, to afford the most accurate mode of anticipating precisely the moment of contact or beginning of the eclipse. Prof. Pierce, of Cambridge, regarded this as an important astronomical improvement. By the spectroscope, also, coincidence of the bright lines of the corona with those of the aurora borealis was ascertained. No dark lines were found by Prof. Young in the spectrum of the corona.* Possibly some readers may not be familiar with these terms; although much has been said lately of the spectroscope in various places. A spectrum, then, is an image thrown by light, after its passage through a prism of glass or other transparent and refracting material. The rainbow is a magnificent spectrum, made by cloud-drops in the sky. Close study of a spectrum made with sun-light shows that across it are numerous black lines. If gas-light, or that of a candle, or even the very brilliant lime-light, be made to give a spectrum in like manner, only bright lines and no dark ones are produced. It is considered that the dark ones result from the arrest or disappearance of some rays or waves of light, corresponding with the presence of certain substances in the medium through which the light passes from its source. Sun-light, either direct or reflected from moon or planets, always has them. Spectra of the planetary nebulæ, and of the tails of comets, have bright lines only. Fixed stars have bright and dark lines, differing from the sun and from each other, "for one star differeth from another star in glory."

Now, what is the nature of the corona, or irregular halo, around the sun's edge, when its face is quite concealed from us by the moon? Is it an emanation of light from the sun, always in existence, but commonly unseen in the brightness of its more direct radiation? Is it a circumambient solar "photosphere" or light-atmosphere? Or, is it something belonging to our atmosphere only? Or, again, is it cosmic; neither solar nor terrestrial merely, but under causation affecting the intermediate spaces as well? When astronomers disagree, who shall decide? It is dangerous for one not an expert even to conjecture upon so obscure (though luminous) a subject. Yet, as no reader will be misled when no authority is claimed, we may indulge our thoughts for a moment upon it.

Looking at a large photograph of the "totality" exhibited at the meeting of the Association, my mind was affected in a way I cannot better express than in the words of Professor Gummere; it produced "a strong impression of intensely energetic action about and beyond the dark body that hid the sun from sight."* T. Bassnett, of Ottawa, urges that, if the corona belonged to the sun, it ought to be regular in form, and to diminish gradually from its margin outwards, which is not at all the case. Prof. Pierce, of Cambridge, remarked that the similarity of the causation of the corona to that of the aurora borealis is as probable as any other theory. It is, however, far from a complete explanation; as, beyond the opinion that the aurora is an electric light, whose seat and source are not very remote from our globe, I believe (although therein perhaps not fully informed) that the aurora itself has not yet been entirely explained.

The absence of dark lines from the spectrum of the corona, while the sun's ordinary spectrum has them, suggests at once the idea of its originating from a self-luminous vaporous source. But this is not entirely a certain deduction; as spectroscopic observation is yet so recent, that many things remain to be learned about it. Upon a merely "common sense" view, at which physicists may smile, it would appear that when the reflecting convex surface of the moon, which,* commonly, shines upon our globe, throws instead all its rays from us, then some of its outshining reflected rays must meet and interfere with, or modify, those of the sun which strike most directly upon its (the moon's) margin. Might not this alter the spectroscopic results? Is it not possible, moreover, that something like diffraction of light may occur with the most divergent of the rays of the sun? Diffraction has been known since (or before) the time of Newton, to occur, not only when light is made to pass in concentration through a small opening, but, under some circumstances, also by the bending of rays of light upon or over an edge. It may not be absurd, even, to think of some such explanation for Bailey's beads; that is, some reference of these to diffraction and interference of light.

But we are lingering too long over conjectures. More than a supposition must now be considered the theory of the existence of an ethereal medium, pervading all space and penetrating all gross matter, whose vibrations reach from us to the farthest fixed stars, and give to our apprehension the phenomena of light, heat, electricity and magnetism. One of the members (S. D. Tillman) of the Scientific Association, proposes that, in view of the use of the word ether to designate a common liquid, some other term should be chosen for the more subtle, universal fluid; and he suggests the single syllable eth as convenient and suitable.

* Janssen reported that, in the eclipse of 1868, the spectrum of the corona had no bright lines.—Prof. Stokes' Address, Brit. Association, 1869.

† Or, rather, the opposite of which.

The far-off influences which reach our globe and affect its nature, and thus, no doubt, also our bodies and our minds, are being brought every day more and more within human knowledge. Pliny E. Chase illustrated this in a paper presented to the Association, upon the influence of the planets (as well as the moon) upon our rain-fall and variations of temperature.

Many geological papers of great interest were read. In two of them (G. L. Vose and W. P. Blake) facts were given to show the effects of great compression upon solid masses, small or large. It was asserted that under very great pressure, masses of rock may, even without high heat, be made to flow as liquids do. Another (N. T. True) from a close and laborious study of the surface geology of Maine, educed the conclusion, that it need not have required so many thousands of years as some geologists suppose, to allow of the accomplishment of all the changes which have occurred since the "quaternary" period. This corresponds with the post-tertiary period of Dana's system, and immediately precedes the age of Man.

O. C. Marsh adduced evidence, from the discovery of the bones of the horse among those of men in Central America, that this animal was in use there long before the colonization of our continent from Europe. There is little reason to doubt, however, that the custom, and the very existence of the animal, must have disappeared before the coming of Columbus.

A. S. Bickmore gave a very interesting discourse, with a map, upon the distribution of coal, iron and other metals in China. There appears to be a very large and widely-spread series of coal beds in that empire; some anthracite, but mostly of the bituminous kind. Iron, too, is abundant. Tin probably is, although the locality of its mines was not ascertained. Gold is also produced, and other precious metals; but the natives exercise great secrecy about their mining regions, and the imperial government claims forty per cent. of the proceeds. The methods of mining, unlike many other arts in China, continue to be very primitive and imperfect. Sometimes the government has for a considerable time prohibited altogether the working of certain mines, for the purpose of preventing the gross demoralization so often attending the greedy pursuit of wealth.

J. Baker Edwards, of Montreal, contributed some new information concerning the trichina,—the small parasitic worm which infests the flesh of ill-kept swine, and whose entrance with food into the human system may be fatal. This seems to depend, however, very much on the number of the parasites; as remains of some of them have been found in the flesh of two or three per cent. of those dying in hospitals of various diseases. L. Agassiz added the remark that not only pork, but all our meats, and most especially fish, abound in minute parasites. All are agreed, however, that there is no danger of injury from any of them, provided that meat is always thoroughly cooked, that is, cooked through; not merely browned upon the surface and raw within. B. Waterhouse Hawkins, the English artist and naturalist, joined in a protest against raw (called rare) beef; which some people, he understood, quite mistakenly imagine to be commonly eaten in England.

Some excellent remarks were also made by B. W. Hawkins on popular education; urging the early training of the perceptive and observing powers by the study of nature. To aid this, public museums should be established everywhere. But, he added, it should be a condition that no label or name should ever be attached to an object, without being clearly and fully translated. It is pleasant to see the prejudice among scientific men against popularizing science giving way. Surely it is not necessary that science should be inaccurate in order to be made intelligible; although it is true that the gifts of profundity and facility of expression are rarely combined in one person.

Lastly, allusion may be made to some very curious experiments, showing to the members of the Association a novel application of the telegraph; the transmission of the beats of a human heart, or of the pulse at the wrist, to a distance. At the Lyceum Hall in Salem we counted, for more than a minute at a time, the pulse-beats of patients and others at the Boston hospital, fourteen miles from us. This was done by a combination of exquisite machinery, making the movement of the pulse or heart both audible and visible at once.

In these brief and imperfect notes of some of the topics dwelt upon at the meeting of the Association, it has been possible only to give a fragmentary view of its proceedings; whose publication in the coming year in a large volume will represent fairly the present teeming activity of the American scientific mind. That much good results from such conventions, under favorable circumstances, is to be believed. Not only mutual aid, but mutual sympathy and friendship, as "iron sharpeneth iron," are promoted. Hasty and extreme opinions are thus prevented or modified, and narrow intolerance, rendered almost impossible. Many of the ablest and best stored of living minds also evince, on these as on other occasions, their assurance that the "scientific spirit," whose aim is truth only, is altogether compatible with, and favorable to, that faith which listens, childlike, for those teachings which, hidden from the wise and prudent, are only "revealed unto babes."

From a Methodist Paper.

CONFORMING TO THE WORLD.

A professor of religion, whether male or female, following the fashions of the world, is a most pitiable object. Can we be transformed by the renewing of our minds and at the same time be conformed to the world? Can we seek the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit while we seek the outward adornings of ruffles and rings, curling the hair and costly apparel? Have we learned the art of being the disciples of Christ, without the pain of self-denial—without bearing the cross? Do not many congregations appear more like a flower garden than a Christian assembly? Do we not in conforming to the world seek the friendship of the world? And do we suppose that we can be the friends of the world, and not be the enemies of God?

But, in the finery and extravagance of dress, there is not only a sinful and deadly conformity to the world, but there is, of necessity, a shameful neglect of the most important Christian duties; for, while time and money are lavished in adorning the body, the hungry are not fed, the naked are not clothed, and the sick and prisoners are not visited. In the vain hope of pleasing the world, we gratify our pride, wound the cause of Christ, and excite the enemies of the cross to neglect and ridicule that religion, which, while it professes humility and meekness, presents little more than the garb of pride and ostentation.

Many are led astray by inquiring "What harm is there in this or that?" If you dress like the vain world, you must act like the world,—walk, talk and visit like the world. Is there no harm in all this? Rather inquire what good is there in this or that?

Is this the way to be holy? In this do I act like the disciple of Jesus Christ? Is this the way to be more crucified unto the world? In so doing do I walk in the path of self-denial,—in the way of the cross? The professors of religion should ever consider themselves under discipline for the kingdom of heaven, and should therefore do everything to the glory of God.

Simplicity should mark the followers of Christ and distinguish them from the world. The road of fashion may prove the way to death. Let us not be deceived; the world smiles, but it is only to betray. If we would be holy, if we would be Christians, we must be singular—we must be separate from sinners in our spirit, temper, words, actions and dress; we must not be conformed to the world: a marked distinction must be kept between them that love God and them that love Him not.

EXTRACTS FROM "A WEEK IN AN AQUARIUM."

By Malcolm Macéuen, in Lippincott's Magazine.

In combating that terrific vice, intemperance, which, worse than war orpestilence, threatens the destruction of our young generation, Dr. Parrish has wisely accepted the teaching of all experience, and starts with the fundamental principle that, as cures for inebriety, all cruelty, personal invective, physical violence, harsh treatment of whatever kind, are not only useless in themselves, but in the vast majority of cases they absolutely tend to increase and aggravate the very propensity they were intended to correct. He recognizes the much-ignored fact, that the only effective mentor to sermonize an inebriate should be found in the awakened conscience of that inebriate himself, roused to a sense of his own degradation and spurred by a determination to recover his own lost manliness; and that the only effective asylum for such an individual is one to which he comes voluntarily, seeking assistance to work out his own reformation. Now this is just exactly what Dr. Parrish's institution is intended for—to extend to fallen humanity a supporting crutch, not a belaboring cudgel. The doctor has gallantly developed this theory in the face of manifold opposition, with what success I leave the reader to determine.

"My establishment," he exclaimed, emphatically, "is no prison, no insane asylum: my young men are free to go where they please and when they please; nor do I wish them to feel under any restraint, except such as may be self-imposed by their own desire to benefit themselves and gratify me. If they wish to leave me, they are free to do so. I will not act the ignominious part of turnkey. While they stay with me I trust to their honor that they will not infringe any of my regulations." . . . . . .

During my residence at the Aquarium—or, to drop hyperbole and give the institution the title by which it is commonly known, the "Sanitarium"—I had full opportunity of seeing and judging the benefits resulting from the excellent system pursued there, until I wondered that men should ever have been so narrow-minded as to attempt the cure of intemperance by any other means, This institution is under the charge of an association of citizens chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, so recently as 1866, to purchase lands and erect buildings for the cure of intemperance. It is pleasant to turn from the long list of failures to effect the latter object that the records of so many other institutions furnish, to the cheering words of the president of the Citizens' Association, Dr. Joseph Parrish, embodied in his first annual report. Young as it is, the institution prospers already, for it is skilfully conducted, in accordance with that system which experience indicates as the only one offering a prospect of success.

"Men say,"—I quote the words of the report—"that drunkards are beyond hope, because they have tried everything within their reach and have been unsuccessful; but this does not prove that because a jail, an almshouse, an asylum for the insane, a change of residence or travel, has been unsuccessful, everything else will be. It only proves that the means that were tried in the particular cases were not successful, and probably because they were not the best means. If there is truth in humanity, in science, in religion, there is truth in the declaration that a large proportion of cases may be cured. We are an association for the purpose of strengthening a class who need strength, and of saving from additional shame those who are too often classed as criminals, by throwing around them the allurements of a domestic retreat and the refinements of elevated society, that they may be relieved from a condition for which they are not always directly responsible."

To exemplify the pleasant cordiality existing between the young men and the doctor, I should like to relate one or two occurrences that came under my own observation. On one occasion an ex-inebriate felt somewhat disposed to indulge his appetite for stimulants. It would have been no hard matter for him to have gone off quietly and found a place where he could gratify his desire: this, I must in candor admit, had been sometimes done, but very rarely—so rarely as to afford an additional argument in favor of the lenient system pursued at the Sanitarium. During my short stay there I saw or knew of no attempt at any such manœuvre. The young man went to the doctor and told him that he would like to have a drink, just as he would have gone to any other friend. Now, what did the doctor do? Or, rather, what did he not do? He did not want to refuse the young man's request, and yet did not deem it advisable to grant it. To have followed the old example of many people, and taken advantage of the opportunity to deliver a long-drawn lecture on the glory of total abstinence and the abomination of intoxication, would have been, under the circumstances, equally stupid and inexpedient: the young man would probably have gone off, irritated, to the nearest grog-shop he could find, to poison himself with the "kill-me-quick" generally dispensed at such places. The doctor, with that tact which eminently fits him for the position he holds, made the young man refuse himself and deliver to himself his own moral lecture. Drawing the key of the liquor-closet from his pocket, he put it on the table before the young man.

"There," said he, "is the key: you may take it and get a drink if you wish to; but before you do so, as I am granting you a favor, grant me one in return. I ask you to let that key remain on the table where it is for fifteen minutes. If, at the end of that time, after sober consideration, you think it would be beneficial to you to take a drink, go and get one."

The young man thought a moment, and went away without taking the drink, while the doctor returned the key to his pocket, having not only gained his point, but—what was of far more importance—having retained the young man's confidence and friendship. . . . . .

It should be borne in mind that in dealing with his guests the doctor had often not only to divert their desire to drink, thus insensibly, by cultivating a fondness for some harmless occupation, but that he was obliged, in very many instances, to contend with the pernicious effects of ignorance and maltreatment on the part of others. Young men came to him not sick, often not intoxicated—nor even particularly desirous to become so when they found that no harsh measures were employed to prevent them—but simply with their hearts frozen by the misjudged cruelty with which they had been treated elsewhere. Ah! how soon they thawed and warmed beneath sunshine! If I were asked in what the wonderful treatment at the Sanitarium consisted, I might answer that it consisted as much in the absence of maltreatment as in anything else. The young men were treated as sensible, intellectual beings, not as social outcasts, at whom the ultra-righteous might pleasantly throw stones; and if they were not weaned from their bad habit all at once, they were at least not driven to it by harsh and unchristian comment. Woe to any temperance lecturer that had tried his eloquence among us! It was held that an unsuccessful attempt at reformation should no more be sneered at as a failure, or as an evidence that no future attempt would be successful, than want of success at the beginning of any other undertaking. The child totters and falls many times before it learns to walk; the musician must practice long and wearily to acquire facility of hand and voice; nor, if a man fell overboard and were drowned, would the bystanders be justified in concluding that it had been impossible for that man to learn to swim, but simply that, from some cause or other, he had not learned. On the contrary, an unsuccessful attempt to reform should be hailed as evidence of a desire to do right (half, ay, two-thirds of the battle!) and as a signal of encouragement to try again, and again and again if necessary. . . . . .

The regulations there, as far as I could discover, amounted to these: We were requested not to drink intoxicating liquor, and not to take any very long trip away from the establishment (for instance, a trip to Philadelphia or Baltimore) without informing the doctor. On one occasion I came up and spent a day in Philadelphia. This was all the restraint, if restraint it could be called—we certainly did not feel it as such—that the doctor sought to exercise. He did not want men to come there under the influence of liquor: he wanted them to come there to avoid thus disgracing themselves, and his little establishment could not accommodate half the applicants who were desirous of availing themselves of his treatment. . . . . .

THE TOTAL ECLIPSE.

BY CHARLES WILLIAMS.

Something of this sublime effect might be produced if the dark shadow were as sharply and accurately defined as that of a cloud floating over the sky, for the darkness would then be absolute and total, and those objects once involved would be utterly invisible; hence it would appear like the advent of universal ruin,—the rush of final destruction. But it is easily seen that this must in most cases be a great exaggeration, for the same cause that makes our morning and evening twilight—the refractive power of the atmosphere—breaks up the outskirts of this dark shadow, and softens the transition from even the dim light given by the last slender filament of the sun's disk, to the total obscurity and absolute blackness of the central line of darkness.

This refraction will vary greatly according to the altitude of the sun above the horizon, and other circumstances. Under the most favorable conditions, and especially where the eclipse is central at noon, in the low latitudes near the equator, with the moon in her perigee, and the sun in his aphelion, the darkness may be that of midnight, and the transition so sudden as to give somewhat of the appearance above described.

The time of first contact for this place was given as 4.24 P.M. After selecting our location, we were busily engaged in cleaning the lenses of our telescope and making other preparatory arrangements; and having completed everything to our satisfaction, we looked at our watches, and behold it was 22 minutes past 4. A simultaneous exclamation burst from our lips that the time was at hand. Springing to our feet, we hurried to the spot selected for observation, and hastily arranging the focus of our faithful little telescope, caught a glimpse of the sun's broad disk. It was full and round—no break in its convex line.

Glancing again at our watches, it was the precise time for the first contact. Again the telescope was pointed to the sun, and a careful observation of its western edge revealed a break in its circular form. There it was—that punctual moon! True to the predicted time, true to the predicted moment, she was throwing her dark body on the sun's dazzling orb. As we were not provided with delicate instruments, and were making social, and not scientific observations, it was not to be expected that we would detect the first instantanous contact—the precise moment when the eclipse began. This was reserved for minds of greater calibre, supplied with more elaborate preparations. It was ours only to watch the more obvious phenomena as they appeared.

What a feeling of triumph, what a thrill of exultation came bounding up in our bosoms, as the moon made its appearance on the body of the sun! The prophetic eye of science, glancing through the long vista of intervening centuries, had dispelled the fogs of time, had scattered the mists of doubt, and, aided by the mighty powers of our sublime analysis, had seen at this very moment, in the visions of the future, in the confidence of faith, this first slight break in the outline of the sun; had seen the shadows darken into night, and a fleeting day again break forth to cheer the earth before he sought his accustomed rest, and gave the world to the silence and darkness of night's solemn hours.

How many thousands of people, relying in unshaken confidence on the accuracy of the prediction, had concentrated themselves on the line of the central shadow!—and yet, what an incessant tide of astonishment and admiration did the first contact of the two orbs carry with it, as it sped on in its rapid career over the regions where Science dwelt upon her watch-tower. What a surging tide of terror swept across our globe from Siberia to Carolina, as the dark shadow flung its sombre gloom across our northern hemisphere;—of terror, wild and frantic in the outset, where men were sunk in the depths of ignorance; but calm, subdued and indefinite as it approached the evening shades, where the lamp of Science dispelled the darkness of superstition, and illumined the great phenomenon with a radiance all its own.

The various phases of the eclipse were the same along the line of total darkness, except during a few minutes, as at places moderately distant on either side;—the same gloom, the same strange countenance of the day, the same singular appearance of vegetation, the same mysterious horizon. As the dark shadow approached, all these phenomena were intensified;—the gloom deepened; the day became more spectral; heavy lines of saffron-colored vapors, fringed with faint halos of indefinable colors, formed in the atmosphere at a considerable distance on either side of the sun; the cities before us gradually blended with the surrounding landscape, and a universal uproar arose at once from their populous streets, the shoutings of human beings, the howling of dogs, and a confused medley of discordant sounds; the slender crescent of the sun steadily waned; the light rapidly faded; and soon the cry was raised, "It comes." The dark shadow was seen sweeping over the distant hills, and, rushing forward with terrific velocity, fell upon us like a mantle of darkness; the sun was blotted from the heavens; the stars leaped forth from their hiding places; we stood enveloped in the shades of that mysterious cone of night; and all was silent as a grave; the distant uproar of the startled cities was hushed as the solemn awe of that impressive moment fell like a spell of enchantment upon them; and the world to us was shrouded in night's gloomy pall; a night of strange and wonderful appearance, sad, sombre, dim and spectral.

But now opened a most beautiful scene—the sun, or rather the moon, enveloped in that corona of light, which has ever been the admiration of all who have beheld it. The moon now seemed like a dark, dingy, copper-colored blot upon the sky, yet glowing with a lustre that no metallic tints can emulate; brighter, of course, towards the circumference, and deepening into denser hues at the centre. She was encircled with a halo of unutterable beauty; the light flashing and glowing beyond her disk, in streams that formed a thickly-woven crown of glory, growing fainter and fainter until it blended with the common azure of the sky. At the lower edge a flame-like projection, bright, but not dazzling, shot downward in a rounded point. Shortly before the sun reappeared, a similar point was seen on the western edge, and almost at the last moment of total darkness, a string of bright, bead-like sparkles sprang out on the margin of the moon. Then the western edge of the sun gleamed out in in full splendor; the dark shadow was drawing hastily to the eastward; a dawn, as of an evening sunrise, a second morning, flushed the face of reviving nature; a universal shout went up from the streets and lanes of the astonished cities; and that brief night had passed away,—a night which few had ever seen before, and few should ever see again.

The experience of that fleeting moment is deep, and permanent, and precious. It opened up a scene of wonder I had never realized before, and removed the veil from one of nature's finest panoramas. The rush of the dark shadow, though grand and awful, was less so than I had expected. It came upon us not like the irresistible sweep of Destiny, but with a gradual, though very rapid thickening of the twilight veil in which we were enshrouded. In my anxiety to lose no important feature of the eventful moment, I perhaps did not watch any one class of phenomena with that intense scrutiny which the curious would demand. In a rapid glance around the sky I saw several stars, among which were Venus, Mercury and Saturn. I had with me a small pocket Testament, and could read it with some difficulty during the total darkness; the separate buildings of the cities could be distinguished; our countenances, though pale and livid, wore nothing of that spectral hue so often described; the horizon, though perhaps somewhat contracted, was clearly and sharply defined; the sky was veiled in a mourning shroud, as though the pall was spread over nature's bier; and those faint, but heavy lines, which no doubt were caused by the contact of the dark cone with the stronger light of the outer air, sped rapidly on to the eastward, as the advancing light of the coming day chased away those pallid shadows that had fallen on our globe.

Were I called upon to select that portion of my life which has left the richest inheritance of thought and feeling in my communion with nature, I should name those few brief moments during which it was my privilege to see the sun go out in dim eclipse; to see the moon enveloped in that glorious corona, to which all earthly gems are pale and tarnished; to see the face of nature shrouded beneath the wing of that eternal night that dwells behind the moon; and to see the first bright glimpse of returning day, as the sun looked out again from his private chambers in the sky, to cheer the landscape ere it nestled down in the deep repose of night.

During the evening, an intelligent lady friend, in speaking of the approach of total darkness, said "It seemed as if God himself was coming." The expression was peculiarly fine. I have seldom felt myself more immediately in the presence of the Deity, than at that impressive hour. So far as human vision is concerned, he "dwells in darkness from excess of glory."

We watched the progress of the eclipse as it was passing off, with close attention, until the moon again merely touched the eastern edge of the sun, and at the moment of last contact he was restored to his wonted brilliancy and lustre; then turned away from the spot which is henceforth associated with our fondest memories of the past, and retraced our steps to the populous cities, to mingle once more with the throng of our fellow-men, but not to lose the deep impressions of that hour of hallowed communion with nature in her loftiest moods.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, NINTH MONTH 18, 1869.

Popular inaccuracy respecting Friends.

"It is strange how little most people know of the principles and practices of the Society of Friends, and how much of what they think they know is pure misunderstanding."

With these true words an essayist in The Spectator commences an article, and to an equivocal extent he establishes a character for accuracy by writing a paper to which his own charge of inaccuracy will apply. Rarely do we find an outside exposition of our Society and its principles, which, to a Friend, does not appear to be caricature, even when the writer has intended to be just—perhaps to be complimentary. The accidents of the Society are confounded with its essential principles. The importance attached by those simple-minded Christians, George Fox and his associates, to simplicity, and their fear of all that should subordinate spirituality to carnality and worldliness, prevented variation of costume with the changing modes. Had a different style of dress prevailed in their day, that style would, by the mere avoidance of useless changes, have been substantially perpetuated. It is possible to place a false stress upon sumptuary regulations—and it were an unfounded error to say that the first Friends attempted to establish a dress pattern. Agreeing together in carrying out the idea of Christian simplicity, a large degree of similarity has resulted as a matter of course, and, in connection with this, many have enjoyed privileges and preservation. From what fantastic modes —from what tyranny of fashion—is the young Friend exempted! Without, as it would seem, an appreciation of our position in this respect, the essayist, with an air of great intended candor, concedes that "it was not so much the Quakers' mission to uphold a formal eccentricity, as to bear witness to an essential truth." What was, and what is their mission? It was no eccentricity, and there was no nonsense mixed with it. They found the great fact of the Christian dispensation ignored:—the immediate presence, government and teaching of Christ, in his Church and in the hearts of his disciples by his Spirit. This is his unspeakable gift, consequent upon his meritorious, atoning death as our Substitute and Redeemer. He paid by that sacrificial death our necessary ransom, and made possible the salvation of every man, woman and child in all the course of the ages. The mission of the Friends was to draw out to general recognition and adoption this doctrine, which was buried and obscured by traditions, inventions, formularies and dogmas. To them there was awful impressiveness and significance in our Saviour's words: "God is a Spirit, and they who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." "The Father seeketh such to worship him." This mission is not ended. Their cardinal principle shows the safe guidance of him who is the Way, the Truth and the Life, and it teaches the mode of access to the place of prayer. It leads the reverent soul to the footstool of the throne, holds it in waiting till the King's sceptre is extended, and then gives utterance in prayer that shall be in accordance with the mind of the Spirit.

Our writer says, with an intent of concession, "As a matter of fact the meeting-houses are very rarely the scene of any grotesque exhibition"—(those who can speak from knowledge of our meetings would be puzzled to find even occasional exhibitions of the grotesque) —"and," he continues, "the sect is not extinct. It is, on the contrary, very slightly increasing in numbers, or was so a year or two ago. There are now about thirteen thousand members."* The readers of the Review know that in various parts the Society's membership is very largely increasing. As nearly as we can compute, it is about eighty thousand of orthodox Friends. Their strength, however, does not consist in numbers. A faithful upholding of the standard is required to make the mission successful. This may be done by a few: it will be more effectually done by many if all are true to their calling. The exaltation of the principle is needed by the world, and we desire never to see it compromised or modified.

Ohio Yearly Meeting opened at Mount Pleasant on Second-day, the 6th inst. The Meeting for Ministers and Elders is represented to have been a season of Divine favor, in which a lively concern prevailed that those composing that body, being set forth as examples to the flock, should be united with each other in Him who is the Head, and faithful to their high calling, not ashamed of the cross of Christ, but meekly and in His preserving fear endeavoring to lead others into the strong tower of his Name. Edith Griffith returned the certificate granted her for foreign travel, with satisfactory endorsement respecting her service in the ministry of the Word. On First-day the gospel was largely preached to a full house. The doctrine of the atonement was impressively proclaimed, and also the necessity for each individual to know certainly that he has passed from death unto life. This is only experienced in connection with unfeigned love to the brethren, and it is a plain Scriptural truth that no one whose spirit is the reverse of love hath eternal life abiding in him. The consideration thus set forth under the anointing influence which was poured out, was calculated to induce all who claim to be members of Christ to seek to be perfected in that oneness in Him which would effectually exclude all schisms in the body. In the evening, the Presbyterian and Methodist houses of worship being kindly offered, both were occupied by large and favored meetings.

On the opening of the Yearly Meeting on Second-day a precious solemnity reigned, and the Spirit of supplication found utterance in a prayer for gracious preservation and help during the different sittings.

Adrian Quarterly Meeting, embracing the whole State of Michigan, presented its request to be received as a component part of this Yearly Meeting, together with a minute from New York Yearly Meeting consenting to the transfer. A kind welcome was extended and Adrian Friends were so incorporated.

Credentials were produced by the following ministers in attendance from other parts: From Baltimore Y. M., Deborah C. Thomas. From Western Y.M., Aaron Cosand. From Indiana Y. M., Miriam Hough, Sarah Woodard, Eli Cook and Robert W. Douglas. Minutes as companions to ministers were presented by Maria Willitts, Henry Jones, and Cornelius Woodard. Several were present without minutes, of whom we can only name John Henry Douglas and Harriet Steer, both ministers of Indiana Y. M.

Epistles were received from all the Yearly Meetings in unity, except the one from Iowa, which had not come to hand. Much comfort was expressed on hearing the London General Epistle, and a reprint was ordered of 1300 copies. The proceedings, so far as heard from, were conducted with harmony and love, and under a precious sense of the favor and presidency of Him who is Head over all things to His Church.

Iowa Yearly Meeting commenced with public meetings for Divine worship on First-day morning, the 5th inst., in the two ample rooms, both of which were crowded. Our correspondent writes: "Seldom if ever have we heard a fuller message of gospel love." In both meetings the great theme dwelt upon was Christ Jesus our only Saviour. In the P. M., both rooms were again filled, and a large meeting at New Sharon, ten miles distant, also an additional meeting out of doors. In the evening, meetings were held in Oskaloosa in four different houses. The First and Second Methodist Churches, and the Congregational Church, kindly tendered their houses of worship, and Friends accepted and occupied them. The two beloved European ambassadors were acceptably engaged in a lively ministry in the meetings held on that day. A correspondent says: "Our dear English Friends were greatly favored to preach the word in the demonstration of the Spirit, with such peculiar tenderness and humility, that many hearts were contrited, and, in the language of one of our dear young Friends, were fed. D. Hunt, W. H. Chase and others were also engaged, and in the restraining power, which evidently attended, we could feel that the prayers of many had been answered".

"The Meeting of Ministers and Elders on Seventh-day gathered under a peculiarly sweet solemnity." It was very interesting to witness the pouring in of the tribes from beyond the wide prairies and from every point of the compass, long trains of vehicles of diverse patterns passing literally through the water, and over roads impassable the day before, owing to the swollen floods. The meeting was large, unexpectedly so, notwithstanding the great difficulty of travel, some routes being impracticable.

On Second-day the meeting for business opened, a solemn quiet reigning, which was broken by the voice of fervent prayer for preserving and assisting grace. Credentials were read for the following ministers of other Yearly Meetings who were present in the love of the gospel. From London Y. M., William Robinson and Henry Binns. From New York Y. M., Wm. Henry Chase and Daniel Haviland. From Ohio Y. M., Asa C. Tuttle and Ruth Lloyd. From Indiana Y. M., Jehu Jessup, Sarah Symons, Sarah A. Linton, Lydia M. Chase, Esther E. Frame. From Western Y. M., David J. McMillan, Amos Kenworthy, Mary H. Rogers, Rufus B. King. (The Friend last named is a young man who was a conscript in the Rebel army. He received the Truth, and is now a recorded minister.) Minutes were also read for a number of strangers not ministers. Stafford Allen, an Elder from London, was acceptably present. Epistles were read from the corresponding Yearly Meetings, (excepting North Carolina,) eliciting remarks of deep interest, and introducing a fresh sense of the preciousness of the bond of Christian fellowship. The General Epistle of London received the appreciative welcome which its valuable contents merit, and 2500 copies were ordered for distribution. Further particulars must be deferred.

"A Week in an Aquarium."—Under this facetious caption, a writer in Lippincott's Magazine describes the Institution at Media, Pa., for the reformation of inebriates. As intemperance is one of the greatest evils of our land, and the parent of a large proportion of the social, moral, economical and political obstructions to the well-being of individuals and of the masses, an establishment aiming at its cure, and conducted by an undoubted philanthropist of known tact, sagacity and experience, has a good claim upon so much of popular interest and confidence as shall insure to it a fair trial. We all know at what immense pecuniary outlay the submarine telegraph, after disappointments and failures which might have induced utter despair, was brought eventually to a complete success. And now, who grudges the expended millions? Yet that enterprise, brilliant as it must be regarded, dwarfs when compared in importance with a remedy for intemperance.

A true perception of the danger, with resoluteness in the right, and Christian and persistent self-denial, will prevent the drunkard's appetite. Prevention, to obviate the need of a cure, is of unspeakable importance, and should be kept in view in all parental care and training, and in the whole domestic economy. The teacher, the preacher, the law-giver, should wear about his heart an intense sense of the importance of this. The ancients wore as an amulet the Orient Amethyst as a spell against intemperance. The more enlightened moderns find a sufficient preventive spell in total abstinence. No one will become a drunkard who always abstains from everything that can intoxicate. The decanter may exhibit before him its "sparkling bead,"—the liquor may show itself "red in the cup,"—but it will not pour itself down his throat. If he never taste it, it has no intoxication for him.

But when the appetite of the drunkard has been formed, the case is one of great difficulty, and deserves the sympathy and the protective care of society. It cannot be cured except by entire abstinence, and as the moral power has been weakened by indulgence, and as a craving has ensued which is in itself a disease, it is with many persons (unless aided by the abounding grace of God,) next to impossible, whilst old associations and temptations surround, to practice persistent abstinence. The enemy of souls adapts temptations to the temperament and taste of the one whom he would draw to ruin. A fascinating boon companion takes his arm, and wiles him to scenes where watchfulness unto prayer will be needed to enable him to stand—lovely woman invites him, with a smile which it is hard to think ensnaring, to sip of the sparkling wine-cup. In his daily walks he encounters the drinking saloon with his old associates standing before the door. Where is his Orient Amethyst? Will he have the moral heroism to pursue his way? Then victory will sit upon his brow! If he enter the portal, his weeks or months of self-denial are wasted. If he is to be saved from the drunkard's doom, he must begin anew, and win again all the ground he has lost. Is there no Christian brother, no Deacon Grant to rescue him and to put into his mouth the words of Micah: "Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy: when I fall I shall arise; when I sit in darkness the Lord shall be a light unto me." For such a case as this the Sanitarium is intended. Remove the irresistible surroundings. Place temptation afar. Give him the incentives to Christian self-denial and manly self-respect.

To familiarize the reader with the object and character of the Sanitarium (or, as a writer who had been previously too indifferent to the virtues of cold water playfully styles it, the Aquarium,) a few extracts are given on another page from the essay, which is too long to copy entire.

Man in Genesis and in Geology. By Joseph P. Thompson, D.D., LL.D. New York, S. R. Wells. Pp. 149.—The words of Solomon—"Of making many books there is no end"—are not only true in a general sense, but may be quoted in special reference to the Mosaic and the geologic history of the origin of our planet and the first traces of man upon it. We may expect volume upon volume, rash, presumptuous, superficial or profound,—and when an author steps forth, his name fortified with D.D., LL.D., we shall not expect to surrender at discretion, and adopt all his dogmas or deductions,

"The total grist, unsifted, husks and all."

The volume upon our table embraces a highly interesting range of thought—"the Biblical account of Man's Creation tested by Scientific Theories of his origin and antiquity." It consists of seven lectures, suggestive and instructive. The prudent reader will peruse them with caution, judge for himself as he goes along, dissent occasionally from the writer, and rise from the perusal the better prepared to encounter the next treatise upon similar topics. The subjects treated of have given rise to much unprofitable speculation by which counsel has been darkened and faith unsettled, yet which are full of interest, and must from age to age engage the research of thinking men.

Dr. Thompson says:

"A sound Theology looks upon Nature as the handiwork of God, and while it accepts a supernatural Revelation upon evidence peculiar to itself, it accepts also every established fact of the physical universe as equally of Divine origin and authority. Hence the devout inquirer after truth will be bent,—not upon devising some compromise between Science and the Bible as presumably at variance,—but upon ascertaining the exact facts of Nature, as a portion of God's testimony concerning Himself, and the precise meaning of the Bible according to legitimate principles of interpretation. When each class of declarations is fairly brought out by its own methods, if there is a seeming discrepancy, neither will be set aside as of inferior authority, but either some error of observation, induction, or interpretation will be suspected; or while both forms of testimony are accredited, the decision of the case will be held in abeyance, until a more advanced knowledge shall reconcile them from some higher plane, where the harmonies of all Science, physical and metaphysical, and of all Revelation, the secondary and the supernatural, shall interblend without confusion or mistake."

From such a point of view, it is claimed, this book has been written, and, applying the critical tests of modern philology, it aims "to suggest certain principles of adjustment between the record of Nature and the record of the Bible, without violence to the spirit of either."

The lectures are enriched with numerous quotable passages, of which some future use may be made: at present a few extracts may suffice from the first of the course. In examining the claims of Moses to the authorship of Genesis, Dr. T. says:

"The art of writing was certainly known in the time of Moses. Monuments of Egypt which antedate the Exodus, exhibit abundant specimens of writing on stone, and some papyrus rolls still extant probably date from a higher antiquity than this book of Genesis."

Reviewing the first chapter of the Bible as comprising the origin of the existing order and furnishing the profoundest subjects for thought, Dr. T. observes:

"The method of Genesis is the reverse of physical science. The latter, by induction, seeks after laws, principles and causes; but Genesis begins with the Great First Cause. Science leads us back, step by step, to the necessity of an original cause; Genesis sets that cause before us directly in the declaration, 'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.' If the account given of the creation in this chapter is true, it must have proceeded from God. There was no human observer to record it, and the facts are beyond human discovery even in the present advanced stage of science. It is impossible to believe that, in the age of the world when this book was composed, and among the people to whom it was first given, the human mind should have been capable of originating such a description of the universe. It was communicated by illumination from God to man."

The assertion here made is well sustained by the writer—and in support of the idea that the first verse in the Bible asserts the absolute creation and origination of matter, he happily cites the construction placed upon it by Paul:—"the worlds were framed by the Word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things that did appear."

The query is very pertinently placed:

"How came it to pass that, in that far antiquity, Moses laid down a basis of the creation which is in such wondrous harmony with that which Science now reveals?"

Referring to various Pagan superstitious hypotheses, Egyptian, Phœnician, &c., it is remarked:

"The bare statement of these systems must convince one that Moses borrowed nothing from them, though he was probably familiar with their common conception of the origin of the universe; and the question remains, How was it that he avoided their errors and extravagances, and gave with such severe simplicity a description of the creation, which, for popular uses, no rhetoric could improve, and no science can gainsay?"

Our readers will like to know Dr. T.'s understanding of the word Day as applied to creation:

"Here comes in the term 'Day.' I suppose it now to be well understood that neither this word itself, nor Biblical usage, nor the context here, requires us to understand by a Day a period of twenty-four hours. The term is first applied to the appearing of light after the darkness of chaos. Chaos was the evening, light the morning. But when did this darkness begin? and how long did the light thus engendered continue? Was this merely a natural day? Why should we attempt to measure this first period by a chronometer which, according to the narrative itself, could not have come into use until the fourth day, when the heavenly bodies became visible from our globe, so as to serve for the measurement of times and seasons?

"In the fourth verse of the second chapter we have an example of the use of this word 'Day' to cover the whole period of operations included in the seven days of the first chapter: 'These are the generations of the heavens and the earth when they were created, in the day that the Lord God made the earth and the heavens.' Here the whole term of creation is comprehended within one day. Again: we are told that 'one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.' (2 Peter iii. 8.) In short, the word is used in the Scriptures to describe an event or period which had a beginning and a completion. Lest any should suppose that this interpretation of the word Day is a modern invention to accommodate the narrative in Genesis to the discoveries of Geology, or to evade the objections of science to this record, let me remind you that Augustine, in the fourth century, by the simple principles of interpretation, called these 'ineffable days,' describing them as alternate births and pauses in the work of the Almighty—the boundaries of periods in the vast evolution of the worlds. And such was the earlier Christian interpretation of this narrative. The notion that these were literal days of twenty-four hours seems rather to have sprung up in the middle ages, an offspring of that literalism and realism which in times of ignorance have often perverted the meaning of the Scriptures."

One further extract will occupy the space we can at present afford to a book which deserves admission to the private and to the public library.

"Moses has not attempted to teach astronomy or geology, nor to anticipate the deductions of any science, physical or metaphysical. But he has here laid down the first fundamental truth in all theology—a personal Creator: 'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.' The existence of God is assumed, yet the universe here contemplated as the work of creative intelligence becomes a convincing argument for the being of God. Can a man walk this earth so manifestly prepared for his abode, enjoy its beauties, appropriate its uses, analyze its mysteries, and not feel there is a God? Can a man look upon these heavens, measure the distance, the density, the capacity of each star, prescribe the motions of the planets, and summon to light new worlds to explain the aberrations of the old, and not feel that there is a hand divine that binds the sweet influences of Pleiades and looses the bands of Orion, that brings forth Mazzaroth in his season, and guides Arcturus with his sons?

"Shall a man look upon himself, and behold how fearfully and wonderfully he is made, and not know that he is God's workmanship? Shall he make a watch, and not perceive that a superior intelligence must have made the delicate organ that keeps time within his own breast? Shall he make a telescope, and not perceive how much higher skill was requisite to make the eye which he so rudely imitates, and without which his telescope would be a worthless tube of tin? Shall he imagine that matter has done for itself what he with all his intelligence and ingenuity cannot do with matter? Shall he bring down light from the stars, and not see that it is God's light?

"Or shall he look within himself? Shall the thinking I, the living soul, which knows that it is not self-existent, that it has not existed from eternity, shall that soul ask itself whence it came, and not feel the spontaneous, glowing response, 'I am the offspring of God?' How can a man be an atheist? be an atheist, and yet be a man? Can he know himself and not know God? God is seen and felt in all His works, whether man will see Him or no. We have no need to say, 'Oh, that I knew where I might find Him!' If we feel after Him, we shall surely find Him, 'seeing He is not far from every one of us—for in Him we live, and move, and have our being.' 'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.'

"We wander back in quest of the origin of our race and of the world we inhabit, till we meet this sublime declaration, In the beginning, God. We traverse the whole field of speculative philosophy, and reach the same sublime result, In the beginning, God. We roam through the interminable ages and cycles of ages in the eras of geology, and the weary mind comes at length to the same terminus, In the beginning, God. We take the nebular theory, and melt down the earth to a fluid mass, and evaporate this into the thinnest ether diffused in space, and requiring age upon age of motion to give it solidity and form; we ask whence came the ether? In the beginning, God. Everywhere it is written, There is a God—a living God, a personal God, a present God. Can there be a higher object of thought than to know such a God? Can there be a higher privilege of love than to know God as a friend?"

Baron Von Humboldt.—The centennial anniversary of the birth of this remarkable son of Science occurred on the 14th inst. An interesting paper from an esteemed correspondent, containing notes of a call made upon the philosopher about fifteen years ago, is unavoidably postponed.

Change of Meetings.—The time of holding Fairfield Quarterly Meeting (Western Yearly Meeting) has been changed to the third Seventh day in the 3d, 5th, 8th and 11th months. Its two constituent Monthly Meetings, Beech Grove and Fairfield, are now held, the former on Fourth-day and the latter on Fifth-day preceding the third Seventh-day in each month.

MARRIED.

At Fairmount Meeting, Ind., on the 25th of Eighth month, 1869, Richard, son of John and Lydia Carey, to Mary, daughter of Samuel and Margaret Dillon, (the latter deceased.)

DIED.

HILL.—On the 18th of Eighth month, 1869, Rebecca M. Hill, in the 42d year of her age; a member of White Water Monthly Meeting, Ind. Her family and friends are comforted by the assurance that she was prepared for the change.

SHARON.—At her residence near Smithfield, O., on the 20th of First month, 1869, Esther, wife of Wm. Sharon, in the 81st year of her age; a member of Smithfield Monthly Meeting. Humbly submissive to the Divine Will, she was enabled to endure with Christian resignation, and we reverently trust has entered into that rest which is prepared for the righteous.

ONG.—At his residence near Smithfield, O., on the 4th of Fourth month last, Mifflin Ong, in the 80th year of his age; a member of Smithfield Mo. Meeting. He was a consistent Friend and honest man. Having thus lived, he was fully prepared when the summons came to exchange his earthly for a heavenly home.

LEE.—On the 22d of Eighth month, 1869, in Washington, Wayne Co., Ind., Tacy B. Lee, wife of James Lee, and daughter of Thos. Davis, in the 32d year of her age; a member of West Grove Monthly Meeting.

HAMMOND.—On the 5th of Fifth month, 1869, at her late residence in Skaneateles, Onondaga Co., N. Y., Phebe Hammond, a beloved member of Scipio Monthly Meeting. In the death of this our dear sister, a lesson of the efficiency of a hope in the Redeemer and the power of Divine Grace in sustaining the soul in its last struggle with temporal things, was strikingly illustrated. Amid all her sufferings, in calm resignation of soul, she quietly awaited the Lord's appointed time, often expressing a desire, when it pleased Him, to go and be at rest with Jesus. "Oh," she said, "that sweet rest, that sweet rest! I am willing to go. I love everybody." At one time she said,

"'O when shall I see Jesus,
And reign with Him above,
And drink the flowing fountain
Of Everlasting Love!"

She bore her sufferings with fortitude, and prayed she might be so kept ever to the end. Her prayers were answered, and sweetly she passed away to rest.

MORROW.—At the house of Jos. Raley, Springdale, Iowa, on the 22d of Fifth month, 1869, Ann Morrow, formerly of Bolton, England, aged nearly 68 years; a member of Springdale Monthly Meeting. This dear Friend, after a severe illness, was enabled to see her way clear to the mansions of eternal bliss; saying, just at her departnre, "Now I am going, and I cannot express to you the glory that I feel." She then fell into a sweet sleep, from which she never awoke in this world.

HUBBS.—At his residence near Bloomfield, Prince Edward Co., Ontario, on the 28th of Seventh month, 1869, Haviland Hubbs, in the 77th year of his age; a member of West Lake Monthly Meeting. This dear Friend was highly respected by all who knew him for his strict integrity. His conversation, when near his end, gave evidence that he was prepared for the change. In answer to a Friend who visited him a few days before his death, he said, "I am weak, very weak, in the flesh, but strong in faith." At another time he said he only regretted that he had not loved his God more, and served him better. In talking to his family, he said that Death had lost its terrors, and that he was waiting for his release. He could say, "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!"

TABER.—In Vassalboro', Maine, on the 19th of Third month, 1869, Mary Taber, widow of Stephen Taber, aged 77 years; a member of Vassalboro' Monthly Meeting. She bore a protracted illness with much patience, and gave to her surviving friends the evidence that to die was gain.

TABER.—In Vassalboro', on the 16th of Seventh month, 1869, Eunice S. Taber, wife of Henry Taber, aged 46 years; a member of Vassalboro' Monthly Meeting. Her illness was short, and in prospect of her removal from her family, she appeared resigned—trusting in the mercy of Him who giveth us the victory. She has left with her friends the assurance that she has gone to join that company whose song is "Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb."

"The Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs

Will meet at PLAINFIELD, IND., on Fourth-day, Ninth month 22d, 1869, at 2 P.M.

John B. Garrett, Clerk.

Friends who come to Richmond over the "Pennsylvania Central," "Pan Handle," "Columbus, Chicago and Indiana Central" Railroads, to attend Indiana Yearly Meeting, will be returned over the said roads free of charge.

Sickness should teach us what a vain thing the world is, what a vile thing sin is, what a poor thing man is, and what a precious thing an interest in Christ is.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Bush Hill, N. C., 9th mo. 1st.—(Allen Jay writes:) D. S. and I have just returned from Surrey Co. We held a meeting at Westfield, where there was formerly a large Quarterly Meeting, (on the border of southwestern Virginia,) one at War Hill, and on First-day attended the opening of an indulged meeting at Holly Springs in the same county. There were about five hundred persons present, and as the house could not hold one-half, we adjourned to the grove. It was a very favored meeting, and much tenderness was manifested. Many leading citizens from Mt. Airy were present. About twelve persons have lately joined Friends there, and nine more have handed in their names to the Monthly Meeting in an adjoining county in the mountains. In the Particular Meeting we had an opportunity with those who have been received, and those under convincement, and I trust it was not in vain. The Quarterly Meeting, which is eighty miles east, will doubtless soon send a committee to visit them.

[From another Friend we learn that this district is one from which Friends emigrated many years ago. Through this county, during the war, Joseph J. Neave (now laboring in Australia,) travelled on foot in his journey of sixty miles to Tennessee. He held a meeting near by—found one woman still a member—and experienced much openness among the people. Since then Joseph Moore, Allen Jay, Isham Cox, Jeremiah A. Grinnell and others have held meetings there. Faithful servants have planted and watered. He who gave the seed and supplied the water, has given the increase, and all the praise is His. —Ed.]

THE CHAMELEON.

The poem with this title, given in Lindley Murray's collection and ascribed to Merrick, is familiar, doubtless, to nearly all the readers of the Review. To most of them, however, it will be a matter of surprise and curiosity to be informed that it was originally written and printed in very homely Scotch, by Allan Ramsay, the Pastoral Poet, and author of The Gentle Shepherd. Merrick was born 34 years after Ramsay, and survived him 19 years. The poem in question was printed by Ramsay when Merrick was only one year old. It is recorded that an English gentleman dressed some of the Scotch poet's effusions in an Anglican garb, and this may have been done by the author's request, and may account for the claim of Merrick. If the English poet meant to pass The Chameleon as a creation of his own, (which probably may not have been the case,) it was a gross plagiarism.

The poem as we find it credited to James Merrick is a more elegant performance, and fitter for "ears polite." But it fails to give, as in the original, a reason for the creature appearing white, when "row'd" or wrapped in the umpire's napkin; and in the concluding moral the strong sense of the author is quite lost in the Anglicization. The fine preamble of Merrick is his own, except the line,

"I've seen, and sure I ought to know."

Merrick attributes to the creature "a serpent's tongue," which is a mistake, and in the line,

"I saw him eat the air for food," embodies the old notion of his unsubstantial diet. His tongue is of remarkable length, and he thrusts it out with lightning rapidity, and with unerring aim, drawing in as his victim an insect, large or small.

To some readers the old poem may seem to fall short of the dignified requirements of the Review. In the eyes of others it will, as a literary curiosity, appear worthy of the space it occupies.

THE CAMELEON.

By Allen Ramsay, Born 1686, Died 1757.

Twa travellers, as they were wa'king,
'Bout the Cameleon fell a ta'king, (Sic think it shaws them mettled men
T' say, I've seen, and ought to ken;)
Says ane, "'Tis a strange beast indeed,
Four-footed, wi' a fish's head;
A little bowk, wi' a lang tail,
An' moves far slawer than a snail;
O' colour, like a blawart blue;"— Reply'd his neibour—"That's no true:
For weel I wat his color's green,
If ane may true his ain twa e'en;
For I in sun-shine saw him fair,
When he was dining on the air."
"Excuse me," says the ither blade,
"I saw him better in the shade,
And he is blue."
"He's green I'm sure!"
"Ye lied!" . . . .
Frae words there had been cuff and kick,
Had not a third come i' the nick,
Wha tenting them in this rough mood,
Cry'd, "Gentlemen, what! are ye wud?
What's your quarrel, an't may be speer't?"
"Troth," says the tane, "Sir, ye shall hear't.
The Cameleon—I say, he's blue;
He threaps he's green—now what say you?"
"Ne'er fash yoursells about the matter,"
Says the sagacious arbitrator:
"He's black—Sae nane of you are right,
I viewed him weel by candle-light,
And hae it in my pocket here,
Row'd in my napkin hale and feer."
"Fy!" said ae cangler, "what d'ye mean?
I'll lay my lugs on't that he's green."
Said th' ither, "Were I gawn to death,
I'd swear he's blue, wi' my last breath."
"He's black"—the judge maintained ay stout,
An' to convince them, whoop'd him out:
But to surprise o' ane an' a',
The animal was white as snaw,
An' thus reproved them:
"Shallow boys,
Awa'—awa'—mak nae mair noise;
Ye're a' three wrang, an' a' three right;

But learn to own your neibour's sight
As guid as your's—Your judgment speak,
But never be sae daftly weak
T' imagine ithers will by force
Submit their sentiments to your's;
As things in different lights ye see,
They'll ilka ane resemble me."

The poem is based upon the popular idea once prevalent, that the chameleon changes his color to that of the substance he is upon. We have seen the animal, and are disposed to say, in the words of the second "cangler," (according to Merrick,)

"'Tis green—'tis green—I can assure ye."

We have seen him assume various shades of green. When placidly at rest, he was of a pale green, with an approach to a powdery whiteness. Again—his green shaded nearly into blue—when stirred with a stick and irritated, there was a rush of subcutaneous fluid, which made him dark green, approaching to black. But we only saw him once, and that was more than forty years ago. If any reader is prepared to call him blue, black or white, we will not contest the point.—Ed.

HISTORICAL ACCURACY OF SCRIPTURE.

We read in Dan. v. 30, that when Darius took Babylon, Belshazzar, the king of it, was in the city, and in "in that night was Belshazzar, king of the Chaldeans, slain." Herodotus, the Greek historian, gives an account of the matter, which, until of late years, seemed totally irreconcilable with Daniel's narrative. He informs us that the King of Babylon, whose name was Labynetus, was absent when the city was taken; that he sought shelter in Barsippa; that Cyrus attacked him there, took him, stripped him of his regal dignity, but allowed him to retire and to spend the rest of his life in ease in Caramansa. The two statements appear to be contradictory, and that the credit of historic veracity must be denied either to Daniel or to Herodotus. Thus stood the matter, when Sir Henry Rawlinson, the celebrated Oriental scholar, discovered, in his Eastern researches, one of those cylinders, on which historic records used to be written in the cuneiform character by the ancients. Having deciphered the writing on this relic of antiquity, it was discovered that at the time of the capture of Babylon, referred to by Daniel and Herodotus, there were two kings presiding over the empire, a father and his son; and thus we can understand that Herodotus speaks of the father, who escaped, while Daniel speaks of the son, who was slain. This unsuspected fact, not only reconciles the prophet and the historian, but explains an otherwise inexplicable expression in Daniel, where it was promised to the prophet by Belshazzar that, if he could explain the writing on the wall, he would make him the third ruler in the kingdom. (Dan. v. 16.) Now, why not the second ruler, as Joseph in similar circumstances had been made in Egypt? The cylinder answers the question; there were two kings in Babylon, and therefore the place next to the throne could be only the third rulership in the kingdom. A very short time before the discovery which so triumphantly reconciles the seeming contradiction, which cast a shade of suspicion on Daniel's accuracy, Mr. F. W. Newman had written these words in Kitto's Cyclopedia, "No hypothesis will reconcile this account with the other;" an instructive lesson this, teaching us to give the sacred writers credit for accuracy, even though we may be unable to explain facts which seem to impeach it.—Church Herald.

CLOUDS.

BY CHARLES A. WALTERS.

Part II.

Clouds! What are they? Nature answers
In her solemn, silent way,
"Means by which my form is fashioned
From the earthy mass of clay."
Thus the clouds are natural fountains,
Welling o'er with happiness,
From which rills of joy descending,
All the realms of nature bless.
Semblance to the clouds of nature,
Shadows, too, we often find,
Passing like a planet's transit
O'er the sunlight of the mind.
Let us, when such clouds are looming,
Thickly looming o'er our sky,
When our intellect is darkened
Where the shadows thickly lie;—
When the star of hope is hidden,
Hidden wholly from the sight,
And no ray of light is beaming
Through the shades of dreary night;—
When our hearts, well nigh despondent,
Almost burst with swelling grief,
And we strive to pierce the darkness,
Vainly seeking for relief;—
Let us then the truth remember,
After darkness, light will come;
Shining on us all the brighter,
As the thicker was the gloom.
As the sun, from clouds appearing,
Wakes the earth to louder praise,
So the mind, when freed from darkness,
Tunes the heart to sweeter lays.
Can we, then, repine or murmur,
When our sky is clouded o'er?
Rather let us pray for patience,
Trusting in a Father's power;
Faith in Him, our hope will strengthen,
And a flood of light will come,
Bringing with it joy and gladness,
Guiding us to Heaven our home.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—Dates from Europe are to the 13th inst.

Ireland.—The work of reorganizing the Irish Church as disestablished is progressing favorably. The Archbishops of Armagh and Dublin have agreed to convene a lay conference, to meet in next month.

A published note from W. E. Gladstone says that the pardon of the Fenians is under consideration in the Cabinet. A meeting in favor of such pardon was held at Limerick on the 7th, at which 2500 persons were present. Among the resolutions adopted was one asserting that the farmers of Ireland will not accept any tenant-right bill until the political prisoners are liberated.

France.—The official journal of the 11th announced that the Emperor was well; but a letter published in London on the same day, said that rumors of a possible abdication were current, and were thought not improbable, as he is liable to returns of his illness, disabling him from attending to business.

The Senatus consultum has been officially promulgated. The text is published, and agrees with the accounts of its substance heretofore received. The most important amendment of the original plan was one which allows the Senate to oppose in any case the promulgation of a bill; in which case it cannot be presented again in the Legislative Body during the same session.

A fearful hurricane has swept over the north of France, causing much damage to crops and other property.

Spain.—A body of 30 Carlists was defeated near Gerona on the 6th, and many of the men were captured, but their leader escaped. This was said to be the last Carlist band known to be on Spanish soil, but 400 were reported at Perpignan, on the French frontier, waiting to enter.

A commission has been appointed to consider the question of the alteration of the penal code for the colonies, administrative reforms, and the abolition of slavery in Porto Rico.

The Regent has issued a decree ordering that a circular expressing the thanks of the government be sent to those bishops who have complied with the late decree respecting the disloyalty of the clergy. The replies made by the other bishops are to be considered in the Council of State, with a view to the institution of criminal proceedings. Ten of the delinquent bishops have been ordered to appear before the supreme tribunal.

A proposition to extend the term of the regency of Marshal Serrano is said to be gaining favor.

The King of Italy, in replying to overtures in connection with the Spanish crown, made to his son the Duke of Aosta, is said to have declared that his son shall never reign in a free country unless by the unanimous call of its constituent Chambers.

Belgium.—The government has declined to join Bavaria in carrying out the policy proposed by the Bavarian Prime Minister in respect to the coming Council at Rome; and has also determined to send no official delegates to the Council. The Swiss Federal Council has also declined to take part in the joint action proposed.

Russia.—The harvest throughout Russia is nearly completed. In the south, the crops are generally good, but in some of the northern provinces the yield will not be more than half the average.

Turkey.—The frontier question between Turkey and Persia has been satisfactorily arranged. Formal ratifications will be exchanged by the two governments as soon as possible.

Australasia.—Despstches to the 12th ult from Australia, received by the War Department in England, represented that the rebellion of the natives throughout New Zealand was increasing, and much alarm prevailed among the settlsrs.

India.—Dispatches lately received in London state that half of the municipal council of Saigon in Cochin China is hereafter to be chosen from those of French and American parentage born in the country, while native Anamites and Chinese are also made eligible to the council.

Egypt.—The cotton crop in the interior is reported to be excellent both in quantity and quality.

Cuba.—Some recent successes are said to have greatly encouraged the insurgents, who are sanguine of ultimately securing their independence. It is announced that the Spanish government is about to dispatch reinforcements of 24,000 troops to Cuba, of whom 6000 were to embark the present week. The contending forces are rapidly devastating the island, and along the eastern coast the people are said to be on the verge of starvation, and dying by hundreds, of diseases resulting from want.

Mexico.—Several attempts at revolution in different parts of the country have been frustrated, and the government appears to be gradually bringing it into better order. The line of telegraph from the capital to Cuernavaca was opened on the 17th ult., and the railway from Puebla to Mexico was to be finished by the middle of the present month. An industrial school is about to be established at Morelia, aided by a grant of $1500 per annum from the public funds. A messenger from the provisional government of Spain has been received by the President, and it is understood that diplomatic relations between the two countries have been re established.

At the scene of the Plymouth coal-mine disaster, several parties went down the shaft on the evening of the 7th, but each could remain only a few minutes, on account of the foul air. The ventilating furnace near the mouth of the horizontal passage was found to be still burning, and water was forced down through hose to extinguish it. The next morning, the exploring parties discovered in one of the "gangways," a barrier which had been constructed of a car, coal and clothing, for the purpose of excluding the poisonous gas, and behind it were found the bodies of a large portion of the miners. One was found outside, having evidently been engaged in building the barrier, which was completed, except an opening just sufficient for a man to crawl through, and having apparently been overcome before he could get through. Other bodies were subsequently found in other places, to the total number of 108, and on the afternoon of the 9th it was announced that the mine had been thoroughly explored, and no others remained. Two men who had attempted, on the first day, to go to the relief of their comrades, were suffocated, making the total loss of life 110; while 59 widows and 109 orphans were made by this calamity. Many of these were left entirely destitute, not only having lost their sole means of support, but having been reduced by the previous long "strike" to great poverty. Much active sympathy has been manifested in various parts of the country, and liberal contributions in aid of the sufferers have been made.

A storm of wind and rain of unusual violence, swept the eastern part of New England on the 8th, causing great damage. In Boston, Providence and other places, many buildings were destroyed, either wholly or partially, trees blown down, &c. At Providence, the water was driven up into the streets, so that boats were required to rescue the people from some of the houses, and several persons were killed, and others seriously injured. Numerous wrecks are reported along the coast.

THE LONDON FRIENDS' MEETINGS AND THEIR ASSOCIATIONS. Compiled from Original Records and other sources by WILLIAM BECK and T. FREDERICK BALL. London, T. Bowyer Kitto, 5 Bishopsgate St. without.

For the members of the Religious Society of Friends this volume contains much of lively interest. As many of the readers of the Review may not have the opportunity of perusing it, a few selections are condensed from its pages. The laborious search into the records of the past, which has enabled the compilers to concentrate so much that is informing and instructive in a form so readable, has conferred a benefit upon the members of our Religious Society. Especially are we of the Western Hemisphere indebted, who are so far removed from the scenes where these faithful servants of the Lord labored to open the way for the spread of the new and spiritual dispensation of the Gospel of our Redeemer.

The LONDON of the days of Cromwell, where many of the most stirring scenes of that Reformation to which our Religious Society owes its rise, were enacted, is described as a city not a tenth of the size of the present metropolis, surrounded by walls with gateways guarded by a local militia—a labyrinth of narrow lanes and winding streets, the pavements of which were so rough that no carriage could go over them save at a footpace, and having no lights at night. There were no watchmen save the armed trainbands or militia. One narrow bridge encumbered with lofty houses formed the only connection with the opposite bank of the Thames. At this time the Post-office system took its rise, the daily newspaper was introduced, and the foundation laid of free and independent journalism. Religious topics tinctured the conversation and writings of the greater part of society. Men assembled in crowds to hear sermons, and stood for three or four hours to listen to some gifted preacher.

The most evangelical sect of this period obtained for themselves the name of Baptists, in consequence of their peculiar views as to the administration of the outward rite of water baptism. Differences however soon arose amongst them, and they became divided into two sections, the one known as the Particular Baptists, the other as the General or Arminian Baptists. From this latter section came many of the early converts to the Truth as promulgated through that eminent servant of the Lord, George Fox.

It appears from the volume now before us, that two women, one named Isabel Buttery, the other not now known, were the first persons to make public in London a paper issued by George Fox, on the subject of Spiritual Worship, and the way to the Kingdom of Heaven. Two brothers, Simon and Robert Dring, received and assisted them, and opened their dwellings for the meetings of those inclined to assemble after this new way.

"These were the first meetings held in London, and were mostly seasons of silent waiting, except that, now and then, Isabel did speak a few words."

About this time George Fox says:

"The Lord did move upon the spirits of many whom He had raised up, to travel southward in the service of the Gospel, as Francis Howgill and Edward Burrough to London," &c.

The former was thirty-six, and the latter but a youth of eighteen years. They had embraced the views of Friends about two years before, having passed through many and various religious experiences. Howgill bore this beautiful testimony to the character of his youthful coadjutor.

"He had the spirit of a man when he was but a child, and I may say, gray hair was upon him when he was but a youth, for he was clothed with wisdom in his infancy. . . . His whole delight was always among good people, and to be conferring and reading the Scriptures. . . . His very strength was bended after God."

Both afterward became martyrs, dying for the testimony of Jesus under the cruel treatment then inflicted in the loathsome prisons of that turbulent and intolerant age.

"It was in the summer of 1654 that these two earnest evangelists came up from their native dales to London, and assembled for worship with the little companies of Friends before mentioned."

But they soon sought a more public field for the exercise of their gifts. So intense was the interest in controversy upon religious subjects among the citizens of London, that frequent meetings were held in the churches and elsewhere, to which any were free to come and express their opinions.

"Of such occasions F. Howgill and E. Burrough were quick to avail themselves, and brief as are the accounts remaining of their movements, we can trace them going from one gathering to another; visiting all sorts of sects, then very numerous, and in some obtaining a full and fair hearing, amid others encountering a storm of opposition, and, in some, receiving personal abuse. At first discouragement was experienced by them when they found how 'subtle was the spirit' of the London congregations; very different from those they had left in the Yorkshire dales, and earnest desire arose for wisdom and guidance in experience so new to them. This was granted, and in such full measure that the tone of discouragement is soon found to be exchanged for one of joy, for they were able to say, 'Hundreds are convinced and thousands wait to see the issue; very many Societies we have visited, and are now able to stand.'"

In a few months the number attracted to hear these new views had so increased, that a large meeting place, known as the Bull and Mouth, which it is said would hold 1000 persons, was obtained, and all who chose to attend were admitted. But it appears from the early records that smaller and more private meetings were held in the houses of Friends, where those fully convinced came into more intimate union and fellowship.

"The system of having these two kinds of meetings, some public and others private, prevailed among London Friends for some years after their rise,—indeed, as long as the work of general evangelization among the populace continued. The ministry in these, and the building up of the gathered Church, were recognized as distinct spheres of Gospel service, continuing until the care arising from the great numbers of convinced appears to have slackened the efforts for evangelization among the masses."

The number of converts to the Truth as thus preached by F. Howgill and E. Burrough, and soon after by many other eminent servants of the Lord, increased greatly. In little more than twenty years it is estimated that there were ten thousand Friends in London alone.

George Fox thus encouraged his Friends in an epistle:

"Stir abroad whilst the door is open and the light shineth. . . . The Lord give you an understanding in all things, and his arm go along with you, that ye may be to his glory. Dear Francis and Edward, in the life of God wait, that ye may with it be led."

The Independent and the Churchman, the Puritan and the Royalist, alike became persecutors when in power, and were unwilling to receive the simple, peaceable and self-denying doctrines preached by Friends. Cromwell died, doing nothing for their relief. His son Richard, though promising fair, was controlled by a Parliament hostile to the Society, and King Charles II. soon violated his pledges of toleration for tender consciences. Indifferent himself, and caring for none of these things, he allowed the most cruel sufferings to be inflicted on his innocent subjects, convicted on no charge but that of obeying Christ rather than man.

Cast into prison, packed there so close in air corrupted by the most offensive filth, that many died, Friends still were faithful, and "in love drew near to each other in the hour of mutual trial, encouraged by martyr spirits such as Burrough, coming cheerfully to meet their death in gaol, cheered by such as Dewsbury, who, though pining as to the body, said, 'In the prison I sang praises, and esteemed the bolts and locks as jewels.'"

One of the most prominent persecutors of Friends was Alderman Richard Brown. First appearing as a Republican, then as Puritan, he quickly at the turn of the tide of power became a zealous Royalist. Appointed Lord Mayor of London, and having command of armed trainbands, this unprincipled man was ever ready to oppress the meek and humble follower of Jesus. It is said that,

"Even the sight of a Friend awakened his rage. 'Art thou a Quaker?' said he one day to Philip Harwood. 'They call me one,' replied Philip, and forthwith he was seized and sent to Newgate, and lay there for three months. For merely not taking off their hats to him in the street, he would send Friends to Newgate. In one such instance the offenders were two, who, having come up some 70 miles out of the country, were quietly transacting their business in the open market, when, for not lifting their caps (as the Mayor rode by), he had them imprisoned in Newgate, where they owed their release, after a fortnight, merely to his term of office having expired.."

"Nearly 400 Friends were taken from the Bull and Mouth meeting alone in the space of three months, all quiet, peaceable tradesmen or householders, and shut up in the filthy gaol of Newgate for assembling together for worship. But Brown, finding that neither imprisonment nor fine could keep Friends from their meeting, had the door covered over with thick planks strongly nailed. Then they met in the street, and one First-day morning, returning from attending the service at the Cathedral accompanied by his officers, the alderman encountered Friends quietly assembled. Enraged at the sight, he charged in among them, and knocking some over, spurred his horse to trample them when on the ground; but the animal, more merciful than its master, refusing, reared up so straight as to let him slip off into the gutter, when the sheriff led him away. Even his own trainbands sickened of the work in thus disturbing week after week a congregation who, as they said, had 'such good honest countenances;'—one soldier confessed that he knew in doing it 'he was serving the devil.'"

Before the year 1670 two other locations had been obtained by Friends for meeting-houses. The one called Devonshire House, the other in White Hart Court, Grace Church Street. To this latter place the congregation meeting at the Bull and Mouth was finally transferred. For nearly 200 years these premises were held by the Society. The last meeting for worship was held there in 1862, when John L. Eddy of America and Benjamin Seebohm, with other ministers, were largely and powerfully engaged, thus closing the use of that place for Gospel service. The property was then given up to the fishmongers company, from whom it had been leased for long terms of years. The decline of this meeting was principally owing to the removal of the families of Friends from the closely-built streets of the old city, to the suburbs, where new meetings were established.

A CALL ON HUMBOLDT.

BY THOMAS CHASE, M. A.

The centennial anniversary of the birth of Alexander Von Humboldt, on the 14th inst., celebrated throughout the civilized world, reminds me of a delightful interview which I had with the Baron in the latter part of the winter of 1854–55, when I was a student in the University of Berlin. The preceding summer, after I had left at his house some books which had been entrusted to my care as presents to him from Prof. Felton, of Cambridge, and George Ticknor, of Boston, Humboldt sent me a kind note, requesting me to call upon him, and receive "ses remerciments affectueuses;" but an illness with which he was seized before the day appointed compelled him to deny himself to visitors. Always reluctant to intrude upon the leisure of great men, I feared I should never have the privilege of seeing the patriarch and prince of naturalists; but when the learned and excellent Prof. Phelps, of Andover, Mass., arrived in Berlin, he begged me to seek an interview in his name, as well as my own. Learning that the Baron was always most gratified when foreigners applied directly for the privilege of waiting upon him, rather than through letters of introduction, I wrote him a note, enclosing our cards, and expressing some of the diffidence I felt in making the application for an interview; to which the following reply was promptly returned:

"Mon cher Monsieur,—Comment pourriez vous douter un instant que je n'aurais pas une bien vive satisfaction, Monsieur, de vous recevoir, conjointement avec le Professeur Phelps, deux voyageurs noblement occupés de travaux littéraires. Je désire que le choix de mardi (à 1 heure) puisse vous être agréable. Vous ne verrez que des ruines, mais l'être qui habite ces ruines reste affectueusement attaché a la partie de votre belle patrie où l'humanité est vraiment libre dans tous les dégrés de la civilisation sociale. Vous avez le grand avantage d'appartenir à cette région, si favorable au développement intellectuel et à la liberté.

Agréez, je vous supplie, l'expression de ma haute considération.

A. V. HUMBOLDT,

We presented ourselves at the appointed hour, and, after passing through several rooms adorned with bronzes, stuffed animals, antlers, and various representations of objects connected with natural history, were shown into a pleasant, snug apartment, hung round with striking landscapes and other pictures, and containing a large plaster bust of the Baron's brother Wilhelm. This cosy parlor adjoined Humboldt's study, from which he at once emerged to welcome us.

A man of middling size, whose strong constitution had suffered many proofs of travel, and privation, and study, his head a little inclined on one side, and his form somewhat shrunk with age, (he had seen six and eighty winters,) still was his fire unquenched, still was it a LION that we saw. His step was

* My dear Sir,—How could you doubt a moment that I should take a very lively satisfaction in receiving you, sir, together with Professor Phelps, two travellers nobly occupied in literary pursuits. I hope that the selection of Tuesday (at 1 o'clock) may be agreeable to you. You will see but ruins, but the being who inhabits these ruins remains affectionately attached to that part of your beautiful country where humanity is truly free in all the degrees of social civilization. You have the great advantage of belonging to that region, so favorable to intellectual development and to liberty.

Accept, I pray you, the assurance of my high consideration. A. V. HUMBOLDT, on Sunday.

brisk and lively; his grey eyes were bright and beaming with intelligence; genial good humor sat upon his countenance. His handsome forehead—a worthy shrine for such an intellect—rose high and full, without falling back at the top; in this respect, as Professor Phelps remarked, resembling that of Sir Walter Scott. His face had a great deal of color, and might almost be called ruddy; the whole expression was not only intelligent, but extremely bland, amiable, and kind. When, three months before, I saw Rauch's bust of Humboldt at the sculptor's studio, I characterized the face in a letter home as "intelligent and eminently genial;" and in our interview with the man himself, the propriety of these epithets was confirmed. The artist has happily caught and chiselled in the marble this peculiar character in the expression of the Baron's countenance, which stamped him at once, in the estimation of all who saw him, as a man pre-eminently liebenswürdig (to use the happy German term for "loveable") in all the relations of life.

No man ever understood better than Humboldt the art of making his visitors entirely at their ease. He began at once conversing with us in English, (which he spoke with perfect fluency,) saying that he presumed we would prefer to hear him in English rather than in French, but apologizing for his "rustiness" in our language,—a rustiness which we did not detect. He threw in one or two French words, and used one foreign idiom; but his English was wonderfully good. First he told us of his happy reminiscences of his visit of three months in the United States, after his five years' travel in Mexico and South America; he found this country particularly pleasant after the *tristesse of the Spanish American provinces. With Jefferson and Gallatin he had pleasant intercourse, and entertained for both of them a high regard, particularly, he said, for Jefferson, "as he was more a man of my color." He would gladly have tarried longer in the United States, were it not that his instruments were nearly worn out by long use, and he was naturally anxious to return home after his long absence. He said he spoke Spanish for seven years in his travels, but had little opportunity now to practice it. This led him to speak of Ticknor's History of Spanish Literature, which he commended in the highest terms. He remembered George Ticknor and Alexander Everett as young men and students in Germany. Of Prescott's writings he spoke highly, particularly of his Lives of Ferdinand and Isabella; of this book he said that Lord Holland —"not the present, but the great Lord Holland"—expressed in his hearing his surprise that an American work should exhibit such excellence of style. Alluding to the prejudice which the English used to entertain against American literature, he said that he believed it was rapidly disappearing. Of Prescott's Conquests of Mexico and Peru his opinion was not quite so favorable; he regarded them as having to some extent the air of compilations. It is evident, he said, that the historian had never seen those countries; and there are no countries in the world a knowledge of whose physical geography is so important for an understanding of their political and social history as those in "that Caucasus of America."

Humboldt remembered both the Sillimans, and B. A. Gould, Jr., and gave them high commendation, characterising the latter as a very "bright and lively young man," of great promise; he also spoke in the highest terms of the great service rendered to science by "Dr. Franklin's grandson," Prof. Bache, of Philadelphia, and referred with regret to the jealousy of Bache on the part of some of the friends of Lieut. Maury, who had also done good service, although in a different sphere. To one or both of these gentlemen (I did not exactly understand which) the King was going to send a copy of the beautiful gold medal designed by Cornelius, and struck in honor of Humboldt as the author of "Cosmos." "As orders, fortunately, cannot be worn by your countrymen," said the philosopher to us, "the King is going to send these medals in their place." He showed us an engraving of this beautiful medal, in which a Genius unveils Nature, represented by Diana of Ephesus; a Sphinx is represented among the emblems; and the whole is surrounded by the signs of the zodiac.

The catholicity of Humboldt's mind was very manifest in our brief interview. Making little allusion to the sciences in which he had won his laurels, he seemed perfectly at home in history, literature, philology, and art, in all their departments. He indicated to us his liberal political views and his abhorrence of slavery. He made intelligent inquiries in regard to the condition of philological studies in America, and hoped that the Semitic languages were carefully studied amongst us, alluding to the importance of studying the other languages of the family in connection with Hebrew. Some of his criticisms upon persons were very keen and piquant. Ranging rapidly from field to field, he poured forth a golden stream of conversation, rich in memories, criticisms, and illustrations.

He seemed willing to talk for hours; but we would not trespass too long upon time so valuable and used for such advantage to the world. As we were taking our leave he said,

* Gloominess, melancholy aspect, perhaps both of nature and society.

repeating the modest words of his letter, "You see only ruins." "Oh no!" I replied, "we see a noble temple, inhabited by a noble mind."

SELECTNESS OF MEETINGS FOR DISCIPLINE.

A correspondent asks an editorial expression of opinion respecting the propriety of "throwing our meetings for discipline open to all that would choose to attend." It appears that the desire for such a change is based upon a supposed "enlarged liberality of views respecting other societies." A similar "enlarged liberality," brought to bear upon domestic matters, would admit into family councils the curiosity of neighbors. It is something to be able to estimate the value of privacy.

In a Church organization, both stability and general uniformity of rules are to be desired. In the matter under consideration, the general prevalence of the existing usage is an argument of some force in favor of its continuance, and against its abrogation in a particular locality whilst it is retained by the Society at large. It would be a source of weakness and great incertitude, were every rule and usage to be perpetually regarded with the same scrutinizing freedom, as though it had never been adopted as part of a code. And something is surely due to the Body as a whole that we may be essentially one people. Not that there should be no changes, but that they be not made without deliberate caution, or without being based upon principle and necessity.

Why should the doors be thus thrown open? The meeting for discipline is a family affair. Its object is to transact the business pertaining to the Society and its interests. Friends when so assembled should draw near to the divine Head of the Church to seek for congregate wisdom, and in love they should harmonize with one another. If surrounded with the spirits of others who have no right to participate in the deliberations and no part in the decisions, can it be doubted that embarrassment would result, and that the freedom in the truth which ought to exist in such meetings would be cramped? And why should we deprive ourselves of the only opportunity in which the rightly exercised servants of the Lord may speak to their fellow-members, collectively yet select, of faults or foibles which may be spreading among us, needing care and tender admonition? And there are sufficient reasons for selectness. There are cases of delinquency brought for disciplinary action—the object being two-fold—the clearing of the Truth, and, primarily, the reformation of the offender. But in many instances it were even better that the case were not brought forward, if "telling unto the Church" must involve telling unto the world. The time was, less than a century ago, when even our own members were not expected to attend these meetings until they had evinced sufficient religious advancement to induce their more experienced Friends to invite their presence. Thus guarded, the meetings for the transaction of Church affairs were not merely select, but confidential also, and a person might be under care for evil conduct, without the obloquy being published abroad—whereas the treatment of the case with open doors, would unneccessarily spread the rumor, and make it difficult for the offender, when penitent and reformed, to regain a reputable position. There is Christian wisdom in the sentiment of Dr. Johnson, that "a man should never be told of the faults which he has mended," and the efforts of the Church to convert a sinner ought not to be made the vehicle of exposing his sins to multitudes who had not otherwise known of them.

At our meetings held for the express purpose of worshipping Almighty God, all are welcome who incline to unite in the exercise. At those held for purposes exclusively pertaining to our own Society affairs, it is not easy to see why others than members should be present. Exceptional cases occur in which, by special permission and on special occasions, individuals are properly admitted.—Friends' Review, Seventh month, 1867.

THE EVER-WIDENING WORLD OF STARS.

BY RICHARD A. PROCTOR, B.A., F.R.A.S.

As the science of astronomy has advanced, the ideas men have formed respecting the extent of the universe have gradually become more and more enlarged. In far-off times, when astronomers were content to judge of the conformation of the universe by the appearances directly presented to their contemplation, the ideas formed respecting the celestial bodies were singularly homely. We read that Theophrastus looked upon the Milky Way as the fastening of the stellar hemispheres, which are so "carelessly knitted together, that the fiery heavens beyond them can be seen through the spaces." Anaximenes believed the heavens to be made of a kind of fine earthenware, and that the stars are the heads of nails driven through the domed vault formed of this material. And even Lucretius, whose views of nature were so noble, has referred without disapproval to the bizarre theory of Xenophanes that the stars are fiery clouds collected in the upper regions of air.

was accepted there were no means of forming any trustworthy views respecting the extent of the stellar universe. If the earth were ever at rest we could never know how far the stars are from us; and therefore the old astronomers were free to invent whatever theories they pleased as to the scale on which the sidereal scheme is constructed. It was only when the earth was set free by Copernicus from the imaginary chains which had been conceived as holding it in the centre of the universe, that it became possible to form any conception of the distances at which the stars lie from us. Indeed Tycho Brahé immediately pointed this out as an overwhelming objection against the new theory. "Are we to suppose," he argued, "that the stars are placed at such enormous distances from us as to seem wholly unchanged in position, while the earth sweeps round the sun in an orbit millions of miles in diameter? If this amazing theory were true, the stars would be hundreds of millions of miles from us, a view which is utterly monstrous and incredible."

But strange as this new view appeared, it gradually gained ground. It became presently so well established that when Cassini discovered that the earth travels in a much wider orbit than Tycho Brahé had supposed—so that the stars were at once thrown many hundreds of millions of miles farther from us—astronomers still held to the new order of things. "With Briarean arms," as Humboldt has described their labors, the fellow-workers of Cassini thrust farther and farther away the "heaven of the fixed stars," until the immensity of the universe grew so great beneath their labors, that new modes of expressing its dimensions had to be adopted. They were not satisfied with the obvious circumstance that the stars seem to remain unchanged in position as the earth sweeps round the sun. They tested this apparent fixity of position with instruments of greater and greater power,—yet always with the same result. They made observations ten, twenty, even fifty times more exact than Tycho Brahé's, and the fact that they still detected no change of position signified nothing less than that the universe of the fixed stars is ten, twenty, even fifty times farther from us than Tycho Brahé had imagined.

Thus when Sir William Herchel began the noble series of researches amid the stellar depths which has rendered his name illustrious, the world of stars was already one of inconceivably enormous extent. Yet so widely did he increase our appreciation of the vastness of the universe, that it has been thought no exaggeration to say of him, that "he broke through the barriers of the heavens." "Cælorum perrupit claustra," says his monument at Upton, and every student of astronomy who has carefully examined Herschel's labors, understands the justice of the expression. For consider what Herschel did. When he began his survey of the heavens, astronomers had proved indeed that the nearest of the fixed stars lie at enormous distances from us, and some of the more advanced thinkers had begun to form noble speculations respecting the relations of the stars which lie beyond the sphere of those visible to us. But it was reserved for Sir W. Herschel to apply exact observations to the unseen star-systems. He literally gauged the celestial depths. With a telescope whose light-gathering power probably extended the range of vision to about eight hundred times its natural limit, he swept every part of the northern heavens. He estimated the depth of the system of stars in every direction by a simple and natural process. For, like all great thinkers, he struck out modes of inquiry which, the moment they were presented to the world, seemed so obvious, that the wonder was how they could have remained so long undetected. He said that precisely as the quantity of water passed through by the sailor's lead-line marks the depth of the sea, so the number of stars which can be seen when a telescope of given power is turned towards any part of the heavens is a measure of the depth of the sidereal system in that direction. In individual cases, indeed, the law may not be true, just as the sailor's lead-line may light on the peak of some sunken rock, and so give no true measure of the general depth of the sea in the neighborhood. But when the average of a great number of such "star-gaugings" is taken, then we may feel tolerably certain that on applying the simple rule devised by Herschel, we shall form no inaccurate estimate of our system's extent in any direction.

Thence arose his great theory of the stellar system. He showed that our sun is but one of an immense number of suns, distributed in a region of space resembling a cloven disc in figure. When we look along the thickness of the disc we see the enormous beds of stars, which lie around us in that direction, as a cloud of milky light, which so comes to form a cloven ring round the heavens. But when we look out towards the sides of the disc, where the stars are less profusely scattered, we see between them the black background of the sky.

Then Herschel extended his researches to those strange objects called the nebulæ. He showed that where astronomers had reckoned tens of these objects there were in reality thousands. And he found that a large proportion of the nebulæ can be resolved into stars. He held that these, therefore, may be looked upon as external universes, resembling that great system of stars of which our sun is a member. We need not, at this point, dwell upon the distinction which Herschel drew between nebulæ of this sort, and those objects which he held (and as we now know, justly) to be true clouds, formed of some vaporous substance, of the actual nature of which he forbore to express an opinion. Let it suffice to remark that in whatever mode those vaporous nebulæ might be supposed to be formed, it was clear to Herschel that they cannot be held to lie necessarily beyond the system of the fixed stars, as he held to be certainly the case with the stellar nebulæ.

LANDS FOR THE FREEDMEN.

One of the great difficulties in the way of prosperity of the freedmen and poor whites of the South, is the inability to procure small parcels of land, on which to erect humble homes and lay the foundation of a system of independent subsistence. The lands are nearly all in large tracts, which the owners are unwilling to divide, and which cost too much for the poorer classes to purchase. As a consequence, they are reduced to the position of dependents on the proprietor, holding their little cabins only as tenants, and obtaining a living by work on the "plantation." For those who would like to place some of the poor at the South in a better position, the following plan by a gentleman of this city is suggested for forming an organization for the purpose:

PLAN.

The name of this company shall be the ... Land Association for furnishing land to Freedmen. It shall be composed of those who contribute by loans to its funds. The object is to promote the elevation of the freed people through enabling them to provide land for their homes. The Association therefore proposes to purchase good land, not further south than South Carolina, convenient to market, at as low a price as practicable; and to sell it to worthy, industrious poor at cost and expenses exclusive of interest.

The motive is that the family may have a real home, a sanctuary, that these poor people may not be burdened with high rents, may have a greater stimulus to industry and thrift, may be more independent of employers, and this would have a tendency to increase wages, and that the elective franchise may be of more benefit to them. We want to give them a better chance to live.

The officers of the Association shall be a Secretary, Treasurer, and Executive Committee, of which the Secretary and Treasurer shall be ex-officio members.

They shall be appointed annually, and hold their offices severally for one year, or until others shall be appointed in their places.

The Treasurer shall receive all monies due the Association, and disburse the same under the direction of the Executive Committee; he shall keep a full account of his transactions, and report to the said Committee when so required, and to the Association at its annual meeting.

The Secretary shall keep a record of the proceedings of the meetings of the Association, and perform such other duties as usually pertain to the office.

The meetings of the Association shall be held annually or oftener, in ———.

The Executive Committee shall select and purchase the land, have it surveyed and the title examined, and procure a warranty deed for the same, executed to certain members chosen by the Association as their Trustees, they shall place the deed in the keeping of the Treasurer, draw on him for the cost of the land and expenses, and pay the amount thereof.

The Association shall employ a faithful and competent Superintendent, who shall reside upon the settlement, and select with much care, worthy, industrious colored people to whom to sell the land; it shall be his duty also to infuse spirit and enterprise among them, and to instruct them how to manage to the best advantage, and he shall seek for opportunities to inculcate true religion and morality, and to promote literary education and industry and thrift among them.

The lands shall be sold subject to the following condition:

No distillery, brewery, or other manufactory of spirituous, distilled or fermented liquors shall be erected or permitted on any portion of these lands; nor shall any of the above mentioned liquors be stored or kept for sale on any of them; and the lands shall revert to the Trustees of the Association in case of any violation of this condition.

The tract shall be divided into plots of twenty acres, including space for road way in front of each.

The Superintendent's salary and other necessary expenses, such as surveying, examining title, &c., shall be added to the cost before the various plots are appraised.

At the time he buys, each settler shall pay a small amount down, and make quarterly payments as shall hereafter be fixed upon, for the second year and through each year to the fifth year inclusive. On paying in full, he will receive a deed from the Trustees of the Association, giving him full possession.

Every other plot will be reserved at first, so that in case a settler, through his industry and thrift, may have the means to buy more land, he can take the plot next to him, or it may be divided between two of them.

If the means at the command of the Association shall warrant it, necessary farm implements, and a few mules for work may be bought, and given in charge of the Superintendent, to hire out to the settlers, and for awhile a few cows kept to sell milk to families having small children. W. B. C.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, NINTH MONTH 25, 1869.

Western Yearly Meeting opened at Plainfield, Ind., on Sixth-day, the 17th inst., with that devotional silence which is an acknowledgment of the presence of Christ by His Spirit, and of the necessity of relying upon his Presidency and guidance. This was broken by a revival of the words, "Happy is the people whose God is the Lord," with desires for a present application of the language, followed by thanksgiving for many blessings, among which was numbered the privilege of thus meeting,—and prayer for the Spirit's outpouring, &c. The representatives, from eleven Quarterly Meetings, were all in their places except four. Credentials for ministers belonging to other Yearly Meetings were read, as follows: From Ohio Y.M., Richard Harkness and Asa C. Tuttle. From Indiana Y.M., Daniel Williams, Robert W. Douglass, Luke Woodard, Amos Bond, Jesse Reese, Ruth Johnson, Irena A. Overman. From Iowa Y.M., Mary B. Pinkham, Isom P. Wooton, Mary Cox. Also for the following companions, all Elders. Deborah R. Harkness, Margery D. Wooton, Thos. Pinkham, Benj. Cox, Tobias Meader. Minutes were also read for Isaac Stanley and John Overman. The usual routine of organization and appointment of committees, and the discussion of a case of difficulty in the discharge of discipline, reported by one of the Quarterly Meetings, occupied the remainder of the first sitting. The case was referred to a committee.

A public meeting for worship in the afternoon was felt to be a season of Divine favor. In the evening a General Meeting of the Book and Tract Committee was held, in which evidence was presented of commendable activity and care in distribution.

Our dear aged Friend Asenath Clark was in attendance.

Iowa Yearly Meeting, (Continued.)—At the opening of the second sitting, the Representatives proposed the name of Joel Bean as Clerk, and for assistant Clerks, Jeptha W. Morgan and Elias Jessup. The nomination was approved and confirmed, but J. W. Morgan being recalled to his home on account of the illness of his aged father, Isaac T. Gibson was appointed to fill the place. Through the course of the Yearly Meeting many prayers were offered, for Divine guidance and preservation in conducting the affairs of the Church, and for the rebuking of the enemy of souls, that no evil spirit of estrangement should find entrance, but that the fathers and mothers and the babes in Christ, the aged, the strong men and the youth, might be kept together in the bond of peace, walking Zionward in the unity of the Spirit. A considerable number of religious visits were interchanged between the men's and women's meetings, all of which are reported as satisfactory and edifying. Considerable time was occupied in the appointment of committees and necessary routine business. The answering of the Queries introduced a searching consideration of the state of Society. Various deficiencies were reported, and much valuable counsel was extended. The dear Friends from Great Britain labored much as commissioned Ambassadors for Christ.

The tobacco question was faithfully handled, and a strong desire prevailed that Friends should be emancipated from a servitude so unseemly and unwholesome. "Know ye not that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey?" Direction was sent, over all the rolling and wide-spread prairies, that subordinate meetings should next year send up a statement of the number of members who habitually use (or rather mis-use) tobacco.

The discipline regarding Secret Societies was referred to a committee who are to report next year. We learn, also, with some solicitude, that a proposal to limit the term of the appointment of Elders was also so referred. The report of the Book and Tract Committee showed a largely increased work of distribution.

Public meetings for worship were held on Fourth-day, (8th inst.,) and, by appointment, evening meetings were held in various places in Oskaloosa. On Third-day evening a lecture upon Peace, by Wm. G. Hubbard, was well attended, and a large and interesting meeting was held on Fourth-day afternoon in the interests of Scriptural Schools.

On First-day, the 12th, meetings were held in at least four different places, both in the morning and afternoon, the attendance of non-members being unusually large; and our correspondent writes: "The Lord's ministering servants were favored by His help to proclaim the glad tidings of the gospel to the assembled multitudes."

[Further notice of the Yearly Meetings of Iowa, Western and Ohio must be deferred.]

THE BRITISH FRIEND ON "REVIVALS."—Our contemporary, without, as we feel sure, an intention to do injustice, has really misconstrued our meaning. He designates a special and local "revival," and erroneously assumes that certain passages of general bearing in our Editorial of Seventh mo. 31st had reference to the same occasion. The British Friend says:

> The Review seems disposed to consider this revival as having a right source. "If the signs of the times," says the Editor, "indicate that the all-moving Spirit is now purifying people unto himself, let us have a reverent care that nothing mar the blessed work."

With these words we feel no uneasiness, but they were quoted as being antagonistic to views which they do not oppose. The British Friend proceeds:

> Another remark of the Editor is somewhat disagreeable, as it appears to reproach such as do not see things in the same light as himself. He says, "It would almost seem that some persons desire the prosperity of Zion exclusively in the grooves of old routine, and are less grieved by the deadness of indifference, than by the exuberances, and it may be the eccentricities, that mark the living results, when the plants of the Lord 'bud through the scent of water.'"

It was hardly fair to stop here at a comma, ignoring the intent of the whole paragraph, and omitting the conclusion to which the words quoted were only preliminary. Our editorial continued thus:

"and, invigorated by the return of sap, 'revive as the corn and grow as the vine!' Thus reviving and thus growing, branches will shoot forth which the wise Husbandman will prune or even lop away. But the vine may yield more fruit, and this pruning is not in displeasure but in love, for life is His gift, and is pleasing to Him."

The editorial in question was penned in reference to the unquestionable fact that the Spirit of the Lord has been moving in various parts of North America upon the hearts of the people. No single locality was exclusively or especially in the Editor's mind. We well knew that in many places lukewarmness existed, which is offensive in the Divine sight. When we heard that in some places life was stirred, and that an affirmative answer had become due to the ancient query, "Is there any growth in the Truth among you?" we bowed the head and made the exclamation which has been imperfectly quoted against us—"let us have a reverent care that nothing mar the blessed work so fervently desired." We had heard of such "growth in the Truth" in places where God had clearly visited his people and the pure doctrine had "distilled as the dew," and awakened souls, "no more children, tossed to and fro," had grown up unto Him which is the Head, "from whom the whole body fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the edifying of itself in love." We had heard with grief of excitement in some places, which had resulted in fruits we could not own. From other localities came reports which could not be doubted, of ungodly men converted unto God—a real awakening from that state of which the Holy Spirit said, "I would that thou wast either hot or cold," to a zeal which might need regulating, but which was prima facie indicative of life. "The grave cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee—the living, the living he shall praise thee." Rumors reached us of irregularities, as viewed from a conventional standpoint, and of usages such as we would not criticise in members of other Christian societies, but which deviate from the views of the Society of Friends, in the support of which the Review has never wavered.

In such a critical era, so pregnant with results to our beloved Society, the Editor did not feel that he was to perform the functions of an unbidden censor, and to beat his fellow servants. Where the good wheat springs the enemy sows tares. A rash, misguided zeal would root up both together. It is in accordance with the holiest counsel to wait for the full development. (Matt. xiii. 29.) We would not, for the sake of an onslaught upon suspected tares hundreds of miles distant from us, endanger the true seed which is to bring glory to the good Husbandman. Nor would we, sitting in lukewarmness, and criticising the wind which bloweth where it listeth, when the altar sends incense of devotion from the hearts of those who follow not precisely with us, dare to exclaim, "We hope that this strange fire will soon burn out." [These words are from another contemporary.] Rather would we ejaculate, as in the first sentence of the garbled editorial, "O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years!" and breathe an aspiration that He whose love and care for His own Church is unspeakably greater than that of any denominational Editor, will endow fathers and mothers, judges and counsellors, with wise discernment and with religious weightiness, to apply the needed checks, and administer the requisite pruning, without injury to any fruit-bearing branch engrafted into the living vine.

Revival in religious life, as regards the body at large and the individuals composing it, is the mission of the Spirit—the concern of the Church—the object of the Ministry. The prophet gazing upon a great congregation of dry bones, was inspired to say, "Come, oh breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live!" and there arose unto the Lord "an exceeding great army." There is no less efficacy now than formerly in faith, and in the prayer of faith. When to any district or congregation there shall come a day of the Lord's visitation and power, and the anointing shall flow from vessel to vessel, as in the morning of our religious Society, our esteemed contemporary will join with us in thankful rejoicing: and may none of us be so enwrapped with a righteousness of our own as to be insensible to the proclamation: "Jesus of Nazareth passeth by." Will not our brother Editor then adopt as a motto, the very words that have been "disagreeable" to him?—"Let us have a reverent care that nothing mar the blessed work so fervently desired."

Lands for the Freedmen.—Attention is called to the benevolent scheme set forth in the "Plan" taken from the Poughkeepsie Eagle. Our Friend Wm. B. Collins of that city is deeply interested in this movement. Those who desire to promote it are advised to communicate with him.

The General Meeting for Scotland was held at Aberdeen, in the new premises, as we learn from the British Friend, on Second-day, 8th mo. 16th. The public meetings for worship on First-day, the 15th, both in the morning and evening; there was a large attendance of non-members, and they were seasons of Divine favor. In addition to their own members, the following ministers were present with credentials: Sarah F. Smiley, James N. Richardson, Sarah B. Satterthwaite, Richard Bell, William Ball, and others both from Ireland and England. Sarah F. Smiley gave, at the close of one of the business sittings, an interesting account of her visit to Shetland and Orkney, where she held sixty meetings in the course of fifty-four days, among the different islands. These had everywhere been very satisfactory, and generally well attended, the people of the islands evincing much earnestness to come, often at very short notice. Her mind not being relieved of concern towards the people of Orkney, she re-embarked for that group on the 17th, accompanied by George and Mary Cruikshank of Aberdeen. The Monthly Meeting of Aberdeen was held on Seventh-day, the 14th.

James Owen and Isaac Sharp.—At the date of 8th mo. 9th these Friends were still laboring in Norway and Sweden. Several meetings in the vicinity of Stavanger were attended by youth who evinced much tenderness. These were objects of much solicitude, as they had nearly attained the age when choice must be made between confirmation in the Lutheran Church and a faithful adhesion to the simple and spiritual profession in which they had been trained. In several places an agreeable openness was shown by persons not Friends in giving the use of their houses for the meetings. A farewell meeting was held at Stavanger, 8th mo. 20th, where the ministry turned upon the spirituality and freedom of the last days and the cessation of types, and also the exemption from condemnation of those who are in Christ Jesus, walking not after the flesh but after the Spirit. "A few calls," writes Isaac Sharp, "were made, one of them upon Ole Kroc, whose eye is yet bright at 84—an Israelite indeed." Accompanied by their kind Friend Endre Dahl, they proceeded northward. After holding several meetings they reached Quinnisdal, where they were "comfortably entertained in the loft above the meeting-house, fitted up for the accommodation of travelling Friends, and here, on our beds of soft straw, we slept soundly." I. S. continues, in his letter in the British Friend:

"At this place resides our friend Tollay Roisland, a minister, who has a gift, under the exercise of which we have seen many tears shed—simple, deep, and full; coming from the heart it goes to the heart, and leaves no room to doubt either the call or the qualification. At this place father and mother, children and grandchildren assemble regularly with their friends for public worship, one after another having discontinued their connection with the 'state church.' Two meetings were held on First-day, the 25th, and on the following morning a parting meeting about 9. To these meetings came two hardy stalwart mountaineers from Quasogn, a distance of thirty miles. We went to see them at their own homes, holding meetings on the way. A few profess with us at and near Christiansand, where a very small meeting was held. We endeavored to see two prisoners at this place, detained in confinement for refusal to bear arms; access to one was entirely refused, and the other was only allowed to be with us in the presence of a third person, freedom of speech being disallowed. A few days were spent at Christiania, the capital of Norway, in which city, and in Stockholm, openings were sought and found for public service, not unattended in both cases with the trial of faith; but with a confiding trust in the retrospect, that goodness and mercy had followed us from place to place, and that divine guidance had been sought and found.

"We left Stockholm early in the morning of Second-day the 9th, and travelled continuously via Malmo and Copenhagen to Veile, in the south of Jutland, and arrived there on Fourth-day morning, between 8 and 9. This place had rested clearly on James Owen's mind as a starting-point. There are a few serious persons in this place whose views are much in unison with those of Friends, but no meeting is kept up; we were interested in seeking them out. Notices were distributed for a meeting in a large room in Brandt's Hotel, and thither the people came freely at 8, among them the Wesleyan minister, who speaks good English, and was very cordial. The meeting was solid and settled; it was a time of much openness, and James Owen was engaged in ministry and prayer. It was nearly half-past 10 before all had left. At Randus, on the evening of the following day, a little meeting was held in a private house, where about twenty assembled, who have conscientiously withdrawn from the 'state church,' and are more or less attached to Friends. This little visit was cordially acknowledged, and on the following morning, on parting from Rasmus K. Kjœr, at whose house the meeting was held, he remarked, 'I cannot express the joy your visit has given.'

"No railway communication at present exists north of Randus, although an extension of the line is in the course of construction, and nearly ready for opening. Covered carriages, for four inside, carrying the mail, are regularly dispatched by road, and afford a ready means of getting from one place to another on the direct route. If one carriage is not sufficient another is put on, and in case of need another still, if due notice is previously given. For every pound weight above thirty a small charge is made. The luggage is well cared for, and its value refunded in case of loss. The whole being under the supervision of the government, the driver is smartly dressed in a livery of scarlet and blue, and on departure and arrival blows his bugle loud and long.

We left Randus about half-past 10 on Sixth-day morning, and got to Aalborg in about eight hours. No meeting of Friends is kept up in this place, but we were much interested in seeking out a few who profess with them. Considerable time was spent on Seventh-day morning in looking after a suitable place for a meeting, and finally the theatre had the preference. Thither we repaired on First-day morning at 10. Notices had been freely circulated, with invitations to attend, by handbills and in two public papers. On nearing the place we saw but few people in the street, and fewer still in the long passage way, with its dim and shadowy light. On opening the door we found the benches chiefly empty, but on the front seats sat a little company of men and women who had assembled punctually at the advertised hour. We took our seats on the raised platform, Reier Reierson of Stavanger, as interpreter, sitting between us. On the table in our front two candles were burning, no provision having been made in this building for the admission of daylight. No sound of revelry was heard; few, if any, were now present accustomed to the scenes so often witnessed there—even this place failed to secure their attendance. A pendant from the ceiling, with twelve burners and globes, lit up the place. A stillness, as the stillness of a Westminster meeting, was there, while a little band of silent worshippers sought to draw near to Him 'who dwelleth not in temples made with hands,' but who in tender mercy condescended to own the united prayer which arose for a blessing on those assembled, and who, gathered together in the name of Jesus, could humbly rejoice that He was in their midst. The meeting was subsequently addressed by James Owen and the writer. With a few who came in after the meeting first gathered, about 75 were present altogether. In the afternoon at 3, agreeably with the notice given, we met again. About three times as many were now present as in the forenoon, among whom James Owen had a remarkably open time in prayer and ministry. The gospel message flowed freely forth, and sinners were warned and entreated, ere yet too late, by repentence toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ, to lay hold on eternal life. Information had been forwarded to those professing with Friends who reside in the country, both male and female, and five or six of these (probably more), although employed in domestic or farm service, came a distance of from 20 to 25 miles, walking the greater part of the way. It had been agreed that those who feel attached to Friends should remain for a meeting by themselves after the general public had withdrawn, but from the settled character of the afternoon meeting, and the seriousness evinced by many who were there, our friend James Owen felt it right to give notice that any who had been seriously impressed, and had a desire to do so, were at liberty to remain.

Between 70 and 80, being one-third of the entire company, did so, and a very interesting time it proved. Counsel flowed freely forth, and appeared to be as readily received; and little doubt rested on our minds that if a few right-minded, earnest Friends resided in this place, a meeting would be gathered and settled, with every prospect of others flowing to it; 'as sheep having no shepherd,' are words which at present seem to describe their condition —a condition eminently calculated to awaken a deep interest for and with them, and which has largely taken this direction, in being still in their midst—especially as regards a dear brother from the western world. During the evening we spent an hour or two at the house of Neils Madsen, where nearly 20 assembled, and some interesting conversation ensued of a religious character, many evincing their interest by taking part in it. The 91st Psalm was read, after which the knee was bent in prayer, and the company separated, each to their respective homes—thus passed a day of more than usual interest. After a few more meetings in Jutland, Minden, &c., will probably be taken on the way to England, where James Owen hopes to arrive the first week in 9th month."

DIED.

JOHNSON.—On the 21st of Third month, 1869, at the residence of her father Joseph Jones, in Morrow Co., Ohio, Elizabeth, wife of Pleasant T. Johnson, in her 37th year; a member of Rose Mount Monthly Meeting, Iowa. Through a protracted illness she manifested much patience and resignation to the Divine will, quoting the lines,

"Nothing in my hands I bring, Simply to thy cross I cling."

Her end was peace.

HUNT.—In the Sixth month, 1869, Thos. Hunt, a member of Poplar Run Mo. Meeting, Ind. This dear Friend, in his last sickness, often expressed his love for the Saviour and his resignation to the Divine will; and we reverently trust that through pardoning mercy his spirit is with the redeemed of the Lord.

NOTICE.

The Fifth Biennial Conference of Teachers and Delegates from Friends' First-day Schools in America will be held in Philadelphia, beginning Eleventh month 17th, 1869, at 4 o'clock P. M., for the consideration of the First-day School work and kindred subjects. All Friends interested in Scriptural Instruction are cordially invited to attend.

By order of the Executive Committee.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Friends' Work among the Indians.

[Extracts from letters of ENOCH HOAG, Sup't of Central Superintendency.]

LAWRENCE, KANSAS, 7th mo. 5.— . . . So far as I have been able to counsel with the chiefs and head men of different tribes, I have found not only a willingness but desire for the education of their youth. Our agents will all find a large field for active, efficient and Christian labor; and under this influence I know that they will be heartily supported by a goodly number of influential Indians. I was told to-day, in an hour's talk with Keokuk (head chief of Sac and Fox Indians) in company with his brother chiefs, that his tribe had long been anxiously waiting the arrival of their new agent. They understand well our efforts, and are very desirous to enter heartily into a higher and better life. They are about moving this fall to the Indian Country, and want schools as soon as they remove. All such wants in the different tribes I shall keep our friends informed of as we progress. We have a great labor in settling feuds and knotty questions of encroachments, of squatters' rights, where they have only stolen rights, of patent titles, &c., which are complicated and have grown from laxity in administering the laws. . . . . .

Since Brinton Darlington entered upon his service, I am informed by Commissioner Parker, there is a possibility of the Government making a change of the reservation allotted to the Indians under his care, which may retard a part of his labor for a season. . . .

The Osages, a part of the Neosho agency, are a suffering people, 3000 in number, and only $15,000 annuity, and are doing nothing in agriculture. They are obliged to go to the plains for game, or suffer from hunger; are enemies to the Cheyennes and exposed to conflicts, and need as good an agent as can be found. . . . . .

LAWRENCE, 9th mo. 3.— . . . I have just returned from the tribes of that agency residing in the northeastern part of the Indian Territory, who are doing well; I have visited all the tribes in Kansas, except Osages, and most of them twice, and am encouraged in finding them heartily desirous to co-operate with us in our efforts to elevate them in civilization.

Our friends of the Committee returned to-day, visiting only the tribes in the Indian Territory, Thos. Wistar and myself visiting the remainder; Lawrie Tatum accompanied them on his way to Yearly Meeting, and on a short trip to his home. He looks well, and is encouraged to progress in his field of labor. Brinton Darlington is now entering upon permanent duties, removing the Indians of his agency into the home of their choice on the north fork of the Canadian River, and adjoining the Kiowa reserve. If these Indians could have had this act of justice extended to them earlier, it would have lessened the expense of Government and secured peace on the frontier; but we have much to be thankful for that it is done even now. I would be glad, my dear friend, to write thee much on Indian matters, but it is out of my power without encroachment on other duties. I hope ere long to embody in a report more minutely and fully such matters as all our friends will need. . . . . .

Oskaloosa, Iowa, 9th mo. 8, 1869.— . . . Our Yearly Meeting is very large and interesting. The whole sitting of our Representative Meeting yesterday, was devoted to Indian matters, and elicited much interest. An adjourned meeting will convene to-morrow at 8 A.M., at which those in attendance from the Indian service are expected to give some account of the condition of the Indians.

Our English friends are present at all our sittings. I hope to be back in season to see the President's Commission, who (our committee thought) would reach Lawrence in about a week.

Lawrie Tatum is with us on his way to his home to settle his domestic business, and to return with his family, he having been temporarily relieved by Thos. Stanly.

He has made estimates for funds actually required to meet the necessary expense of his agency, required to carry out the principles of the treaty; and if the Department does not provide that required for this year, and Congress should fail in appropriating the required amount for 1870, our committee will be required to advise in the matter.

Oskaloosa, Iowa, 9th mo. 11, 1869.—I have about 1500 acres of land ploughed in my agency, in lots of from 10 to 400 acres, which I have contracted to have fenced. Many of these lots are for the Indians to cultivate, and they are not only willing but anxious to do it, especially if they are fenced so as to keep their ponies out of the fields. The Department at Washington has ordered me to suspend the fencing on account of scarcity of funds. I anticipate that they will not allow me to take as many hands there to cultivate the land as I wished to. I shall probably ascertain in a week or so. I think that Congress will make an appropriation to pay for the fencing, and to pay the farmers, and it will be a great disadvantage to the Indians if the fencing is not done during the coming winter, but it will be too late to fence after the appropriation is made. The spring work commences very early in the south-western part of the Indian Territory. . . .

Youth's Department.

ISAAC NEWTON.

BY NATHANIEL HAWTHORN.

On Christmas day, in the year 1642, Isaac Newton was born at the small village of Woolsthorpe, in England. Little did his mother think, when she beheld her new-born babe, that he was destined to explain many matters which had been a mystery ever since the creation of the world.

Isaac's father being dead, his mother was married again to a clergyman, and went to reside at North Witham. Her son was left to the care of his good old grandmother, who was very kind to him and sent him to school. In his early years Isaac did not appear to be a very bright scholar, but was chiefly remarkable for his ingenuity in all mechanical occupations. He had a set of little tools and saws of various sizes, manufactured by himself. With the aid of these Isaac contrived to make many curious articles, at which he worked with much skill.

The neighbors looked with vast admiration at the things which Isaac manufactured. And his old grandmother was never weary of talking about him.

"He'll make a capital workman one of these days," she would probably say. "No fear but Isaac will do well in the world and be a rich man before he dies."

It is amusing to conjecture what were the anticipations of his grandmother and the neighbors about Isaac's future life. Some of them, perhaps, fancied that he would make beautiful furniture of mahogany, rosewood, or polished oak, inlaid with ivory and ebony, and magnificently gilded. And then, doubtless, all the rich people would purchase these fine things to adorn their drawing-rooms. Others probably thought that little Isaac was destined to be an architect, and would build splendid mansions for the nobility and gentry, and churches too, with the tallest steeples that had ever been seen in England.

Some of his friends, no doubt, advised Isaac's grandmother to apprentice him to a clockmaker; for, besides his mechanical skill, the boy seemed to have a taste for mathematics, which would be very useful to him in that profession. And then, in due time, Isaac would set up for himself, and would manufacture curious clocks, like those that contain sets of dancing figures, which issue from the dial-plate when the hour is struck; or like those where a ship sails across the face of the clock, and is seen tossing up and down on the waves as often as the pendulum vibrates.

Indeed, there was some ground for supposing that Isaac would devote himself to the manufacture of clocks; since he had already made one, of a kind which nobody had ever heard of before. It was set agoing, not by wheels and weights like other clocks, but by the dropping of water. This was an object of great wonderment to all the people round about; and it must be confessed that there are few boys, or men either, who could contrive to tell what o'clock it is by means of a bowl of water.

Besides the water clock, Isaac made a sun-dial. Thus his grandmother was never at a loss to know the hour; for the water clock would tell it in the shade, and the dial in the sunshine. The sundial is said to be still in existence, at Woolsthorpe, on the corner of the house where Isaac dwelt. If so, it must have marked the passage of every sunny hour that has elapsed since Isaac Newton was a boy. It marked all the famous moments of his life; it marked the hour of his death; and still the sunshine creeps slowly over it, as regularly as when Isaac first set it up.

Yet we must not say that the sundial has lasted longer than its maker; for Isaac Newton will exist long after the dial—yea, and long after the sun itself—shall have crumbled to decay.

Isaac possessed a wonderful faculty of acquiring knowledge by the simplest means. For instance, what method do you suppose he took to find out the strength of the wind? You will never guess how the boy could compel that unseen, inconstant, and ungovernable wonder, the wind, to tell him the measure of his strength. Yet nothing can be more simple. He jumped against the wind, and by the length of his jump he could calculate the force of a gentle breeze, a brisk gale, or a tempest. Thus, even in his boyish sports, he was continually searching out the secrets of philosophy.

Not far from his grandmother's residence there was a windmill which operated on a new plan. Isaac was in the habit of going thither frequently, and would spend whole hours in examining its various parts. While the mill was at rest he pried into its internal machinery. When its broad sails were set in motion by the wind, he watched the process by which the millstones were made to revolve and crush the grain that was put into the hopper. After gaining a thorough knowledge of its construction, he was observed to be unusually busy with his tools.

It was not long before his grandmother and all the neighborhood knew what Isaac had been about. He had constructed a model of the windmill. Though not so large, I suppose, as one of the box traps which boys set to catch squirrels, yet every part of the mill and its machinery was complete. Its little sails were neatly made of linen, and whirled round very swiftly when the mill was placed in a draught of air. Even a puff of wind from Isaac's mouth, or from a pair of bellows, was sufficient to set the sails in motion. And, what was more curious, if a handful of grains of wheat were put into the little hopper, they would soon be converted into snow-white flour.

Isaac's playmates were enchanted with his new windmill. They thought that nothing so pretty and so wonderful had ever been seen in the whole world. . . . . .

As Isaac grew older, it was found that he had far more important matters in his mind than the manufacture of toys like the little windmill. All day long, if left to himself, he was either absorbed in thought, or engaged in some book of mathematics or natural philosophy. At night, I think it probable, he looked up with reverential curiosity to the stars, and wondered whether they were worlds like our own, and how great was their distance from the earth, and what was the power that kept them in their courses. Perhaps, even so early in life, Isaac Newton felt a presentiment that he should be able, hereafter, to answer all these questions.

When Isaac was fourteen years old, his mother's second husband being now dead, she wished her son to leave school and assist her in managing the farm at Woolsthorpe. For a year or two, therefore, he tried to turn his attention to farming. But his mind was so bent on becoming a scholar, that his mother sent him back to school, and afterwards to the University of Cambridge.

I have now finished my anecdotes of Isaac Newton's boyhood. My story would be far too long, were I to mention all the splendid discoveries which he made after he came to be a man. He was the first that found out the nature of light; for, before his day, nobody could tell what the sunshine was composed of. You remember, I suppose, the story of an apple's falling on his head, and thus leading him to discover the force of gravitation, which keeps the heavenly bodies in their courses. When he had once got hold of this idea, he never permitted his mind to rest until he had searched out the laws by which the planets are guided through the sky. This he did as thoroughly as if he had gone up among the stars and tracked them in their orbits. The boy had found out the mechanism of a windmill; the man explained to his fellow-men the mechanism of the universe.

While making these researches, he was accustomed to spend night after night in a lofty tower, gazing at the heavenly bodies through a telescope. His mind was lifted far above the things of this world. He may be said, indeed, to have spent the greater part of his life in worlds that lie millions of miles away; for where the thoughts and the heart are, there is our true existence.

Did you never hear the story of Newton and his little dog, Diamond? One day, when he was fifty years old, and had been hard at work more than twenty years studying the theory of light, he went out of his chamber, leaving his little dog asleep before the fire. On the table lay a heap of manuscript papers, containing all the discoveries which Newton had made during those twenty years. When his master was gone, up rose little Diamond, jumped upon the table, and overthrew the lighted candle. The papers immediately caught fire. Just as the destruction was completed, Newton opened the chamber door, and perceived that the labors of twenty years were reduced to a heap of ashes. There stood little Diamond, the author of all the mischief. Almost any other man would have sentenced the dog to immediate death. But Newton patted him on the head with his usual kindness, although grief was at his heart.

"O Diamond, Diamond," exclaimed he, "thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done!"

This incident affected his health and spirits for some time afterwards; but, from his conduct towards the little dog, you may judge what was the sweetness of his temper.

Newton lived to be a very old man, and acquired great renown, and was made a member of parliament, and received the honor of knighthood from the king. But he cared little for earthly fame and honors, and felt no pride in the vastness of his knowledge. All that he had learned only made him feel how little he knew in comparison to what remained to be known.

"I seem to myself like a child," observed he, "playing on the sea shore, and picking up here and there a curious shell, or a pretty pebble, while the boundless ocean of Truth lies undiscovered before me."

At last, in 1727, when he was fourscore and five years old, Sir Isaac Newton died—or rather, he ceased to live on earth. We may be permitted to believe that he is still searching out the infinte wisdom and goodness of the Creator, as earnestly, and with even more success than while his spirit animated a mortal body. He has left a fame behind him which will be as endurable as if his name were written in letters of light formed by the stars upon the midnight sky.—"True Stories."

IS YOUR LAMP BURNING?

A party of young Friends rambling through "The Glen" at Newport on a rural excursion, found the following lines, 8th mo. 31st, 1869:

"Say, is your lamp burning, my brother?
I pray you look quickly and see,
For if it were burning, then surely
Some beams would fall bright upon me.

"Straight, straight is the road, but I falter,
And oft I fall out by the way;
Then lift your lamp higher, my brother,
Lest I should make fatal delay.

"There are many and many around you
Who follow wherever you go;
If you thought that they walked in the shadow,
Your lamp would burn brighter, I know.

"Upon the dark mountains they stumble,
They are bruised on the rocks, and they lie
With their white pleading faces turned upward
To the clouds and the pitiful sky.

"There is many a lamp that is lighted,
We behold them anear and afar,
But not many among them, my brother,
Shine steadily on like a star.

"I think, were they trimmed night and morning,
They would never burn down or go out,
Though from the four quarters of heaven
The winds were all blowing about.

"If once all the lamps that are lighted
Should steadily blaze in a line,
Wide over the land and the ocean,
What a girdle of glory would shine!

"How all the dark places would brighten!
How the mists would roll up and away!
How the earth would laugh out in her gladness
To hail the millenial day!

"Say, is your lamp burning, my brother?
I pray you look quickly and see,
For if it were burning, then surely
Some beam would fall bright upon me."

DEATH OF AN INDIAN YOUTH AT CAUGHNAWAGA.

On last Sabbath morning, at the early age of 16 years, a youth died in this village, who should not pass away unnoticed. He was born of Indian parents, and although of a very amiable disposition, was quite ignorant of even the alphabet, and unable to speak a word of any language but the Iroquois, until about two years since he began to attend the Caughnawaga Mission School, where he showed a great desire and aptitude for learning, and continued to attend regularly until the school was dismissed on the 23d ult., for the Christmas vacation, when he was in the enjoyment of health and strength, and was regarded by the whole Indian population with much favor for his good conduct, and as one of the most promising of his race in the village.

His advance was so rapid in knowledge, and especially in the English language, that when his school-mates appeared not to understand their teacher, particularly on scriptural subjects, he often rose in his place, and with earnest simplicity sought to explain in his own language what they did not know, and point out to them more especially the way of salvation. He was assisting his father in making snow-shoes, and while at work often put into his mouth thongs of leather which had been unfortunately, as we might say, made of the skin of a horse which had died of disease, and became poisoned in his mouth, which swelled enormously; and, although the swollen part was removed by a surgeon, he died after much suffering, as the poison had penetrated every part of his body. Before his death he spoke to his parents and friends of God's love through Christ, and, conscious of his approaching end, expressed his wishes that he might meet them in heaven. As he was an only son, and a dutiful boy, his father allowed him to lay by all the money which he earned by making snow-shoes, lacrosse sticks, and other articles, which, at his death, amounted to a considerable sum, all of which he desired to be distributed among the destitute children of the village, in hope of their attending the school, and learning to love the Saviour who had been so precious to his soul.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—European advices to the 20th inst. have been received.

GREAT BRITAIN.—Violent gales had prevailed along the coast, in which it was estimated that 120 vessels had been wrecked, and several hundred seamen injured.

Among the deaths which have recently occurred are those of the Bishop of Exeter, aged 91 years; Thomas Graham, master of the mint and an eminent chemist; Peter Mark Roget, the author of "Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases," of one of the "Bridgewater Treatises," and of other contributions to science and literature, who had attained the age of 90; and Thomas John Penn, the last descendant, in the direct male line, of William Penn.

A demonstration in favor of the imprisoned Fenians was made in London on the 20th, by a procession and meeting of 6000 persons, presided over by an Irish member of Parliament.

IRELAND.—The General Synod of the Irish Church met in Dublin on the 15th. A protest against the act of disestablishment was passed unanimously.

In the Synod of Armagh, a resolution excluding the laity from deciding questions of doctrine and discipline, was rejected by a large majority.

The Farmers' Club adopted resolutions demanding perpetuity in land tenures, the placing of rents on a fixed basis, and the abolition of "distress" for rents. A national tenants' league was organized.

A meeting in favor of the release of the Fenian prisoners was held at Dundalk on the 13th, at which it was estimated 20,000 persons were present. The Lord Lieutenant, in reply to the corporation of Dublin, said that the government was attentively considering the land question and the release of the Fenians.

SPAIN.—Considerable public excitement had resulted from a communication made to the government by the United States Minister, which was understood to have reference to Cuba. As the note had not been published, various reports as to its substance were prevalent, some asserting that he had declared the intention of his government to recognize the Cuban insurgents as belligerents, if the effort to subdue them should be continued; some that he had remonstrated against the manner in which the Cubans were treated, especially prisoners; some that he had merely offered the mediation of his government between the government and the insurgents; and others that he had only made friendly representations to the Spanish government in favor of the reasonable demands of the Cubans. It is impossible to learn, as yet, what is the true version, but a strong determination to prosecute the war against the insurgents, with additional forces if necessary, and a hostile feeling toward the United States, were said to be manifested among the Spanish people. The latest reports were that the misunderstanding had been satisfactorily settled.

FRANCE.—The Emperor had so far recovered as to have presided in the Council of Ministers and appeared in the streets of Paris. It was reported that the Empress would again set off on her Eastern tour.

The Gaulois, a semi official journal, said that the majority of the Prince Imperial will be announced for his next birthday, 3d mo. 16th, 1870, when he will be fourteen years old. By the existing law, in case of the Emperor's death, the Empress would be Regent during her son's minority.

CHINA.—Recent accounts stated that the floods in the Yangtse river were subsiding, having done very great damage. The report of the murder of 20 missionaries in the province of Sechuen was contradicted.

JAPAN.—Private advices received in San Francisco represented the Japanese currency as in a disturbed state; much spurious money was in circulation, and paper currency at a discount. Trade was consequently dull. The Mikado was still at Jeddo. Great jealousy existed among the daimios, and another outbreak was apprehended. A conspiracy was recently discovered and defeated at Kioto, the object of which was to set up another Mikado. Prince Satsuma had protested against the execution of Ennomoto, the commander in the recent rebellion, and now a prisoner at Yeddo, whom the Mikado's party wished to put to death. A petition against Christianity had been presented to the government by three priests of high rank. There was considerable opposition to the movement for allowing foreigners to sit in the Japanese Parliament.

PRUSSIA.—The centennial anniversary of the birth of Humboldt was celebrated at Berlin on the 14th inst., deputations from the principal German cities taking part in the ceremonies.

SWITZERLAND.—An International Congress of Workingmen convened at Basle on the 14th, with a large number of delegates present. Letters and dispatches were received from various parts of Europe and North America. We have no account of the proceedings.

HOLLAND.—During the session of the Statistical Congress at the Hague, a motion was made for a collection of statistics respecting military services, with a view to the reduction of standing armies. An American member supported the motion in a speech in which he contrasted the armaments of Europe with those of the United States; and referred to the recent war in the letter for the suppression of the rebellion, with the speedy return of the soldiers to peaceful avocations, to show that even to pay the cost of that war does not impoverish and weaken the country so much as standing armies do European States.

SOUTH AMERICA.—Advices from Brazil received at Lisbon, containing intelligence from Asuncion to the 18th ult., reported that the Allies had captured Ascurra and Pirribebin, that President Lopez had fled and the Paraguayans were unable to continue the struggle. The provisional government had been installed at Asuncion. This news was regarded in Brazil and the Argentine Confederation as showing the termination of the war, and caused great rejoicing. We have not yet received the Paraguayan account, which may give a different representation.

DOMESTIC.—Governor Walker was installed on the 21st as Provisional Governor of Virginia, taking the "ironclad oath," and the other oaths of office. Gov. Wells had resigned, after the publication of Attorney General Hoar's opinion on the subject of the oath.

Joseph Buckley was born at Maer, in Staffordshire, in the Fifth Month, 1804. His parents were connected with the Church of England, so called, and in early life he was brought up in the regular attendance of their place of worship, and in conformity with the rites and ceremonies of their profession. Being encouraged by his parents, after returning from their place of worship, to search out the texts quoted by the preacher, he soon acquired considerable knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and records, in his sixty-third year, with grateful emotion, his sense of the value of the solemn truths contained therein. He was early permitted to realize the operations of the Holy Spirit upon his heart, which are best indicated in his own words, written in reference to his youthful days: "Not unfrequently, in the midst of mirth and merriment, singing and dancing, did I feel sad at heart; the arrows of conviction, the reproofs of heavenly love, penetrated my soul; the Light was shining in darkness, while the darkness comprehended it not."

When about eighteen years of age, his parents having changed their place of residence, he became associated with several serious young men among the Wesleyans, and shortly afterwards was united in religious profession with that body, actively engaging in tract distribution, visiting the sick, and First-day school teaching. During this period he was not insensible to the devices of the tempter, who is ever watching for opportunity to turn aside into the letter those who have begun in the spirit, frequently retiring to his chamber, pouring out his soul in prayer for preservation in the hour of temptation and need. As the work of Divine Grace deepened, a narrower path opened before him, in which he was led to take up the cross in reference to greater simplicity of dress and increased care in the description of the books he read.

About this time he perused with close attention, Turford's "Grounds of a Holy Life," and was thereby more fully confirmed in the nature of true religion, apart from all outward profession of it. Under the convictions of the Spirit of Truth, the simplicity and spirituality of the Gospel dispensation became more and more apparent; scruples arose in his mind on various points, and he could no longer unite in the payment of ministers for their service; he records, "I was permitted to see that the ministry of the Gospel was designed to be without money and without price, having been freely received from Christ; and that on each occasion it should be exercised under the renewed putting forth of the Holy Spirit: I pondered these important principles with careful attention, and the more I investigated the more clearly I perceived that they were the principles of Truth as exhibited in the New Testament."

In his twentieth year he attended two meetings for worship, held at the request of ministers in the Society of Friends: of one of these he remarks, "It was a time of deep religious feeling, a time never to be forgotten; my heart was tendered and brought under the baptizing power of the Spirit of Christ:

I felt drawn towards the profession of the faith I had thus heard preached in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." Shortly afterwards he walked twelve miles to Leek, to attend the small meeting of Friends held there, of which he writes, "It was a precious time, in which I earnestly sought Divine direction and holy help to walk in the way of life and peace." In the attendance of this small meeting he was permitted to realize the value of silent waiting upon God, and the blessedness of the promise, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." He writes, "I soon found the time had come when I could no longer unite with the people with whom I had associated, and whom I greatly loved. I endeavored, with the help vouchsafed, to follow the convictions of the Holy Spirit, who was leading me into a narrower path than I had hitherto walked in."

In the autumn of 1825 he removed to Liverpool: here renewed visitations of Divine love were granted him, and clearer views opened before him as to his future course: and whilst greater simplicity seemed to be required of him, both in dress and language, earnest were his desires to be strengthened to travel on in the narrow path, though hard to flesh and blood.

In the Sixth Month, 1829, he was received into membership by Hardshaw West Monthly Meeting. He had witnessed from time to time some glimmerings of heavenly light pointing to the belief that at a future period he would be called to speak as a minister of Christ: this belief strengthened on his mind, and after many conflicts of spirit he was enabled to resign himself to the will of his Heavenly Father, and the language of his heart was, "Here am I, do with me as seemeth Thee good." Joseph Buckley first spoke as a minister in Preston meeting, in the Eighth Month, 1836, and he continued to occupy the gift entrusted to him under a reverent sense of the importance and solemnity of entering on public vocal service in meetings for Divine worship.

In the summer of the same year he was united in marriage to Mary, daughter of William and Jane Houlding, and in 1837 they removed to Manchester, and he remained a member of this Monthly Meeting the rest of his life. He was recorded a minister in our Society in the Second Month, 1843. His communications in his own meeting were neither long nor frequent, but generally marked by weight and simplicity, and we believe he was careful only to exercise his gift under the immediate anointing of the Holy Spirit: his sympathies were often drawn forth towards those who meet in little companies; frequent were his visits and comforting and strengthening his labors to the smaller meetings of his own and adjoining Mo. Meetings.

With the counsel and unity of his friends he travelled several times through various parts of England, and once in Scotland. In 1856 he was liberated to pay a visit to Friends and others in Norway, where his labors of love were often peculiarly owned by the Great Head of the Church. In 1863 he again visited the Continent, accompanied by a younger minister of his own Quarterly Meeting, visiting the meetings and families of Friends in Minden, Pyrmont and the south of France, and uniting in some religious service with those not in profession with us. Whilst bright and cheerful in his general intercourse with those around him, he had often to pass through seasons of conflict; and the trial of his faith was frequently proved through deep and sore baptisms, tending to his growth in his ministerial gift, the humbling of his spirit, and fuller dedication to the service of his Lord. He was concerned for the promotion of sound Christian doctrine and practice, and for the prevalence of right order and true harmony within our borders.

In the summer of 1866 he was cordially set at liberty to pay a second visit to Norway and some parts of Sweden: in this journey he was again accompanied by a minister of the same Quarterly Meeting.

His health, which had been generally good, was much impaired by a serious illness in the autumn of 1864, when on religious service in the North of England. He occasionally remarked to some of his intimate friends that he felt the progress of disease and bodily infirmity, and the increased necessity of keeping his lamp trimmed and his light burning, that he might be ready for the summons of his Lord. In the Fourth Month of the present year he was entirely prostrated, and for a period of nearly six months passed through great bodily suffering, which was borne with much patience and resignation.

During this protracted season of affliction many weighty expressions were uttered by him. We extract the following:—

"I often think of our beloved Society, and long for its prosperity: if the truth is to progress and the Church to shine, it must be through the humble and lowly ones dwelling near to the source of life, and being faithful to the convictions of the Holy Spirit, becoming willing to follow the gentle drawings of a Saviour's love, taking up the cross, denying self, and bearing the yoke of Christ. Ah! the wisdom of man, the pride of the human heart, the loftiness of the unrenewed nature,—how can they comprehend the things of God,—how can they understand the mysteries of Christ,—how can they direct the affairs of his Church!"

At another time he says, "I feel that in all probability I shall never leave this room again: though the poor frame is so worn and enfeebled, my mind is preserved calm and clear, and I can look forward to the end with an unshaken trust: time with me is very uncertain: I desire to be resigned to the will of my Heavenly Father, and am enabled to leave all in his hands. I know that my Redeemer liveth, and I have a humble hope and confidence that He will not leave me. I have not followed cunningly devised fables, but a living, and I can now say blessed, reality. My trust is in the mercy of God through Jesus Christ my Saviour, who loved me and gave Himself for me: it is on Him alone I rely, not on any works of mine: in his love He visited me and drew me by his grace, and now I feel it is through Him I have forgiveness of all my sins, and the hope that is full of immortality: I feel that He is near, and that is enough for me."

He was greatly enfeebled and worn by long suffering, and during the last few days of his life became much exhausted, gradually sinking till early in the morning of the 27th of Ninth month, 1868, he gently passed away, entering, as we reverently believe, into the full fruition of his Master's joy.

A recorded minister twenty-five years. His remains were interred in the burying-ground at Ashton-on-Mersey on the 1st of Tenth Month, 1868.

"DIARY, REMINISCENCES AND CORRESPONDENCE OF HENRY CRABB ROBINSON."

The "Reminiscences" of Henry Crabb Robinson appear to me to be a valuable contribution to our knowledge of the great men and events of his time. He seems to have been aware that his work was not to originate, but to observe and record. To a friend who asked why he had never undertaken any extensive literary work, he replied:

"It is because I am a wise man. I early found that I had not the literary ability to give me such a place among English authors as I should have desired; but I thought that I had an opportunity of gaining a knowledge of many of the most distinguished men of the age, and that I might do some good by keeping a record of my interviews with them."

The same modest estimate of his own powers is indicated in another passage.

"It has more than once occurred to me that I might be easily induced myself to deliver a lecture on Wordsworth, but I fear I am now too old and too indolent. By the bye, what is often called indolence, is in fact, the unconscious consciousness of incapacity—the importunity to overcome it is often injudicious," &c.

Acting upon this conviction, he made it his business, upon all proper occasions, and apparently without impertinent intrusion, to associate himself with all persons of distinction in social or literary life within his reach; and made diligent use of the opportunities thus afforded for collecting items of interest.

The books before us are the "Siftings," as we are told in the Preface, of thirty-five volumes of Diary, and thirty of Journals of his travels, besides great quantities of other memoranda, extending over 57 years. He made several long visits on the Continent, during which he became acquainted with Goethe, Schiller, Madame de Stael and many others, of whom interesting sketches are given. Coleridge, Southey, Lamb and Wordsworth were among his English intimates. For the latter especially he entertained the highest regard as a poet and a man.

His great conversational powers were freely exercised, as we may infer from a caution seriously given him by a friend after an illness—"Not to talk more than two hours consecutively,"—upon which he remarks, "Is this satire? It does not offend me."

He was an infatigable reader, and his studies extended over a wide scope. John Woolman's Journal especially delighted him. He says of another religious work:

"It was written rather to alarm than persuade, and to some would have the effect of deterring from belief. How different this from John Woolman's Journal I have been reading at the same time. A perfect gem! His is a beautiful soul. An illiterate tailor, he writes in a style of the most exquisite purity and grace. His moral qualities are transferred to his writings. Had he not been so very humble, he would have written a still better book; for, fearing to indulge in vanity, he conceals the events in which he was a great actor. His religion is love. His whole existence and all his passions were love. If one could venture to impute to his creed, and not to his personal character, the delightful frame of mind which he exhibited, one could not hesitate to be a convert. His Christianity is most inviting—it is fascinating."

In 1865, he writes, of President Lincoln's Inaugural speech:

"It has fixed me more decidedly than ever in favor of him personally. It is an earnest, honest speech. As to slavery, he speaks both solemnly and wisely. How short and how wise! How true and how unaffected! It must make many converts."

The diary was regularly continued until within five days of his death, which took place in 1867, at the age of 92. F.

PRAYING AND WORKING.

I like that saying of Martin Luther, when he says, "I have so much business to do to-day, that I shall not be able to get through it with less than three hours' prayer." Now, most people would say, "I have so much business to do to-day, that I have only three minutes' prayer; I cannot afford the time." But Luther thought that the more he had to do the more he must pray, or else he could not get through it. That is a blessed kind of logic, may we understand it! "Praying and provender hinder no man's journey." If we have to stop and pray, it is no more a hindrance than when the rider has to stop at the farrier's to have his horse's shoe fastened; for if he went on without attending to that, it may be that ere long he would come to a stop of a far more serious kind.—C. H. Spurgeon.

SIR WILLIAM JONES ON THE BIBLE.

BY JOSEPH SANSOM.

Sir William Jones, the orientalist, one of the judges of the supreme court of judicature in Bengal, confessedly one of the first philosophers of the present age, in one of his latest annual discourses before the Asiatic Society, is thought to have done more to give validity to the Mosaic account of the Creation than any contemporary researches of the learned. This great scholar is well known to have been particularly eminent for his attainments in Astronomy, Chronology, Antiquities, Languages, and Natural History, as well as Law. Before he went to India, it is said that he was not free himself from the sceptical bias against the authority of the Scriptures: but, when in Asia, finding, in the course of his researches into the antiquities of the East, that many of the leading circumstances of the Mosaic history were detailed, with various degrees of corruption, or perversion, in the writings of the Hindoos, he set himself to investigate, with minute and rigid attention, all those intricate theological points, which had occasioned his doubts; and the result was his entire conviction of the verity of the Mosaic records. After his decease, this declaration was found written on one of the blank leaves of his common reading Bible:

"I have regularly and attentively read the Holy Scriptures, and am of opinion that the collection of tracts, which we call, from their excellence, the Scriptures, contains (independently of a Divine origin) more true sublimity, more exquisite beauty, purer morality, more important history, and finer strains, both of poetry and eloquence, than could be collected, within the same compass, from all other books that were ever composed, in any age, or in any idiom.

"The two parts of which the Scriptures consist are connected by a chain of compositions [the Prophets, &c.] which bear no resemblance, in form or style, to any that can be produced from the stores of Grecian, Indian, Persian, or even Arabian learning.

"The antiquity of those compositions no man doubts; and the unconstrained application of them to events long subsequent to their publication, is a solid ground of belief that they were genuine predictions, and consequently inspired."

TO PARENTS AND TO OTHERS ENTRUSTED WITH THE CARE OF THE YOUNG.

In love would I express my warm desire that parents, who in the providence of God are the guardians of children born to an eternal existence, may ask for strength from above to train them in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. We know that we cannot give grace, but we also know that our Father in heaven hears the prayers of a loving parent, and answers them as He seeth meet. What greater blessing can any one ask for his beloved offspring than that, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, they may be brought to love the Lord their God with all the heart; to look unto our blessed Saviour as an ever-present helper, to calm their troubled spirits, to deliver them out of their little perplexities and sorrows, and to bring them to ask, through Him, for the forgivenes of all their sins.

We know, my dear friends, that in his great mercy our Heavenly Father at times grants in very early life the immediate visitations of his love. Permit me to invite you judiciously to encourage your dear children to take heed to these convictions for sin and attractions to that which is good.

What an unspeakable privilege is a tender, enlightened conscience! How precious is this experience from early childhood! how great the blessings of a humble, loving, contrite spirit, of the reverent, filial fear and love of God, and of love to Christ as a compassionate, all-sufficient Saviour! But wait not, my dear friends, for this experience in your dear children; speak to them of their proneness by nature to sin, of their own evil hearts, warn them to flee from the misery of sin, and from its wretched consequences. Imbue their minds from early life with a sense of the divine authority of Holy Scripture. Instruct them from one time to another in its invaluable contents, directing them to the light of the Holy Spirit shining upon its pages. Remind them from one time to another of the sufferings and death of their Redeemer, and of the great object of his sacrifice on the cross. Teach them the holy precepts of our blessed Lord. Bring before them his spotless example. Cautiously and lovingly but decidedly habituate them to accept the truth that the Lord looketh at the heart, that He knoweth the thoughts, the words and the acts of all—that whilst he punishes the wicked, his tender mercies are over all his works. Enjoin upon them truth speaking. Teach them to shun all equivocation, deceit, or cunning. In short, my dear friends, seek to cultivate in them every Christian virtue and every Christian grace. In judiciously instilling scriptural counsel and instruction, may the right opportunity be watched, may the capacity of the child, as well as his peculiar temperament, be borne in mind—but not to the neglect of the right duties of the parent, whatever may be the discouragements that will present. Impress upon their minds the true character of worship, the great privilege of prayer. Even little childen are, I believe, often more able to understand these duties than some may apprehend.

I write in kindness and sympathy with parents. You may be painfully sensible of your own weakness, and of your want of qualifications for the service. None ought to have, and generally speaking none will have, greater influence with the young than pious parents. A sense of need brings to the throne of grace—a just consciousness of our own deficiencies lead to earnest petitions for help from the Lord; and that very exercise of mind is blessed to the parent. However varied as is the future character in life, as these duties have been performed, and as tender parental authority shall have been uniformly maintained, in dependence upon the help of the Lord, there will be a cheering prospect of happiness to the parent and to the child.

The suggestions which have been already offered to the Christian parent will, I hope, furnish subject of serious reflection to the teacher or the schoolmaster, to whom the young may be entrusted. He will find their dispositions, their previous training, their temptations, and their capacities greatly diversified. But as he looks unto the Lord in faith, asking for strength to act with gentleness and patience, he will be helped wisely to impart the needful counsel to his charge, whether to them separately or collectively. The mental faculties will be expanding. Whilst parents and teachers will act wisely in the exercise of mutual confidence, it will be the duty of both to attach continued importance to the training of the young in the knowledge of the great truths of Holy Scripture. With the improved intellectual cultivation of the present day, I would encourage the giving to the young some instruction, in the latter years of school education, on the external evidences of the truths recorded in the Old and New Testament. "They are declarations which rest on the authority of God himself, being the appointed means of making known to us the blessed truths of Christianity."*

In the Bible we are taught the wisdom, power, and greatness of our Father in heaven. It is in that sacred volume that we learn that it is He who created us, and who, in his infinite love, has provided for our redemption by the coming in the flesh of his beloved Son, of Him who is the author of eternal salvation to them that obey Him. Whilst I attempt not to describe the many glorious truths of life and immortality brought to light through the Gospel, I again offer my feeble testimony to the inestimable value of Holy Scripture. It is in my high reverence for its record that I wish all my young friends to be instructed in its sacred truths. The varied, very interesting contents of sacred history, interspersed through the Bible, including those remarkable prophecies which have reference to Egypt and to the countries of the East in Asia, many of which are already remarkably fulfilled, the types and ceremonies and festivals of a former dispensation foreshadowing the promised Messiah—the beautiful prophecies of the Old Testament, whether presented to us in a literal, figurative, or spiritual sense, accomplished when, in the fulness of time, the Son of God was made flesh, and dwelt amongst men, are all subjects for attractive and instructive lessons to the young, rising as they do in their importance when applied to the circumstances and necessities of mankind.

"BRING HIM UNTO ME."

MARK ix. 19.

Despairingly the poor disappointed father turned away from the disciples to their Master. His son was in the worst possible condition, and all means had failed; but the miserable child was soon delivered from the evil one, when the parent, in faith, obeyed the Lord Jesus' word, "Bring him unto me." Children are a precious gift from God, but much anxiety comes with them. They may be a great joy or a great bitterness to their parents; they may be filled with the Spirit of God, or possessed with the spirit of evil. In all cases, the word of God gives us one receipt for the curing of all their ills. "Bring him unto me." O for more agonizing prayer on their behalf, while they are yet babes. Sin is there; let our prayers begin to attack it. Our cries for our offspring should precede those cries which betoken their actual advent into a world of sin. In the days of their youth we shall see sad tokens of that dumb and deaf spirit which will neither pray aright nor hear the voice of God in the soul; but Jesus still commands, "Bring them unto me." When they are grown up they may wallow in sin and foam with enmity against God; then, when our hearts are breaking, we should remember the great Physician's words, "Bring them unto me." Never must we cease to pray until they cease to breathe. No case is hopeless while Jesus lives.

The Lord sometimes suffers His people to be driven into a corner that they may experimentally know how necessary He is to them. Ungodly children, when they show us our own powerlessness against the depravity of their hearts, drive us to flee to the Strong for strength; and this is a great blessing to us. Whatever our morning's need may be, let it, like a strong current, bear us to the ocean of Divine Love. Jesus can soon remove our sorrow. He delights to comfort us. Let us hasten to Him while He waits to meet us.—Spurgeon.

It was from Grace Church St. Meeting that Willliam Penn and William Mead were taken, to meet that celebrated trial, the result of which went far to establish a firm base for liberty of conscience and the civil rights of the people. Another incident in the history of this meeting is thus recorded in the volume before us:

"It was the resolution of the civic authorities when, after some weeks of trial, Friends could not be deterred by soldiery and beating of drums from assembling as near to the meeting place as they could get, so far to change their mode of opposition, as themselves to use the building for a style of worship they could approve. Hence a clergyman was appointed to conduct a service there according to the manner of the Established Church, and for weeks in succession, the singular feature was presented of this canonical worship being conducted in a Friends' meeting-house. It brought no credit to the parties engaged, for few of any respectability would attend after the first feelings of curiosity had passed away, and the minister, left in the society of a rude rabble, hardly restrained from uproar by the guard of soldiery, was unable to conduct the service with propriety. His first sermon was on Love and Charity, but when he had done, George Whitehead took up the theme, and continued the discourse, showing, amid the quiet attention of those present, how contrary to this 'all persecution for religion was;' and though this boldness cost him a charge before the Lord Mayor and a sentence of £40 fine, the people were impressed, and failed to see the logic of the magistrate, when he said, in giving sentence, that so soon as 'the minister had done it was a conventicle.' Next week the minister found Friends so early on the ground as to have fully assembled in the court by the time he came: seeing this he 'slunk away,' till the sergeant with a 'double guard' brought him up to the door. But then again 'his heart failed him,' and he turned off amid, it is said, 'the derisions of the people.' A week afterwards, and Friends were the forestalled parties,—for military guards had assembled there as early as four in the morning, and under this protection the minister went through the service in the building, whilst Friends, debarred from entering their own meeting-house or the court, assembled in the street: the week following, even the streets were kept clear by trainbands picketed in them all night; and so the priest again had his service in the meeting-house, but only 'a rabble was there;' 'few persons of credit,' says the account, 'appeared to countenance their proceedings,' and eventually it ceased, for, as William Crouch, an eye witness, remarks, 'it held not long, for the priest's work did not prosper and he grew weary of it.'"

It was from this meeting-house that George Fox, after preaching a powerful sermon on First-day morning, the 11th of 1st month, 1690, to a crowded assembly, came out and felt the cold chill which "went to his heart." He passed into the rooms adjoining the meeting-house, and lay down on a bed. Extreme weakness rapidly came on, in which he remained about two days and a half, when his spirit departed. All was most peaceful; death had no terrors for him; he said his work was done, "I am clear, fully clear." He declined all medicine. He felt that now his hour was come, and desired peacefully to submit, thus making a "heavenly and harmonious conclusion" to an astonishingly active and eventful life in the service of his Lord, in the 67th year of his age. Of the funeral, it is said that "Friends carried the coffin on their shoulders without any bier, cloth or cover." Thirty-six Friends were specially appointed for the purpose, being six from each Monthly Meeting, and the general company following were ranged in order, three abreast, and kept on one side of the street, so as to interrupt the traffic as little as possible by its progress. It was supposed that 4000 Friends thus walked from the meeting-house to the burial ground, which became quite filled with the company.

It was at the meeting held in White Hart Court that William Dewsberry, one of the most eminent and valuable of the coadjutors of George Fox, preached also his last sermon. This having been preserved, a few passages are selected.

"Except you be regenerated and born again, ye cannot inherit the Kingdom of God. Now all of you that come to be regenerated, you must come to the light of Christ. There is no other way to it. He will search your hearts and try your reins, and set your sins in order before you. You must see yourselves a lost people, a sinful people. You must bring your deeds to the light of Christ and abide in the sentence of the condemnation; if you save your lives you lose them; if you will lose your lives for Christ's sake, there is no danger of your eternal life. I stand here as a witness of the Lord of life this day; there is no way for people to come to salvation, but they must know Christ revealed in their hearts. He will baptize thee with the Holy Ghost and with fire. If thou knows not this, thou art not a true Christian, thou wilt never look death in the face with joy, nor go down to the grave in triumph. Do not make the way to heaven easier on your minds and imaginations than indeed it is; and think it not sufficient to live in an outward observance of the ways of God. If your own wills be alive and your corruptions remain unmortified the judgment of God will be your portion. Come and examine thy conscience. Dost thou strive to enter in at the strait gate and the narrow way? I stand here as a witness for the God of heaven; I never heard the voice of Christ (as his follower) till I was slain and baptized, and lay as a little child under His heavenly chastisements; as soon as ever my soul was brought to this in my humiliation, O! then, the dreadful judgment was taken away, . . . and the Lord spake comfortably to me, 'I have loved thee with an everlasting love.'

O! let not your eyes slumber nor your eyelids take any rest till you are sure the Lord is your God. . . . Christ laid down his life for thee and me. . . O! Friends, let us empty ourselves that Christ may fill us. Let us be nothing in our own eyes that we may be all in Him and receive of His fulness. And so I commend you to God. Let not these words passing through a mean vessel be as a bare empty discourse of truth to you which you only hear and take no further care of your salvation; . . . press forward to the heavenly work that is laid in the power of Christ Jesus, even through judgment into death, and then He will give you eternal life."

WAR ON CHRISTIAN PRINCIPLES.

One of the conditions of the treaty with Mexico, it is said, was that any future war which may break out between the two countries shall be conducted on Christian principles. Now, we all know that this is an age of progress, and that all sorts of improvements are constantly taking place in all sorts of matters; but war on Christian principles is certainly the latest, and, if carried out, will, we think, prove the greatest of them all.

Just imagine it. We think we can see the two armies drawn out in battle array. A fair field is before them. The ranks are formed, the positions taken, the great guns unlimbered. General Scott is just about to give the order to fire, when an aid comes up and respectfully reminds him that the war is to be conducted on Christian principles, and it will not do to fire. "Very true, very true," says the Commander-in-chief; "but what are they? I have read Vauban, and Scheiter, and Turenne. I have read the lives of the old conquerors, and have studied the campaigns of the greatest soldiers; but I never happened to come across these principles in any work upon the military art. Do you know anything about it, Colonel?"

"No." "Nor you, Major?" "Nor I, either."

"I really don't know how to begin. I suppose it would not do to shoot. Suppose we send for the Chaplain."

The Chaplain arrives. "Do you know anything about this fighting on Christian principles?"

"Oh, yes; it is the easiest thing in the world."

"Where are the books?"

"Here;" and the Chaplain takes out the Bible.

"Really," says the General, "we ought to have thought of this before. It is a bad time to commence the study of tactics when the enemy is right before us; but I suppose we are bound by the treaty. What is the first thing, Mr. Chaplain?"

"'Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.'"

"But these are not neighbors. They are Mexicans."

"The same book tells us, a little further on, that the opportunity to do good to a man makes him our neighbor."

"Will you go on, Mr. Chaplain?"

"'Love your enemies. Do good to them that hate you. Pray for them that despitefully use you. If a man smite you on one cheek, turn to him the other.'"

"But while we are praying for the Mexicans, they will be firing into us."

"No; they are bound by the treaty also. It works both ways."

"Then, what is the use of our arms?"

"This is all provided for in the same book. Beat your swords into ploughshares, and your spears into pruning hooks."

"Then I do not see as there is anything for us to do here."

"Nothing, unless you send over and ask Santa Anna if he needs anything in the way of medicines, or provisions, or clothing. I rather think the treaty requires this of us. And I don't know but what we ought to send them a few schoolmasters, for I understand that they are a shockingly ignorant people."

"But how do you ever know which party conquers in this fighting on Christian principles?"

"That is the great beauty of it. Both sides conquer; and there are never any killed or wounded."—Advocate of Peace.

HEAT FROM THE MOON.

Lord Rosse has been measuring the heat that comes to us from the moon. Using one of his great reflecting telescopes as a burning mirror, he has condensed the moon's rays upon one of the most delicate of heat-gaugers —a thermo-pile. Without being able to determine by what fraction of a Fahrenheit's degree the lunar warmth increases the temperature of the terrestrial atmosphere, he has found, as an approximation, that the radiation from the moon is about the ninety-thousandth part of that from the sun. He conceives that the variation of heat from our satellite follows the same law as that of its light—i. e., that we have most warmth from the full moon, and least from the nearly new. By comparison with a terrestrial source of heat, Lord Rosse estimates the actual temperature of the moon's surface at lunar midday to be about 500 degrees Fahrenheit. This scorching results from the slow rotation of the moon, which makes its day equal to our month, and from the absence of any atmosphere to screen the lunar world. Fontenelle and his followers to the contrary notwithstanding, the moon can be no place for living beings, unless they are salamanders.—Exchange.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH 2, 1869.

The Deceitfulness of Riches is emphatically quoted by the Saviour, as one of two main causes which choke the word and render the good seed of the kingdom unfruitful. A serious admonition this to the loyal Christian who seeks to have his citizenship in heaven, to place a double guard just here.

The financial excitement prevailing at the time when the matter for the present number was placed in the printer's hands, is calculated to impress upon those whose hearts and minds are sensitive to holy teaching, the lesson which Paul so earnestly conveyed to Timothy:

"They that will be rich, fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil; [of all these evils, is A. Clarke's reading,] which, while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. But thou, O man of God, flee these things, and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness."

The gambling in gold, of which the effects are felt at this moment in the bankruptcy of operators who, as a financial journalist says, "could quietly and considerately concoct a scheme to run up the price of coin, to the general derangement of business, and to the positive injury of some of their neighbors, for the greed of gain," has already met with signal retribution. The Ledger thus denounces the immorality:

"Fortunes have been swept away in a single hour, the result of premeditation and preparation to take other people's property without consideration. This cannot be justified as honest. The effect of these unwarranted fluctuations in gold is to paralyze all other markets. They scandalize the Government and damage the public credit."

It is a melancholy comment on the folly of trusting in riches and determining to be rich, that some of the reckless speculators, losing all their worldly means, went forth from the gold room to the residences which were no longer their homes, maniacs—reason unseated, perhaps beyond restoration.

How safe and beautiful, and how worthy of its Divine origin, is what we call the golden rule! How beneficial even to ourselves is the habitual exercise of love to man—loving our neighbor as ourself! How beneficent the limitations which the Society of Friends throws around its members in reference to trade and business! (See the disciplinary rules of all the twelve Yearly Meetings.)

A few lines from the pages of edifying counsel in the London Advices are presented in this connection:

"May all our members, renouncing the spirit of the world, and living under the government of Christ, have their possessions in 'bags that wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that fadeth not.'

. . . . . .

"The love of money is apt to increase almost imperceptibly. That which at first was labored after under the pressure of necessary duty may, without great watchfulness, steal upon the affections and gradually withdraw the heart from God. The danger depends not upon how much a man has, but upon how much his heart is set upon what he has and upon accumulating more. . . .

"Keep within the restraints of a tender and enlightened conscience, quick to discern where the desire to serve the Lord in all things ceases, and the service of self begins. Seek to have your hearts raised above the world, that you may live as strangers and pilgrims upon earth."

Addenda Respecting Iowa Yearly Meeting.—A beloved correspondent in Iowa favors us with a letter from which, though not designed to appear in print, a few passages may properly be extracted.

"Thou knowest that in many places we have excitement along with a revived work. There are quarters in which a zeal has outrun knowledge and experience, taking possession of some meetings, and carrying them off from the order and dignity of Friends' meetings. Knowing this, many went to the Yearly Meeting with a solicitude for which there had not before been such occasion.

"We knew our tributaries in many places were overflowing their accustomed banks, and refusing the restraints designed to keep them in their channels. And we knew that He alone who raises and who stays the waters could guide and hold them. And, like the river near Oskaloosa, which we dreaded all the way, and which subsided just enough and just in time for us to pass over safely, so has the Lord held in check the agitated elements, and our Yearly Meeting has been permitted to witness again, as in years past, in a memorable degree, His authority and power.

"How evidently in the right time, and with the right qualifications, our brethren were with us from across the sea! . . .

"It was requested by Wm. Robinson and Henry Binns that Friends and those who usually attend our meetings should, as much as might be, gather in the upper room, on the last First-day morning. The ministry on that occasion was addressed more especially to the Church, and was edifying and appropriate. Among the themes dwelt upon by H. B. were the beautiful description of the Church in Eph. v. with Christ its Head, receiving its gifts from Him, exercising them in Him, growing up into Him in all things; then the visit of the Prophet to the potter's house—the great amount of material—the work upon the wheel—the Master's work upon the vessel that He may work by it—the perfection of His work in the individual believer and in the Church, making her all glorious within, her clothing of wrought gold, her raiment of needle-work. W. R. commenced with—"Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?" He impressively portrayed the pride and infidelity of the human heart, unwilling to resort for salvation to the means which it despises, and ever ready to query, "Is there not a better way?" And then the liability with awakened ones in our own Society to look abroad and question: "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of our little Israel?" He referred to the broad ground on which we agree with other Christians, and with great clearness pointed out the precious views of Truth which he believed had been given us to see, especially the fuller recognition of Christ's indwelling and ruling by His Spirit in the hearts of His children; and the practical life-fruits and testimonies growing out of this great doctrine. It is our privilege to believe not alone in Christ crucified, but also in Christ risen and glorified. And if He be risen to us, his life, his Spirit, has risen in our hearts. The standard of our profession is a high and holy one. If we fail, as others fail, to come up to our standard, and thus many discouragements appear, he pleaded with the young not to turn away, not to look too much to frailties and failings, but to look unto Jesus, and seek for His help for themselves to come up to the standard."

Our correspondent, expressing his trust that these weighty discourses left their impress upon many hearts, speaks also of members of Iowa Yearly Meeting who "did labor in the authority of Truth."

"With thankfulness I believe it may be felt that there are not a few of our own members, who, through long and large experience, have come to be pillars in the Lord's house."

Since the above was in type, the receipt of full accounts has enabled us to condense the following particulars.

The trial of an appeal resulted in the reinstatement of appellant.

The First-day School statistics show 62 schools, 3668 pupils—average attendance 2340. No. of pupils in membership, 2158. No. of teachers engaged, 310. Thirty libraries were reported, containing 6222 volumes. There are also eight Mission Schools.

Interesting reports were received from the Peace Committee and the committee on the Freedmen. The latter reported disbursements to the amount of $1199.80.

The Educational report gave the number of children over five years of age as 2179. Of these it is very satisfactory to find that none are growing up without literary instruction. In Whittier College were 159 students in the two departments; in West Branch Academy 130.

The exercises of the Yearly Meeting included a deep concern for the supplying of good books to the children, and for guarding them against the poison and dangers of pernicious publications. The cultivation of strict truthfulness was enjoined, and the avoidance of trifling conversation. Parental training was impressively considered, and the great influence of the Christian parent. From a minute embodying the exercises of the body, the following is extracted:

"In view of our many and various deficiencies, the one great remedy which we need is more of the love of God in our own hearts, that love, in the bounteousness and boundlessness of which a Saviour has been provided for a guilty world, so that, purchased with his sacrifice, we should not henceforth live unto ourselves, but unto Him who gave himself for us. The love of God in our hearts must constrain us to obedience to Him. Having no reservation to ourselves, no idols, but loving God with our whole hearts, we shall love His will as revealed to us in the light of Law. His law inscribed upon the tablets of our hearts by his Spirit, is light to us. Do we love that law? . . .

"If some among us, in the earnestness and ardor of early experience, are betrayed into a zeal beyond knowledge, and carried away, how should we endeavor to bring them back to the foundation, and to that beautiful order which must ever distinguish the Church of Christ and its members. And when it is seen that it is in the love of Christ constraining it that the hand of the Church is reached out to gather a wandering one, it cannot alienate the heart in which that love dwells"

The establishment of the following new meetings was reported:

In Salem Q. M., a First-day meeting called West Grove, and Gilead Monthly Meeting (in Missouri.)

In Pleasant Plain Q. M., Westland Meeting.

In Springdale Q. M., a First-day afternoon meeting at the time and place of the Quarterly Meeting, and a First-day evening meeting at West Branch.

In Bangor Q. M., a First-day afternoon meeting at Le Grand, and a Preparative meeting and meeting for worship at Asher Creek.

In Oskaloosa Q. M., Mahaska Preparative and meeting for worship.

In Bear Creek Q. M., East Grove Preparative and meeting for worship.

The report upon the White's Iowa Manual Labor Institute, states it to be in successful operation, with 28 pupils, with a present indebtedness of $663.09; the State having expended $11,000 on the premises in the way of permanent improvements. The indebtedness last year was $724.99. Certain railways being likely to pass through the premises, the Trustees were authorized to transfer the right of way on equitable terms.

We notice with pleasure the following minute:

"This Meeting is united in recommending to subordinate meetings a nearer observance of discipline in relation to keeping meetings of business select; not, however, necessarily to exclude all other religious persons."

In a lively report from the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders the following passage occurs:

"When a Minister submits a concern to a meeting, (let us not say requests a certificate,) this rests on the meeting; and if he or she be liberated beyond the gift, the meeting is and will be accountable for consequences: the loss sustained will find its centre in the liberating body. Well may we say, 'Who is sufficient for these things?' But the unfailing promise should encourage us,—'If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God who giveth liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him.'

"We appreciate the responsibility which rests upon us, and the necessity of constantly abiding in Christ the Vine, that we may be kept alive and made fruitful."

The concluding minute says:

"Humbly and gratefully we acknowledge the presence and help of the Lord from day to day as we have sought to serve Him and to advance His cause. May He crown His work, and keep and lead and bless His people everywhere. And to Him be all the glory given."

It is cause of humble thankfulness that through holy help our dear Friends of Iowa have thus again realized that the object of their assembling has been attained—that the Lord has not forgotten his people, nor failed to lend a favorable ear to the petitions which were raised by servants who love the place where his honor dwelleth, and who out of full hearts have prayed for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem. What encouragement for innocent and anxious souls who fear for the tottering ark, to dwell lowly and prostrate, making their requests known and commending the cause to Him who cares for the very dust of Zion, and who can never be indifferent to the interests of the Church, seeing that He "gave Himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that He might present it to Himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish."

A Good Movement in Wilmington.—The history given by request on another page of the opening of the Howard School in Wilmington, Del., will be read by many with delight. It is an augury not merely of great good to the colored people of Delaware, but of large moral benefit to the whole people—and of the regeneration of a Commonwealth. There are citizens of that State whose righteous souls were vexed with Slavery and its train of evils, and who, in contemplating what God hath wrought, can bathe in rivers of pleasure. To the heart of a pure philanthropist it is a cause of joy when one fellow-being is uplifted from degradation to liberty and enlightenment. But in Delaware, where much remains to be done, the gladness that is felt over one fellow-being thus rescued, may be multiplied by thousands. The field is now open for Christian labor; "pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers!" And let none be lacking. An appreciative perception of the necessity, of the deficiencies that exist and of the means to be employed, in some sort constitutes a call to serve our generation according to the will of God. "Whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?"

Among those who now labor for the negroes in Delaware, there are those who will not rest content with mere giving of money, but whose hearts are thrilled with the poet's words:

"One hour of time were worth a load of ore!
Give to the ignorant our own wisdom! Give Sorrow our comfort! Lend to those who live
In crime, the counsels of our virtue! Share
With souls our souls, and Satan shall despair!"

MARRIED,

At Long Plain, Acushnet, Massachusetts, on the 10th of Ninth month, 1869, Wm. E. Hoag, of New York, to Mary H., daughter of Joseph Kempton, of Acushnet.

DIED.

HALL.—On the 31st of Seventh month, 1869, in his 3d year, Luther Chalmer, son of Morton and Ruth B. Hall, members of Sand Creek Monthly Meeting, Ind.

HOLT.—On the 23d of Sixth month, 1869, at her residence in Frederick Co., Va., Eleanor Holt, an esteemed and exemplary member of Hopewell Mo. Meeting. Her close was peaceful.

COFFIN.—On the 16th of Fifth month, 1869, Sarah Emeline Coffin, in the 26th year of her age, only daughter of Levi and Catharine Coffin; a member of Cincinnati Monthly Meeting. This dear young Friend, though long afflicted, was a bright example of patient, cheerful resignation to the Divine will.

CHAMNESS.—On the 6th of Eighth month, 1869, Armella, daughter of Anthony and Amy Chamness, in her 69th year; a member and elder of Centre Mo. Meeting, N. C. During years of suffering she was preserved in patient resignation, and was often engaged in thanksgiving and praise to the God of all her mercies. Conscious, like the Apostle, that to depart and be with Christ would be for her far better, she was kept in a meek confidence that the Lord would in his own right time carry her safely through. Enabled thus to rejoice evermore, a smile of peace rested upon her countenance, and it was pleasant to be near her even in her sufferings. Her death was in the triumph of faith. Thanks be unto Him who giveth the victory.

THORNBERG.—On the 20th of Eleventh month, 1868, in her 70th year, Rhoda, wife of Abel Thornberg; a member of Springfield Monthly Meeting, Ohio. Her last hours were calm and peaceful, resting on her Saviour's love, on whose bosom she gently fell asleep.

NORDYKE.—In Richmond, Ind., on the 3d of Ninth month, 1869, Harry Edward, infant son of Micajah T. and Sarah C. Nordyke; members of White Water Monthly Meeting.

Received for necessitous freedmen in N. Carolina, in response to letters in No. 3, from E. M., $10; S. C., $5; N. S., $5; C. S., $5; W. F. J., $10; L. P. T., P. P. T. and M. T., $10; per note, anonymous, $10; another do., $10; all of Philadelphia. Total $55.00.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Monkton, Vt., 9th mo. 4th.

Dear friend Wm. J. Allinson.—In the Review of this day I have read with interest the account of our [Ferrisburgh] Quarterly Meeting, held on the day of the great eclipse, and can cheerfully endorse what thy anonymous correspondent has said in relation to the very acceptable company of Rebecca Collins and Jane W. Ferris, for, although I did not attend all the meetings alluded to, the accounts I get of them agree with the statement of thy correspondent. But thou wilt allow me to add to that account, also to correct it in some respects.

As well as by the dear Friends above mentioned who attended the Q. M., we were also favored with the company of an unusual number of other laborers in the Lord's vineyard—namely, Eli Newlin and R. W. Hodson of Indiana; Jesse T. Hartley, Ohio; Amos Battey, Iowa; Huldah M. Beede, R. I.; Eliza H. Meader, N. York; and, since the Q. M. (attending several of our subordinate meetings,) Wm. Jenkins, Joseph Hobson and Lebbeus Benedict, Ohio; Wm. and Phebe Ann Sands, Sing Sing, N. Y., and John Paige, N. H., of whom we may say their company was also acceptable and much of their religious services truly edifying.

The meetings at the Creek, South Starksboro', and at Lincoln, designated by thy correspondent "indulged meetings," are long established meetings for worship, now constituting one Preparative Meeting. (See Book of Meetings.) At the time the "indulged meeting" at Montreal was opened (1st mo., 1869,) Walter Marriage informed me it was held in an "upper room" in "the Bible House," rented by the Friends of that city, and not in a house owned by W. M.; and a Friend who attended their meeting on the 29th ult., informs me that the same room was occupied for the same purpose at that time.

In connection with this, it may be proper to say the old meeting-house at the Creek, South Starksboro', is undergoing repair. Already it has received an addition of about ten feet in length and two and a half in height, well covered with shingles and clap-boards; windows of liberal dimensions; well painted without, and will probably be finished with suitable seats in part cushioned, and ready for use before winter sets in. The cost will exceed one thousand dollars, all contributed by our members in the neighborhood, with the exception of one hundred dollars, the proceeds of the sale of an old meeting-house in North Starksboro', which in former years was frequently well filled by Friends,—that is, before the divisions and subdivisions had done their work amongst them.

Perhaps thou wilt say, "Surely after such abundant religious care and culture this Q. M. ought to bear fruit an hundred-fold!" Let me say I trust we are not wholly insensible of the favors thus received; but we are reminded that, although we would give an unfeigned welcome to a Paul who may plant anew the precious seed of the kingdom, or to an Apollos who may be sent to water it, it is the Lord alone who can give the increase; and I believe there are souls hereaway that are hungering and thirsting after that increase!

THE HOWARD SCHOOL, WILMINGTON, DEL.

The new school-house just erected on Orange street, for the education of children without regard to color, was formally opened yesterday. The lower room was densely packed by colored people and a few white citizens.

The meeting organized by calling Hon. Willard Hall to the chair, and the proceedings were opened with prayer by Alfred Cookman.

William S. Hilles was then introduced and made an address, in which he related the efforts of the Delaware Association and gave a brief historical sketch of the particular effort which has resulted in building this school-house.

General Oliver O. Howard, Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, during a visit to Wilmington in November last, had, together with a committee of the Association, an interview with the City Council in relation to the erection of a commodious and suitable building for the purpose of educating the colored children of the city. After presenting their claims upon the city and giving an interesting statement of the progress of colored education elsewhere, he offered, on behalf of the Freedmen's Bureau, to pay over, for the purpose of erecting such a school-house, the sum of $5,000, provided the city of Wilmington would add to it an equal sum for the purpose, the building to be erected within the city limits, on ground furnished by the friends of the cause, and "the title to be vested in the city authorities in trust, forever, for the maintenance of a school for the children of both sexes, without distinction of color."

The Council heard General Howard and the managers respectfully, and requested the latter to address them a formal memorial on the subject. This was done, and the Council appropriated the $5000 as requested. The Association then procured the lot on which the building now stands, and its erection was commenced. W. S. Hilles congratulated the colored people on the success of these efforts in their behalf, and urged them most earnestly to show their appreciation of the efforts by taking advantage of the opportunities now offered them. He laid before them the advantages of education, and said that two of the colored girls who had passed through the Association's schools were already employed as teachers at remunerative salaries.

Alfred Lee, Bishop of this Protestant Episcopal Diocese, next spoke briefly. He thanked Judge Hall for presiding on this occasion, and spoke of the wonderful change the Judge's efforts had made in the general educational system in our city. The Bishop said he was proud of having served for years with Judge Hall in the Board of Education, and he pointed to the work it had wrought for the encouragement of this effort. Fifteen years ago there was but one public school in Wilmington, where from 150 to 200 pupils were poorly accommodated, and that not always full; now we have twelve large and handsome school-houses and all of them are crowded. When serving as a member of the Board, it was always a source of regret to him that the colored children of the city were debarred from the advantages they were offering to the white children, and, in fact, from all educational advantages. Much credit was due the Society of Friends for their efforts to extend the advantages of education to our colored people. In 1865 an association was formed, which opened a school in 12th street, and two years later the Delaware Association was formed, which had, since its formation, with the valuable assistance of the distinguished officer now on the platform, opened 25 schools in the State, outside of the city, and a number in the city, which were about to be consolidated in the new building. He congratulated the colored people on the new future opened to them, but said he would not stop there; he congratulated the white people on this triumph of right over prejudice, for this was a triumph of right, of good feeling, of Christianity, over wicked prejudice.

General O. O. Howard was the next speaker. He said he wished to disclaim some of the credit awarded him for the success of this enterprise. He had at first not been disposed to appropriate any of the funds at his disposal, for educational purposes, to Delaware. He thought the money was intended for the disloyal States, and Delaware was one of the loyal States—had never been in Rebellion. He had, however, on the urgent solicitation of Superintendent Kemble, and his own brother, given it attention, and found the need of rendering the assistance he had to this Association. He said it was sometimes asked why there is less enthusiasm amongst the colored people of Delaware, than with those further South, on this subject? He answered, that if this were so, that it was doubtless because things continued in the old ruts here. The people had not been stirred up here as they have there, by the war. They liked to hold on to the old things. Conservatism was a good thing; it was well to preserve whatever was good, but the preservation of that which was bad ought to be stopped, and such conservatism overthrown, even if it took a revolution to do it. He made a passionate appeal to the colored people to take advantage of their opportunities; to the colored mothers to hesitate at no sacrifice to secure the education of their children. He branded as false the current statement that the colored race was incapable of a higher education, and said that 250,000 colored children were now being educated, of whom 5000 had already reached the higher branches. Of this five thousand it was expected that many would pass through the University at Washington, which would give them as thorough an education as young men could obtain in any college in the land. The General continued at some length, making an earnest and eloquent speech.

Superintendent Kemble was next introduced. In the course of his remarks he alluded to having visited Milford to get information about the unfortunate affair which occurred there at the close of last session; one of the lady teachers having wandered off into the woods, under the hallucination that the white people of the town intended to kill her; she had been found and sent to her home in New York State, but was now in an asylum hopelessly insane. He had also gone some distance out of the town to visit Slaughter Neck —fitly named—where the ignorant, prejudiced white people had burned one of the Association's school-houses as soon as it was finished. He had made inquiry as to the probable causes of the young lady's insanity above referred to, and found that she had a very large school there, which she managed admirably, that she had had to board at a hotel, a noisy rum-hole, because, though twelve or thirteen applications had been made, she had been unable to obtain board in a single private family. She was hard worked and solitary, and one who knew her told him he believed she was driven crazy by hard work and having nobody to talk to. An educated Christian woman without any one to talk to in the Christian town of Milford, the second in size in the State! And yet when the speaker had visited there he had stepped into a Methodist meeting-house, had found plenty of men praying and had prayed with them. Milford was a praying town. And yet this poor young woman had gone crazy from over-work and nobody to talk to in this praying town of Milford. The speaker urged that the city take charge of this school and provide it with teachers as the next advanced step; that the colored people be taxed and their children be educated with the money raised, the same as others are educated.

Thomas Kimber, President of the Association, offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, That we hail the opening of the Howard School in Wilmington as the dawn of a new era in the history of the colored race in Delaware, as well as in the cause of education throughout the State.

Resolved, That we confidently rely on the good faith and earnest effort of the authorities of the city of Wilmington in the future conduct and efficient support of this school in accordance with the terms of the deed of trust now to be presented for their acceptance.

Resolued, That we gratefully acknowledge our obligations to Major General O. O. Howard, both for the original proposal to aid us in this enterprise and for the prompt fulfilment of his part of our mutual engagements; and we trust that the Howard School will long stand as a monument to the truth that "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than War."

Resolved, That we earnestly commend this Christian undertaking to the favor and the support of all good men without distinction of party; and more especially we now reverently invoke upon it the blessing and the protecting care of our Father in Heaven, of whom it is declared that "He is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth the Lord and worketh righteousness is accepted with Him."

Henry Moorhouse closed the exercises with prayer, after which the meeting adjourned.

The new school-house has been named the Howard School, in honor of General Howard, to whose interest and efforts its existence is largely due. It is a good-looking, two-story brick structure, built on the plan of the three new school-houses now building in the First, Fifth and Ninth wards for white children. It is 38 by 79 feet, and stands 20 feet back from the street, in a lot 72½ by 120 feet, giving it large front, side and back yards. It has two front doors, both of which open into vestibules having access to the lower school-room, and from one of which a broad and easy stairway ascends to the second story. The lower story is divided into one large school-room and two class-rooms, all well lighted, ventilated, heated, and comfortably furnished, and having ample black-board surface and all the modern appliances for school-rooms. The upper story is an exact counterpart of the lower one, and the building is as comfortable and convenient a school-house as we have in the city. The celler is unusually deep and dry, and a part of it will be fitted up for use as a play-room in wet weather. The building was erected under the supervision of the following building committee appointed by the Association: Charles W. Howland, Allen Gawthrop, William S. Hilles.

THE EVER-WIDENING WORLD OF STARS.

Since Herschel's day a multitude of important discoveries have been made. His son, the present Sir John Herschel, carried the system of star-gaugings over the southern heavens, having first trained himself for the work by verifying Sir William's northern star-gaugings. The eminent astronomer Struve and others have applied a series of tests to the basis of Herschel's theory of the universe. Increased telescopic power has been applied to the examination of the nebulæ. And lastly, a mode of research more wonderful than the boldest pioneers of science had ventured to hope for, has been applied to determine what the stars and nebulæ really are,—nay, even the very elements of which they are constituted.

Therefore we stand in a position so far in advance of that to which it was in Herschel's power to attain, that the attempt to modify his theories need no longer be thought to savor of undue boldness. Half a century does not pass without bringing a vast extension of knowledge, and certainly the last half-century has been no exception to this rule; insomuch that could the great astronomer take his place again among us, and become cognizant of the vast strides which his favorite science has made since he left us, he would be the first to point out that many of his views required to be modified or even to be wholly abandoned.

For instance, let us consider the meaning of the following observation made by the younger Herschel. While "sweeping" the southern heavens, this eminent astronomer noticed occasionally the existence of faint outlying streamers belonging to the Milky Way, yet not only irresolvable into stars, but so exceedingly distant that he could scarcely speak of them as really visible. He was sensible of their existence, but when the eye was turned directly upon them they vanished, insomuch that, he says, "the idea of illusion has repeatedly arisen subsequently," yet when he came to map down the places where these phantom star-streams had been detected, he found that they formed regular branches of the galactic system.

Now these outlying star-streams prove, first of all, that the star-system is not disc-shaped, but spiral in figure. Between the stars which form the ordinary streams of the Milky Way, and those which form the phantom streams, there must lie regions in which stars are either altogether wanting or strewn with much less profusion than in either the nearer or the farther stream.

But this is not the only nor the chief conclusion which may be drawn from the existence of the almost evanescent star-streams. According to Herschel's views, the stars which compose those streams are only faint through enormity of distance. They may be as large as our sun, many of them perhaps far larger. And between them there may yawn distances as large as those which separate us from Arcturus or Aldebaran. Now this being so, the outlying parts of our own sidereal system being removed so far from us as to be all but evanescent in Herschel's splendid reflector—how much greater ought to be the faintness of the sidereal systems which lie outside ours! If the nebulæ are really such systems, and made up of suns like our own, then not only ought Herschel's great reflector to fail in rendering them visible, but even Lord Rosse's noble mirror would require to be increased a hundredfold in power before we could see them. For clearly the nebulæ, which appear as mere tiny specks upon the vault of heaven, must be very much farther away than the confines of our system, if they are comparable with it in size.

Therefore we must have "of two things one." Either the confines of our sidereal system are constituted very differently from the parts in our neighborhood; or the nebulæ are constituted very differently from the sidereal system. We say, of two things one, meaning that one of two views must be true; but it is plain that there is nothing to prevent both being true.

We may next come to the inquiry whether these views are severally supported by any special evidence.

Now as to the first, it happens that the southern heavens surveyed by the younger Herschel afford evidence such as Sir William Herschel was not possessed of. The former has seen places in the southern skies where the outline of the Milky Way is so sharply defined, that even in the telescope the sudden change from a background of black sky to the sprinkled light of the galaxy is not lost. One half of the field of view will exhibit the former aspect, the other the latter. Now if we consider a cloud, or a dense flight of birds, or any cluster of objects exhibiting a well defined outline, we see at once what that well defined outline means. It signifies that the eye is directed along the edge or surface of a distinct cluster of objects—in one case globules of water, in another birds, and so on—and the idea is at once precluded that the eye is within the cluster, of whatever sort that cluster may be. Therefore the theory that the sun forms one of a system of stars spread pretty uniformly over a disc-shaped space must be given up; for were it true, the approach to the Milky Way would always be gradual.

When we add that in the southern skies the Milky Way presents the most fantastic configuration, here expanding into fan-shaped masses, there winding about in a multitude of strange convolutions, here suddenly narrowing into a bright neck or isthmus, there exhibiting a nearly circular vacancy, it becomes clear that the galaxy cannot have the figure assigned to it by Sir W. Herschel. It must consist of streams and sprays of stars at different distances. Such streams by their fantastic convolutions serve to explain all the peculiarities of the galaxy's structure.

And next, have we any evidence that the nebulæ are not really beyond the galaxy, but are mixed up with the sidereal system? It appears to me that we have.

Sir William Herschel noticed that there are places where the nebulæ are much more densely crowded than elsewhere, and he was disposed to suspect that precisely as the stars by their aggregation form the zone of the Milky Way, so there is a zone of nebulæ. But when Sir John Herschel had completed the survey of the heavens it was found that a very different law of distribution made its appearance. Instead of being collected in a zone or band around the heavens, the nebulæ are arranged in two distinct but irregular clusters, separated by a well marked zone almost entirely free from nebulæ. And this zone coincides almost exactly with the Milky Way.

What are we to understand by so special an arrangement as this? A modern astronomer says it clearly proves that the nebulæ do not belong to the star-world; but I can see no escape from an exactly opposite view. A simple illustration will serve to exhibit the nature of the case. Suppose a person found a space of ground on which gravel was arranged in the form of a ring, and that rough stones were thickly spread over the whole space except the gravel ring, would he conclude that there was no association between the arrangement of the gravel and the arrangement of the stones, because few stones were to be found on or near the gravel? Would he not rather find in this peculiarity distinct evidence that there was some association? He would, we think, argue that the gravel had been collected into one place and the stones into another, in pursuance of some one particular scheme. The corresponding conclusion in the case of the stars and nebulæ would clearly be that the stars had been drawn together in one direction and the nebulæ in another, out of a common world of cosmical matter. In other words we should look on the nebulæ as members of the same system or scheme that the stars belong to.

MY INFIRMITY.

I wept by the misty headland,
Down by the sea;
And none in that hour of anguish
Stood there by me.
Within and without was midnight;
Where once had been
The smile of the Lord who loved me,
No Lord was seen.

I said, "On this earth's wide bosom
I walk alone;
God hideth his face, I'm forsaken,
All hope is gone!
I watch for His hand in the shadows
That shroud my feet;
I listen, and nothing I hear, save
My heart's wild beat.

"Cold, drear is my soul, and loveless,
Hopeless and dead;
For God has departed forever,"
Sadly I said.
"I shall never more bask in His presence,
Never proclaim,
With a song and the voice of thanksgiving,
Jesu's sweet name.

"Yet how can I marvel He leaves me
Faithless and vain,
To walk in the light of His favor
Never again.
My heart hath forsaken His mercies,
And mercy is past,
And my Lord, whom my sins have long wearied,
Leaves me at last."

Then, swift as the flash of the lightning
Passing the sky,
Came a voice like the dove's in the woodland,
So tenderly:
"When father and mother forsake thee,
Look thou above;
The Father eternal remembers
The child of His love.

"The shadows have gathered around thee,
Born of the light;
Had the sun never risen to warm thee,
Where were thy night?
Remember the springs in the desert,
Arid and drear;
For thee has the wilderness blossomed:
Why dost thou fear?

"There are treasures beneath the dark waters;
Seek thou, and learn;
Hidden riches in secret places
Thou must discern.
And think not He changes or chides thee:
Comforts decline,
But Christ made the covenant blessing
Eternally thine.

"He gave thee His promise to keep thee:
Can He deceive?
He granted His word and His Spirit:
Only believe.
He sought thee, cast out and forsaken,
Bidding thee 'live!'
He gave thee the Son of His bosom:
More can He give?"

Then swift on the purple headlands,
Down by the sea,
The light that seemed vanished forever
Came back to me;
And I looked on the Man Christ Jesus
On God's high throne;
Forgive me, my Father! I measured
Thy love by my own.

DEEP-SEA JOYS.

Priceless as the gift of utterance may be, the practice of silence in some respects far excels it. Do you think me a Quaker? Well, be it so. Herein I follow George Fox most lovingly; for I am persuaded that we most of us think too much of speech, which after all is nothing but the shell of thought. Quiet contemplation, still worship, unuttered rapture, these are mine when my best jewels are before me. Brethren, rob not your heart of the deep-sea joys; miss not the far-down life by forever babbling among the broken shells and foaming surges of the shore.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—Advices from Europe are to the 27th ult.

GREAT BRITAIN.—Dr. Cumming, an eminent Protestant minister of London, having some time since sent to the Pope an inquiry whether he would be permitted to appear at the forthcoming Council and state the reasons why Protestants dissent from the Romish Church, the Pope has replied, referring Dr. C. to the terms of the invitation some time since issued to Protestants, and saying that he will find it an invitation, not to a discussion, but only to profit by the opportunity to return to the Church; adding, "there is no room in the Council for a defence of errors already committed."

Meetings in favor of amnesty to the Fenians, have been held at Dublin, Cork and Roscommon. Gladstone, on receiving a petition for such a course, promised to submit it to the Queen, but did not pledge the government to action on the subject.

A new telegraph line, to be laid from Ireland to Nova Scotia, is projected.

FRANCE.—Much interest has been excited in some quarters by the publication of a letter from a noted preacher-monk known as Father Hyacinthe, addressed to the head of his order, announcing his determination to abandon his convent and to cease to preach in the church of "Notre Dame" in Paris, declaring as his reason for this step, that he can no longer obey the orders of the Pope, and protesting against doctrines and practices in the Romish Church which are expected to be sanctioned by the Council, and which he contends are not in accordance with the principles of Christianity. This letter, it is thought, will have a great influence, and it is one of the manifestations of a growing dissent, among Roman Catholics themselves, from the extreme views lately put forth by the Pope in relation to religious tolerance and the progress of modern civilization, a dissent which appears to be especially strong and extensive in Germany.

It is announced that the French Minister on Foreign Affairs and A. Burlingame as chief of the Chinese Embassy, have made arrangements for establishing improved relations between France and China, on a basis of mutual conciliation, and the French government has instructed its representatives in China to act in accordance with this policy.

A member of the Legislative Body recently published a letter demanding that if the government should fail to convoke that body according to the Constitution, the Deputies should assemble of their own will, on the 25th inst.

SPAIN.—The government, it is said, intends to compel the bishops to take the oath of allegiance to the new Constitution.

Gen. Prim had returned from France, and at a cabinet council held afterward, it was reported, the determination was adopted to send more troops to Cuba, and to use every exertion to maintain Spanish power over that island.

Republican meetings were becoming general in the principal cities. The republican club in Madrid had been closed by the government, on account of its adoption of resolutions declaring that the members would make armed resistance to a monarchy. The arrival at Tarragona of Gen. Pierrad, a leading and popular republican, on the 21st, was made the occasion of a great demonstration in his honor. Much excitement prevailed, and some disturbances occurred in the streets, during which the secretary of the Governor was killed. The authorities then took vigorous measures to restore order, arrested many persons and dispersed the republican clubs. Gen. Pierrad was afterwards arrested, and an attempt to disarm some volunteers at Barcelona who protested against his arrest, led to a revolt, in which barricades were thrown up and a conflict took place in the streets between the troops and the volunteers. The latter were overpowered and a number made prisoners.

PRUSSIA.—It has been officially announced that the Crown Prince is about to visit Vienna on an invitation of the Emperor, which is considered an evidence of the desire of the Austrian government to establish and maintain friendly relations with Prussia.

SOUTH AMERICA.—On the 20th of 8th month, Arequipa and other places in the southern part of Peru experienced an earthquake which is described as almost as violent as the destructive shock o last year, and of longer duration. But little damage is reported as the result, probably owing to the fact that in most places the buildings demolished a year ago have not been rebuilt, the inhabitants having erected only temporary dwellings, such as were not much affected by the movements of the earth.

ITALY.—A dispatch of the 22d ult. from Florence stated that Mount Etna was in a state of violent eruption, with streams of lava pouring from the crater.

HAYTI.—The new American Minister, E. D. Bassett, was formally received by President Salnave, on the 17th ult. Much satisfaction was expressed by the President in having a representative of his own race sent to his government on behalf of the United States. Salnave has issued a decree declaring all vessels employed by the rebels to be pirates, and authorizing any armed vessels to capture them as such. The rebel vessels, it is said, have been sailing under foreign flags.

DOMESTIC.—The scientific party under the direction of Professors Hall and Rogers of the U. S. Naval Observatory at Washington, who went to Alaska to observe the total eclipse, have returned to San Francisco. Two stations were selected, but dense clouds obscuring the sun from about half an an hour before the first contact till the same period after the end of the eclipse, prevented any observations.

Gen. Hazen, commander of the Department of Lower Arkansas, which includes several Indian reservations on which Friends are agents, has recently visited St. Louis, and a paper of that city publishes some of his statements. Only moderate success has as yet attended agricultural operations, but improvement is hoped for, as habits of industry shall be acquired. The General says that the Friends have some difficulties to contend with, owing to their meekness and disregard of display, while the Indians delight in the opposite; but the latter are learning that the new agents are assiduous in efforts for improving their condition, and honest in dispensing their rations and annuities, and the change works well.

Capt. C. F. Hall, who has just returned to New London, Conn., after an absence of five years in Arctic regions, on a search for traces of Franklin's expedition, has brought various relics of the lost party, and obtained from the natives information corroborating the accounts brought some years since by the English expedition of Capt. McClintock, that the vessels being stove, the crew reached the island called King William's Land, and in striving to make their way southward, their provisions were exhausted, and they perished by starvation. Capt. Hall proposes to renew and continue his explorations next spring.

A MINUTE of YORK QUARTERLY MEETING, [England,] concerning EDWARD SMITH, an Elder, deceased.

We feel the loss we have sustained in the removal of our dear friend and elder, Edward Smith, and we believe it may be seasonable at this time to bear our testimony to the value of those services which, while apart from the ministry, are yet eminently calculated to promote the cause of Christ and to improve the social condition of mankind.

Edward Smith was born a member of our Society, his family having been Friends for a lengthened period, and with good natural abilities, largely improved by a liberal education, by diligent reading, by observation and by very varied practical experience,—being also a clear and ready speaker,—he was well fitted for public usefulness.

When little more than of age he was chairman of a meeting of his townsmen, the object of which was to obtain the abolition of capital punishment. The friends of religious equality and of the negro slave had in him, from early manhood, a steady and active supporter in public and private. The cause of peace founded on Christian principle was very dear to him, and was largely helped both by his pecuniary means and personal influence. Still greater were his exertions as an advocate for temperance among Friends and others. He visited many parts of England and Ireland to urge the claims of personal abstinence; and one who was his companion in these labors has borne testimony to his self-sacrifice in his exertions in public speaking, and in the prominent part he took in private and social conversations, under circumstances frequently of considerable suffering from a feeble state of health.

An unostentatious care of the poor of our own Society and others formed a striking feature in his character; whilst to those in affliction and trial he gave evidence, both by sympathy and substantial help, of his sense of responsibility and of his obligations as a Christian.

Edward Smith was much interested in home missions, encouraging their formation, liberally supporting them, and urging upon Friends the duty devolving upon them in regard to this means of benefiting the neglected and ill-trained portion of our population.

His attachment to our Society, always strong, manifested itself increasingly in later years. As a elder he was especially concerned to uphold the testimony of our Society to the need of an immediate call of the Holy Spirit for the right exercise of ministry, and he often spoke weightily, and with much spiritual feeling, on religious subjects.

He was for a number of years the representative of this Quartely Meeting to the Meeting for Sufferings, and we believe his services in this capacity were very valuable, not only as a disciplinarian, but as the Christian man of business. It was his custom, briefly and lucidly, to inform his own meetings of the subjects dealt with in the London meetings which were of general interest to Friends.

Our dear friend felt much sympathy with our younger Friends, which was largely manifested in various ways, and was evinced in the course of his labors as a member of Committees of this Quarterly Meeting, appointed to visit in Christian love the members and attenders of our several meetings. We may add, Edward Smith submitted to this service in the first instance with great reluctance; but he afterwards acknowledged it had been greatly blessed to his own peace and spiritual benefit.

Our dear friend was not exempt in manner and spirit from the infirmities usually attendant on great natural decision, but combined with this (although less obvious to those superficially acquainted with him) there was much of self-distrust, of tenderness of spirit and of a sense of the need of wisdom and strength higher than his own. These, we believe, he was often engaged earnestly and prayerfully to seek.

We might say much of his usefulness as a peace-maker, as an arbitrator, and as the kind counseller of any who sought his help; but it is not our aim to exalt the man, but to show forth the softening and converting influence of heavenly grace, and to ascribe the praise of all that was excellent and fruitful in the life and conversation of our beloved friend to the love of God, and his free and unmerited mercy in Christ Jesus our Saviour.

He died on the 20th of Fourth month, 1868, in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

For Friends' Review.

"WITH THE UNDERSTANDING ALSO."

We find it recorded that, at the rise of the Society of Friends in England, among those most busy in molesting the assemblages of its members were the "young students of the universities, who were learning philosophy and divinity, so called, and many of them preparing themselves for the ministry." So, it is added, "the churches of Christ, gathered into his pure worship in Oxford and Cambridge in England, and Edinburgh and Aberdeen in Scotland, where the universities are, can well bear witness."* Recollecting this, it is a matter for thankfulness that members of the same Society have now opportunity to obtain high learning, where all its departments are "presented" as availably "religious instruction," on the principle that "there is one God, and Science is the knowledge of Him;" where at the same time it is acknowledged "that all knowledge about religion is as rubbish if it be in word and not in power," —so that while the teacher leads "to the Scriptures as testifying of Christ," it is for the pupils' coming to Him that they may believe, and that He alone may open to them the Scriptures; "happy were we favored to point you to His feet and leave you there."

*Apology, &c., by R. Barclay, pp. 349, 350.

These reflections occurred upon reading a second time an address to young men which has been laid before the readers of the Review.* The writer was impressed with the earnest effort made in that Address to discourage the attachment of undue importance to the possession of merely human knowledge, and to show the true, highest uses of all the material improvements and intellectual conquests of man. Very clearly and fully were its hearers told of the pitiful "moral and religious helplessness of the most intellectual yet Christless minds." They were urged to let the light of all their culture "be not alone that which makes manifest, but be swallowed up in the light of Life." Advice was given to refer, as those addressed had been long taught to do, "every act in life to the Will of God as the only practical criterion of right and wrong," having learned "that the communication of that Will is to be looked for in His Revelation, whether through His Scriptures or the Eternal Spirit." Further: "Your education can never be complete except in Love. It can never have a soul till that breath of life is breathed into it. Your fabric is disjointed and tottering without that crowning keystone and glory. 'Knowledge puffeth up, Love buildeth up.' Let your education be the whole armor of God, not the gay shoddy of the livery of Lucifer." In this and other like forcible language was the "pride of mental culture and conscious intellectual force" reproved; while, in every study, the noblest utility was shown to be evolved only in right subordination to Him who is Truth. Beyond doubt, a most important part of this usefulness is, to use the words of another,† "by the light it has shed on biblical literature and on the history of Christianity, dispelling the falsehoods and doubts with which skeptics and self-seeking professors have striven to overwhelm or obscure it."

In connection with this, it has interested the writer to refer to and compare some passages elsewhere, which bear especially upon the duty and use of science, "to make more comprehensible to us the demands of the human constitution," which have been considered, when fairly weighed, to prove that Christianity is the only really natural religion, (that is, religion adapted to the whole nature of man). We are reminded, in the address quoted, of the method of Butler's Analogy, in which the reasonableness of the divine government in things spiritual, as portrayed in the Bible, is shown, by reference to the actual manifestation of the divine wisdom and goodness in outward nature. But a work of preferred authority gives us citations much to our purpose. R. Barclay, in his Apology, writes as follows: "And even as the moon borrows her light from the sun, so ought men, if they would be rightly and comfortably ordered in natural things, to have their reason enlightened by this divine and pure light; which enlightened reason, in those that obey and follow this true light, we confess may be useful to man even in spiritual things, as it is subservient and subject to the other, even as the animal life in man, regulated and ordered by his reason, helps him in going about things that are rational." (P. 143.) Again: "God is teacher of his people himself; and there is nothing more express than that such as are under the new covenant need no man to teach them; yet it was a fruit of Christ's ascension to send teachers and pastors for perfecting of the saints. So that the same work is ascribed to the Scriptures as to teachers." (Pp. 87, 88.) It is indeed said in the Epistle to the Galatians (iii. 24) that (before Christ's coming) "the law was our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ." R. Barclay quotes approvingly like language from Clemens Alexandrinus, in regard to the knowledge of some truth by the ancients in the absence of the Scriptures,—"this wisdom or philosophy was necessary to the Gentiles, and was their schoolmaster to lead them unto Christ," &c. (P. 185.) R. B. says elsewhere, "We affirm that no revelation coming from the Spirit can ever contradict the Scriptures' testimony nor right reason: not as making this a more certain rule to ourselves, but as condescending to such, who not discerning the revelations of the Spirit, as they proceed purely from God, will try them by these mediums." (P. 69.) And he urges (besides other argument) against "absolute reprobation," (p. 113,) that "it is highly injurious to God;" of which "let any man of reason judge." (P. 115.) Of another opinion (that of the Remonstrants) as compared with this, he remarks, "Nor yet doth it make the equity and wonderful harmony of God's mercy and justice towards all so manifest to the understanding." (P. 129.) As to the progress known in the establishment of Christian truth, "The dawning of the day dispels the darkness, and makes us see the things that are most conspicuous; but the distinct discovering and discerning of things, so as to make a certain and perfect observation, is reserved for the arising of the sun, and its shining in full brightness." (P. 130.) Once more: "So also a mathematician can infallibly know, by the rules of art, that the three angles of a right triangle are equal to two right angles; yea, can know them more certainly than any man by measure. And some geometrical demonstrations are by all acknowledged to be infallible, which can be scarcely discerned or proved by the senses; yet if a geometer be at the pains to certify some ignorant man concerning the certainty of his art, by condescending to measure it, and make it obvious to his senses, it will not thence follow that that measuring is so certain as the demonstration itself, or that the demonstration would be uncertain without it." (Pp. 69, 70.) This passage is the more interesting because of the somewhat similar line of illustration to that which is given in Prof. Dillingham's Address (above referred to) in his paragraph concerning the disciplinary utility (rightly guided) of mathematical studies in preparing the mind for the reception of Scriptural truths. What more need we urge to sustain the propriety and advantage of such illustrations? Are not all the parables* examples of the teaching of divine things by means of things natural? "The things of a man" are discerned by "the spirit of man which is in him." And the Holy Spirit, at first, "helpeth our infirmity," and at last "beareth witness with our spirits that we are the children of God." Again, the Scripture says of those who lived before the coming of Christ, "For THE INVISIBLE things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, BEING UNDERSTOOD BY THE THINGS THAT ARE MADE, even his eternal power and Godhead." (Rom. i. 20.)

It is only for truth's sake that attention is thus called to these things. But, the writer believes that very great harm is often done by attempting to divorce reason from faith, instead of subordinating reason, and leading it to ask and obtain enlightenment from faith. We should humbly endeavor (as so fervently urged in the Address referred to) to bring all our faculties into the active service of the Truth, in full surrender of them to the will of God; as the spirit of the gospel is "a spirit of love, of power, and of a sound mind."

CONSTANT READER.

ANGER A HINDRANCE TO PRAYER.

The first thing that hinders the prayer of a good man from obtaining its effects, is a violent anger and a violent storm in the spirit of him that prays. For anger sets the house on fire, and all the spirits are busy upon trouble, and intend propulsion, defence, displeasure, or revenge; it is a short madness, and an eternal enemy to discourse, and sober counsels, and fair conversation; it intends its own object with all the earnestness of perception, or activity of design and a quicker motion of a too warm and distempered blood; it is a fever in the heart, and a calenture in the head, and a fire in the face, and a sword in the hand, and a fury all over; and therefore can never suffer a man to be in a disposition to pray. For prayer is an action, and a state of intercourse and desire exactly contrary to the character of anger. Prayer is an action of likeness to the Holy Ghost, the spirit of gentleness and dove-like simplicity; an imitation of the Holy Jesus, whose spirit is meek, up to the greatness of the biggest example, and a conformity to God; whose anger is always just, and marches slowly, and is without transportation, and often hindered, and never hasty, and is full of mercy. Prayer is the peace of our spirit, the stillness of our thoughts, the evenness of recollection, the seat of meditation, the rest of our cares, and the calm of our tempest; prayer is the issue of a quiet mind, of untroubled thoughts; it is the daughter of charity and the sister of meekness; and he that prays to God with an angry, that is, with a troubled and discomposed spirit, is like to him that retires into a barrel to meditate, and sets up his closet in the out-quarters of an army, and chooses a frontier garrison to be wise in. Anger is a perfect alienation of the mind from prayer, and therefore is contrary to that attention which presents our prayers in a right line to God. For so have I seen a lark rising from his bed of grass, and soaring upwards, singing as he rises and hopes to get to heaven and climb above the clouds; but the poor bird was beaten back with the loud sighings of an eastern wind, and his motion made irregular and inconstant, descending more at every breath of the tempest than it could recover by the libration and frequent weighing of his wings; till the little creature was forced to sit down and pant, and stay till the storm was over; and then it made a prosperous flight, and did rise and sing as if it had learned music and motion from an angel, as he passed sometimes through the air, about his ministries here below; so is the prayer of a good man; when his affairs have required business, and his business was matter of discipline, and his discipline was to pass upon a sinning person, or had a design of charity, his duty met with infirmities of a man, and anger was its instrument, and the instrument became stronger than the prime agent, and raised a tempest and overruled the man; and thus his prayer was broken, and his thoughts were troubled, and his words went up towards a cloud, and his thoughts pulled them back again, and made them without intention; and the good man sighs for his infirmity, but must be content to lose the prayer, and he must recover it when his anger is removed, and his spirit is becalmed, made even as the brow of Jesus, and smooth like the heart of God; and then it ascends to heaven upon the wings of the holy dove, and dwells with God, till it returns, like the useful bee, loaden with a blessing and the dew of Heaven.

Among lessons of religious instruction to the young, I would by no means omit some on the wisdom of God in the creation. That wisdom is exhibited, and may be presented to the young, in speaking of the wondrous, invariable, perpetual revolutions of the heavenly bodies, of the structure of the human frame, and of the adaptation of its several parts to their various purposes, the display of the kindness of our Creator in the provisions for man and beast in the vegetable world—in short, in the several branches of what is termed natural theology. Lessons of that description, when judiciously given, may exercise a favorable influence in showing the greatness of God and the littleness of man, the boundless extent of heavenly wisdom, and the limited power bestowed on men.

However divine, however excellent, however sublime, are the truths of the Bible—however forcible may be the words addressed to Job, "Canst thou by searching find out God; canst thou find out the Almighty to perfection?" it is a certain truth, in all its variety and all its fulness, which should be early impressed upon the youthful mind, that the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God.

In giving lessons on divine things, the instructor should feel the force of what he teaches, and the solemn truth should at the same time be clearly presented to the young that the mere knowledge of heavenly truths does not change the evil heart of man—that it is Christ our Redeemer, who begins, carries forward, and completes the sanctification of the soul, through the Spirit of the living and eternal God. To the gentlest motions of that Spirit, as well as to the powerful convictions of the same blessed Agent, every intelligent soul should be directed. For it is never to be forgotten that all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God. I believe we cannot fully estimate the blessed consequences to families and to communities, if the minds of the young were reverently, yet judiciously and tenderly, directed to the operation of the Holy Spirit. Connected as it should be with the truths most beautifully presented to us in the words of the Psalmist, "O Lord, Thou understandest my thoughts afar off. Thou art acquainted with all my ways. There is not a word in my tongue, but lo! O Lord, Thou knowest it altogether." Read on and meditate on the sublime description of the Most High which follows in the succeeding verses. In proportion as the will, the understanding, and the heart are surrendered to the government and guidance of the Holy Spirit, the blessed truths of the Gospel become increasingly precious to the soul. I conclude these serious meditations on the teaching of the young, with a few sayings of our Lord and Saviour which have come before me. How comprehensive and brief, yet how full is their import! How vital the truth which they convey. May they be deeply impressed on the young! "Strait is the gate, narrow is the way which leadeth unto life." "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily and follow me." "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter the kingdom of heaven."

The youth, when he leaves school, may return to the parental roof, or he may be placed under the care of watchful friends, or he may be greatly exposed from the want of religious oversight. At this critical period of life, new temptations are presented to him, freedom from restraint often follows, and his individual responsibility increases. The judicious care of the Church is especially valuable at such times. We know that in a kind oversight of children at school, whether in our public schools or in those which are termed private ones, this interest should not have been omitted—with a due delicate regard to the responsibilities of the one who conducts them.

It is, I think, the part of both parents and friends to extend kind counsel to our young men and young women, warning them to be on their guard, both as to books and associates, to the allurements of the world, its dissipation and its follies, to be keenly alive to those insidious snares, whether open or more covert, by which their faith in God and in Christ may be undermined. An abiding sense of the limited powers of the human mind, the spiritual nature of true religion, a deference for the experience of good men and women—are great safeguards at this period of life.

I attach great value to that kind care and counsel, privately and judiciously exercised, which originate in love on the part of older friends. Periodical meetings for the reading of the Scriptures are to be highly valued; papers of an instructive character, kindly written of later times and circulated among Friends; a careful examination of the grounds of Christian principles in the fear of the Lord and in prayer, asking that He will give spiritual wisdom in these several pursuits, are not to be lightly esteemed. But more than all, heartfelt, earnest prayer to the Father of mercies, should be enjoined upon the young, that they may be kept through Christ from all presumptuous sins under an abiding conviction that man cannot keep himself.

May those who have to speak to the young on the sacred, mysterious truths of revealed religion, be instructed as well as comforted by meditating on the solemn words of our Redeemer: "I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes; even so, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight." How comprehensive are the words immediately subjoined! "All things are delivered to me of my Father; and no man knoweth who the Son is but the Father, and who the Father is but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him."

I have now offered to my dear friends some hints on the very early training of youth, on their instruction when at school, and on the oversight of them while passing from youth to manhood. Intimately connected one with the other are those distinct periods of life. I would humbly ask Thy blessing, O Lord, on these my feeble efforts. JOSIAH FORSTER.

MEETINGS AT BADDESLEY ENSOR.

Those who have read William Edmundson's Journal will probably remember his account of his first meeting with George Fox at "Badgeley in Leicestershire,"and how after the meeting they went together into the orchard, where George Fox kneeled down and prayed with and for him. Though within a mile of Leicestershire the village of Baddesley Ensor is in the limits of Warwickshire, and there to this day stands the house still called the "Chapel," but now a farm, with the orchard behind it. It must have been not long after this event that Friends built a meeting-house for themselves on the Common above the village, where till about thirty years ago a meeting was regularly held, though latterly only once a month. Judging by the size of the adjoining graveyard, Friends must have been numerous in the neighborhood, but having gradually died out, the meeting-house was let about eighteen years ago to the Methodists, who use it not only for a place of worship but as a Sunday-school.

It is not a great many years since Friends had five meetings in an almost direct line from east to west, and within three or four miles of each other, viz.—Hinckley, Hartshill, Atherstone, Baddesley Ensor, and Tamworth. Of the revival of the meeting at Hartshill there have been occasional notices in this periodical within the last year or two, but there is no other Friends' Meeting left of these five, excepting the one we are about to notice. Five years ago our friend Edward Brewin held public meetings by minute of his Monthly Meeting in several of these places, and some Friends from Birmingham who accompanied him had their feelings strongly interested in these their deserted meeting-houses, especially as they found that Friends were remembered with affection,' and the closing of them appeared to have been greatly regretted. Finding that a visit would be acceptable, two of these Friends went, on a First-day in the succeeding Eighth month, and held two meetings, morning and evening, in the meeting-house at Baddesley, which, without printed notices, or indeed any other notice than that given by the villagers themselves, were both full, the latter to overflowing, so that many stood round the doors and open windows. The ready acceptance of the Gospel proclaimed in our simple manner, the hearty affection of the people, and we trust some sense of a renewed call on each occasion, has caused that which was originally but a single effort to become an annual duty—the visit of "the Friends" being so regularly looked for, that when on one occasion it was delayed a week or two, application was made to them that it might not be forgotten. Baddesley is a village scattered over the side of a hill which is honeycombed with coal-pits, not as in many places defacing the whole surface, but covered with cornfields and wood. The houses are clustered together or laid out in rows along the lanes, for there is nothing that can be called a street, unless we dignify with that name two rows of houses amongst which are two small inns, a shop or two, and at the top, for they are on the steep side of the hill, the Independent Chapel and the Meeting-house.

The church and the parsonage are one at each end of a wild common on the summit of the hill. The Dissenters live upon very friendly terms, lending each other books and other assistance; the Independent Chapel has been frequently shut up upon the occasion of these visits in order to allow the attendance of the Meeting. The cottage by the side of the quarry, and where Friends rest and dine, has many visitors in the course of the day; and when, during afternoon school, a chapter is read with the children and a few words addressed to them, not a few of the parents will sometimes steal in and sit down in the pews behind them, as if afraid of intruding. And when evening meeting is over, the tracts distributed, and all have received and given a kindly shake of the hand, there is generally a little convoy of miners ready to accompany the visitors clear of the village, and one at least to put them on their way in their four-mile walk to the nearest station. These meetings have revived a very considerable interest in Friends, and have been the means of many of our books and tracts being read in the neighborhood; a number of Friends' standard works having been added to the little library at the Independent Chapel, which is accessible to the Methodists also. We can heartily commend these interesting people to the notice of Friends who may be drawn into the neighborhood by a feeling of concern for the good of souls, or by feeling interest in the very cradle-land of Quakerism.—London Friend.

INSTINCT IN INSECTS.

I was walking through my garden before breakfast one morning, the past week, when my attention was attracted by the unusual appearance of a snake, (a species of the adder,) which was lying dead upon one of the flower borders. The snake measured quite two feet in length, and was as thick through as my thumb at the largest part. It was extended in an almost straight line, and I observed that it had been severed in two pieces, (probably by a spade in the hands of one of the laborers.)

But what immediately arrested my walk, and induced me to examine the object more closely, was that I could distinctly perceive in the prostrate body a singular movement. Within a few moments, while I remained looking at it, it had slowly raised itself at the centre, so as to form a complete arch, then as gradually subsided to its original straight position, but propelled by the action nearly three inches in advance.

This motion, so extraordinary in a dead snake, awakened my curiosity to discover the force which was being exerted upon it, when I discovered two small beetles, of a kind was not familiar with, lying upon their backs beneath the serpent's head and ingeniously pushing with their legs the animal extended above them.

The beetles were each scarcely more than an inch in length, their color a glossy black, variegated with small spots of an orange color, and their heads and tails approaching nearly to a point.

The little fellows had evidently taken possession of the reptile with a purpose of conveying it to their hole, but as their size was so ridiculously disproportioned to that of their dead prize, I was determined to study their manœuvres, to see if they would be able to accomplish it.

On an examination of the ground in the neighborhood, I discovered, at a distance of nearly a yard from the spot where the snake was lying, a small hole in the soil, nearly the diameter of a half dollar. The hole, which had been carefully rounded at the edges, had a heap of broken earth piled in front of it, and opened obliquely from a slightly rising mound.

The efforts of the beetles were apparently being directed to the conveyance of the tail of the reptile to this opening in the ground, and as it was evidently an awkward thing to do, their ingenuity was taxed to the utmost, and I watched the operation with an absorbing interest.

After a vigorous tugging at the animal's tail, which had become slightly stiffened, and which responding to their efforts would move to the right and then to the left, but never placing itself directly in front of the aperture, the beetles would appear to be perplexed how next to proceed. They continued, however, to act in concert, and after working for a while at one extremity, they would uniformly proceed together towards the other, and lying upon their backs beneath the head, they would, with their united legs, re-commence their vigorous pushing process, and so effectively, that in the space of ten or fifteen minutes they had moved the snake's body two or three feet from its original position, but still the tail persistently refused to enter the hole.

Suddenly the labor ceased altogether, the two little beetles entered their hole, and I began to conclude that they had at last found their prey too ponderous for them to manage. My interest, nevertheless, was so much excited, that I could not leave the spot, and I continued to watch, almost certain that they would re-appear.

At length I thought I saw a breaking of the earth at a place directly opposite the point where the serpent's tail rested. And almost immediately the two beetles issued from a second hole, which they had been preparing. They forthwith seized the end of the serpent's tail, and by a determined effort, lying upon their backs, in the manner before described, they succeeded in forcing its point to enter this new orifice in the ground, and then going themselves inside of it, I could distinctly see the whole body of the snake move slowly forward, as if it was being pulled by their united efforts.

The beetles worked at the snake much of the day, and in the afternoon, when I was able to visit the spot again, I observed that nearly three-quarters of the dead snake had disappeared in the hole; but the movement had become very quiet, and I imagined that the cut in the snake's body had prevented any more of it from being drawn down.

The beetles, however, were at their work, for while I was looking they emerged from the hole, one of them propelling behind him (he came up backwards) a huge pile of earth, and the second having his back loaded with a mass of fragments, and thus they continued to labor for nearly an hour, the snake meanwhile having nearly three inches of its body still exposed.

It was approaching sunset, and I was examining carefully the earth in the vicinity of the head of the snake, (for the beetles had not made their appearance for twenty minutes,) when I was witness of the most interesting operation of this altogether singular proceeding.

I thought I detected a slightly undulating motion in the broken loam. It continued to increase until the entire surface for a length of three inches, extending parallel with the serpent's head and neck, appeared to be elevated into a little mound. The mound gradually increased in height until the entire mass of earth was slowly lifted and then precipitated upon the portion of the body which had until then remained uncovered, and in a second's time, the snake was as effectually buried as if it had been sunk a foot below the surface.

The little beetles, emerging from the heap, walked backward and forward, over the mound, and then disappeared entirely from sight.

I examined the spot the following morning, but could not detect, even by removing a portion of the earth, the place where the snake had been buried the evening previous.

"AND ALSO MUCH CATTLE."

When Jonah complained that his prophecy of vengeance had not been fulfilled, and fretfully sorrowed for his perished gourd, God said to him: "Thou hast had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not labored, neither madest it grow, which came up in a night and perished in a night. And should not I spare Nineveh, that great city wherein are more than six-score thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?" "Doth God take care for oxen?" Paul's answer to this question seems to be rather in the negative (1 Cor. ix. 9—10), but the Saviour leaves us in no doubt whatever as to the loving providence of the Almighty for all his creatures. "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? And one of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father." "Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them."

In the Old Testament we are told that God made the beast of the earth after his kind; and cattle after their kind; and everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: and God saw that it was good." When the waters of the flood had "prevailed upon the earth a hundred and fifty days," it is said that "God remembered Noah, and every living thing, and all the cattle that was with him in the Ark." The rainbow is the sign of a divine promise, which includes the inferior animals, for "God spake unto Noah, and to his son with him, saying: "Behold I establish my covenant with you, and with every living creature that is with you, of the fowl, of the cattle, and of every beast of the earth." They are all, like us, God's creatures. "For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. I know all the fowls of the mountain, and the wild beasts of the field are mine." David knew that this ownership and acquaintance meant also divine care. "He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills. They give drink to every beast of the field; the wild asses quench their thirst. . . . He watereth the hills from his chambers. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle."

It is enough to make the angels angry to see the cruelties that are practised upon these dumb creatures of God. What if their tongues should testify at the judgment? The complaint that Balaam's ass made against him was trivial compared to the charges of basest ingratitude and most heartless cruelty that would be brought against many "good Christians" by their animals. They do bear testimony that God understands, and at last they may stand between their masters and heaven.

What God has taken the trouble to make for our good, as the dog, the horse, and the cow,—all the domestic animals, and the birds —we should not have the heart to abuse. Our children should be taught to be kind to their dumb companions and helpers; and that it is cruel and cowardly to cause them unnecessary pain. Public sympathy and support should be given to every movement for the amelioration of the condition of the inferior animals. There is scarcely among us a sign of a more advanced and Christian civilization than Mr. Bergh, the tireless President of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. If his dumb constituents could speak, what a vote of thanks he would receive! There would be nothing in history like it.

As man progresses, so will the creatures that have shared his degradation and misery, and also suffered at his hands. It is curious and encouraging to notice how kindness and confidence shown by a man to a dog or a horse will develop intelligence, affection and devotion in them. They are far more susceptible to considerate treatment than is commonly supposed. Even pigs improve under moral suasion. We knew a couple of these creatures—indeed they lived in a corner of what we once called "our garden"—that were washed regularly, looked bright and clean, knew their friend, and could toss up pennies from their noses with scientific precision, and seeming enjoyment. At all events we should remember how much we have in common with all our fellow creatures—the mystery of life, interdependence for safety and support, the same world, the certainty of death, and the same Creator. He considered the cattle in Nineveh—He considers the cattle in New York. And there is much of the Christian spirit in the moralizing of the Ancient Mariner:

> "He prayeth well who loveth well
> Both man, and bird and beast."

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH 9, 1869.

Standard—Principle—Mission. — The questions of our esteemed New York correspondent are, perhaps, sufficiently answered in the Editorial (No. 4, page 56,) which suggested them. He asks first, what we mean by the word Standard. We used it as we do other English words, and do not appreciate the need of an explanation. When employed in a religious sense it is of course metaphorical, but it is a Scriptural metaphor, and our friend would not fail to be familiar with the frequent and beautiful use of it by the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah. It is often used by the sacred writers as synonymous with ensign or banner, but critically is nearly synonymous with criterion. Government gives a standard by which to regulate weights, measures and coin. The Bible is adopted as a doctrinal standard. Barclay was ready to test all his theses thereby. When we spoke of "a faithful upholding of the standard," the candid reader would, we doubted not, understand by our context that we had distinct reference to the cardinal doctrine of God the Spirit, the Presence of Christ with His Church and with her individual members, as the standard, or criterion by which everything that is claimed as a duty shall be tested. By it (rather let us say by Him) the Scriptures were given, and these and the word nigh in the heart will not conflict, but will and do confirm each other.

Our friend asks what is meant by the mission of Friends,—and here also we conceived that the Editorial sufficiently explained itself. Allusion was made to the popular ignoring, in the days of George Fox, of the great fact of the Christian dispensation, the immediate presence, government and teaching of Christ, in his Church, and in the hearts of his disciples, by his Spirit. The unspeakable gift of his Spirit was spoken of as consequent upon that sacrificial death, our necessary ransom, which rendered the salvation of all mankind possible. These words followed: "The mis- sion of the Friends was to draw out to general recognition and adoption this doctrine which was buried and obscured by traditions, inventions, formularies and dogmas." And this, too, is the principle, respecting our meaning in using which word, inquiry is made. The Editorial continued: "This mission is not ended. Their cardinal principle shows the safe guidance of Him who is the Way, the Truth and the Life, and it teaches the mode of access to the place of prayer. It leads the reverent soul to the footstool of the throne, holds it in waiting till the King's sceptre is extended, and then gives utterance in prayer that shall be in accordance with the mind of the Spirit." The mission of Christ incarnate, the joy that was set before him, was the redemption and salvation of the world. The mission of the Spirit is to convict, convert and comfort souls, to enter holy souls who will open to Him, to make them true communicants, (Rev. iii. 20,) to give them effectual utterance in prayer, nay, even Himself to "make intercession for them." The mission of the Church is to plead with sinners, "Be ye reconciled to God." The mission of the Society of Friends is to perform its part in this great and blessed work of the Church. Its specific mission as a distinct people, for which we claim that it was raised up and organized in the Providence of God, was to proclaim emancipation from the power of sin, to show the practicability of that personal holiness to which all are called, to direct the feet of men in that way (Christ the Way) in which there is no condemnation, to uphold, "because of the Truth," the Standard or Banner of the Holy Ghost. This is the principle which we desire "never to see compromised or modified," by any stated or humanly appointed vocal service of prayer or preaching, or by any vocal exercise in our assemblies for Divine worship that is not rendered a duty at the time by the direct motion of the Holy Spirit. In saying this, we arraign no one, we criticise no one. In love for all who love the Lord Jesus, we bear in remembrance the admonitory query: "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?" We hear of great good done through the instrumentality of other Churches, and many souls converted. This instrumentality may be their mission and we heartily give thanks. Although they "follow not with us," we apply, in a teachable spirit, our Lord's words—"forbid them not." When the angels who dwelt in light and blessedness before man was created, sing together and shout for joy, surely every Christian must rejoice if sinners have turned from the evil of their ways. Whatsoever instrument the Lord may condescend to use, the work is His, and to Him the glory will redound. The instrument of itself is nothing. In His hand it is always sufficient for His purpose. Let every department of Christ's Church be faithful to its mission—and let not Friends fail in theirs. Admiral Penn upon his dying bed foresaw the power which Friends would wield, if steadfast to the principle, the standard, the mission, for the maintenance, the upholding, the performance of which, the Divine Spirit, acting simultaneously upon so many hearts, banded them together in spiritual oneness, conserved by the bond of peace.

Our choice of words may often be infelicitous, and for this we must crave allowance, as personal explanation and self-vindication are distasteful to us, and also, perhaps, to our readers. Let us all seek, in a common affinity, as brethren of one household of faith,

"How to begin, how to accomplish best
Our end of being on earth, and mission high."*

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING.—At the convening of so large a multitude to consider the state of the churches and to transact their affairs, those who are concerned for the advancement of vital religion go up to the solemn assembly with prayers for the peace and prosperity of Zion. This was the case when on the 28th ult. the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders solemnly sat down before the Lord, earnestly seeking to be gathered in His Name, and to experience His presence and presidency through the various sittings. The Yearly Meeting proper opened on the following day, under a covering of Divine love, in which supplication arose for the Presence and blessing of the Father, for the refreshing of needy souls, and that all the deliberations of the body might be guided in accordance with the dictates of the Divine Spirit. "Thanksgiving was offered for the revival of the Lord's work in one branch of the Church; and those laboring among the Freedmen of the South, the Indians of the West, and the heathen in distant lands were commended to the keeping and guidance of the good Shepherd."

The following ministers from other Yearly Meetings were present: From Ohio Y. M., Asa C. Tuttle, Jesse Green. From Iowa Y.M., Joel Bean, Hannah Elliott Bean, Mary B. Pinkham, David Hunt, Jane B. Votaw, and Mary T. Meader. From Western Y.M., Jeremiah Hadley. Stafford Allen, an Elder, from London, was cordially welcomed, though without a certificate.

That love for the brethren so indicative of vitality, was cultivated by an interchange of Christian salutations with all the Yearly Meetings that maintain this intercourse, which, from the rise of our religious Society, has proved comforting, cementing and edifying. Of the London General Epistle 5000 copies were ordered to be printed.

Kansas Quarterly Meeting, comprising the four Monthly Meetings of Kansas, Spring Grove, Springfield and Tonganoxie, made a request, which was granted, to be divided into two Quarterly Meetings. A new one, to be established by the name of Hesper, is to be opened in Third month next,—the old organization to bear hereafter the name of Springdale. There are at present three Quarterly Meetings in Kansas, and these have requested to be constituted a Yearly Meeting, with its location at or near Lawrence. This was referred to a committee who are to visit the meetings. The request was revived for a Yearly Meeting to be held at Wilmington, Ohio. A general expression of sentiment was elicited, and the conclusion to dismiss the subject was arrived at in great harmony, those who desired the change submitting in love to the judgment of the body.

Considerable changes in discipline were proposed, but not agreed upon, except one small erasure.

Space will not admit of further details this week. A correspondent says:

"The meeting is progressing very harmoniously, and in a degree of quietude beyond the expectation of many. An overruling and restraining power prevails."

Charles T. Coffin was reappointed to the Clerkship.

WESTERN YEARLY MEETING—(continued.) Of the 50 Representatives appointed by the eleven Quarterly Meetings, all were present except four, and the absence of these was satisfactorily accounted for. At the opening of the second sitting, Amos Doan was nominated as clerk, and for assistants Elwood C. Siler and Seth W. Pearson. The nomination was approved and confirmed.

The interchange of Epistles with those Yearly Meetings which maintain the Society compact, was conducted by the body "to the edifying of itself in love."

The Committee on Indian Civilization reported continued attention to the subject, the more active labor having, however, devolved upon the Standing Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings.

The Book and Tract Committee reported a very large distribution of Tracts, and $500 was appropriated to their use. The Meeting for Sufferings proposing to reprint Clarkson's "Portraiture of Quakerism," they were encouraged to do so.

A large meeting was held on the subject of Education. Three thousand children between the ages of six and twenty-one were reported as belonging to this Yearly Meeting. On the 20th a joint session was held, to hear from Allen Jay respecting the destitution caused by the drought in many parts of North Carolina. A collection was taken up for the relief of the sufferers. The sum of $420.19 was paid on the spot. A committee was appointed to call on Friends at their homes for money and provisions, and a Central Committee also, to receive and apply the proceeds. The relief was not to be extended to Friends exclusively.

The following statistics were presented:

Number of members of Western Yearly Meeting, males 4,669, females 4,657,—total, 9,276. Number of children between six and twenty-one years, 3,000. Number of families, 1,904. Number admitted by request during the past year, 199. Births, 199. Deaths, 115. Disownments, 51.

It was reported that 795 read the Scriptures daily in their families, 932 do so occasionally, 177 neglect this wholesome practice. There are 933 who use tobacco, 65 who cultivate it, and 39 who sell it. It was shown that members of this Yearly Meeting expend, in three years, in this carnal indulgence, money enough to establish a good college.

The committee appointed last year upon the request of Onargo and Ash Grove Monthly Meetings to be constituted a Quarterly Meeting, having visited those meetings and Vermillion Quarterly Meeting, reported favorably to granting the request, which being approved, a committee was appointed to attend the opening of the new Quarterly Meeting.

The Peace Committee reported the distribution during the year of 70,100 pages of tracts, and 220 books and pamphlets.

The sum of $1000 was reported as raised for the purposes of the Baltimore Aid Association, and the old committee was continued to raise the same amount by voluntary contributions, to forward it early, and to report next year.

A large and interesting meeting was held on the care of the freed-people. The annual meeting of the Bible Association was held, in which a lively interest was manifest. Public meetings were held on Indian Affairs and on Peace. The former was addressed by Friends who had recently been among the Red Men. The Executive Committee of the Associated Committees of the different Yearly Meetings on Indian Affairs met on Fourth-day, the 22d. Philadelphia was represented by an Executive Committee appointed, it will be remembered, with entire unity by an "Association of Friends" organized in the Yearly Meeting house, in harmony with the general movement of Friends in America. This drew beloved Friends together from different localities, and nearly all the American Yearly Meetings were represented.

The consideration of the state of Society called forth a living concern for the spiritual health of the members—and various matters, not mentioned here, claimed necessary attention.

The Yearly Meeting closed in solemnity on Fourth-day, 9th mo. 22d, about 2 o'clock P.M.

DIED.

CARPENTER.—On the 24th of Eleventh month, 1868, De Witt C. Carpenter, M. D., son of William and Ann B. Carpenter, at their residence near Milton, N. Y., in the 23d year of his age; a member of Marlborough Monthly Meeting. The mantle of Christianity had been thrown around him at an early age, which proved to be a protection and source of comfort in the hour of affliction. It enabled him to see and say that there was nothing here below worth living for; that his sufferings, which he bore with Christian resignation, were all for the sake of the dear Saviour. His numerous friends feel that their loss is his eternal gain.

DORLAND.—At his residence in the township of Hillier, Prince Edward Co., Ontario, on the 12th of Fifth month, 1869, Stephen H. Dorland, in his 42d year; a valued member of West Lake Mo. Meeting. His family, the Society and the neighborhood have lost a counsellor of value, yet they have the consoling evidence that he was prepared for the change.

FIELD.—At her late residence in Union Springs, N. Y., on the 31st of Eighth month, 1869, Deborah D. Field, in the 74th year of her age; a member of Scipio Monthly Meeting. She was a patient sufferer for several years. She exemplified the Christian graces in her daily life, and her end was peaceful.

Baltimore Yearly Meeting.—The business session will open on Seventh-day, Tenth mo. 16th, at 3 P. M., the Meeting of Ministers and Elders at 10 A.M., and the Meeting for Sufferings at 7½ P.M. of same day.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING

Opens on Second-day, Eleventh month 7th. Arrangements have been made in Indiana for Friends who wish to attend, to start from Indianapolis on Second-day evening, Tenth month 25th, to be provided on that day with half-fare tickets. The fare from Indianapolis to Greensboro and return at any time within the limit of 60 days will be $34.35. Those who wish to avail themselves of the reduced fare must start in a body, or join the company on the way. They are requested early to notify Addison Coffin, Ano, Ind., and to state whether they wish boarding engaged during the Yearly Meeting.

For Friends' Review.

CIRCULAR OF THE BIBLE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS IN AMERICA.

In again calling the attention of Auxiliaries to the Annual Queries to be answered previous to the general meeting of the Association in the Eleventh month, the Corresponding Committee would press upon Friends, who have been engaged in the distribution of the Holy Scriptures, the importance of furnishing full and accurate answers to all the Queries, and of forwarding their report seasonably to the Depository.

It may be recollected that in making donations to Auxiliaries, the Board are guided in deciding what number of Bibles and Testaments shall be sent to each by the information given in its report. Hence those Auxiliaries that do not report in time are liable to be left out in the distribution.

Specific directions should be given in every case, how boxes should be marked and forwarded, and their receipt should always be promptly acknowledged.

QUERIES.

1. What number of families or individuals have been gratuitously furnished with the Holy Scriptures by the Auxiliary during the past year?

2. What number of Bibles and Testaments have been sold by the Auxiliary within the past year?

3. How many members, male and female, are there belonging to the Auxiliary?

4. What number of families of Friends reside within its limits?

5. Are there any families of Friends within your limits not supplied with a copy of the Holy Scriptures in good clear type, and on fair paper; if so, how many?

6. How many members of our Society, capable of reading the Bible, do not own such a copy of the Holy Scriptures?

7. How many Bibles and Testaments may probably be disposed of by sale within your limits?

8. Is the income of the Auxiliary sufficient to supply those within its limits who are not duly furnished with the Holy Scriptures?

9. What number of Bibles and Testaments would it be necessary for the Bible Association to furnish gratuitously, to enable the Auxiliary to supply each family?

10. What number would be required in order to furnish each member of our religious Society, capable of reading, who is destitute of a copy, and unable to purchase it?

11. How many Bibles and Testaments are now on hand?

CORRESPONDENCE.

Western Yearly Meeting.—This assembly has again met, and its deliberations are over. Meeting for Sufferings on Fifth-day, A. M., the 16th inst.; the Meeting for Ministers and Elders on the afternoon of same day; and Yearly Meeting at large on the morning of the 17th, with a meeting for public worship in the afternoon of same day.

There were in attendance as ministers from New England, Tobias Meader; from New York, Wm. Henry Chase; from Michigan, Richard Harkness; from Ohio, Robert Douglass; from Indiana, (Ind. Y. M.,) Daniel Williams, Luke Woodard, Amos Bond, Jesse Reese and Anna Overman; from Iowa, David Hunt, Mary B. Pinkham and Mary Cox.

The various sessions of this meeting were interesting and instructive occasions. About 2500 Friends, of all ages and of both sexes, of every grade of intelligence and experience, and of every order of gift, were assembled from the farm, the shop, the counter,—from every variety of business life,—to become a "unit in their variety," in the transaction of the general business of the Church. All were on a common level. No superiority but that which wisdom and experience give was known. No hierarchy, no clergy, no laity,—all "ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake." They were met to deliberate on the financial, educational, social and spiritual condition of the church,—to consider the progress of its work in the distribution of the Bible in our own and in foreign lands, in the education of the Southern Freedmen, in the spread of useful knowledge by books and tracts, and in the work of reading the Holy Scriptures and acquainting the minds of their people with the laws, and commandments, and precepts of that good book, and in the work of Education.

How solemn is the service of hearing reports of the Ministers and Elders from their several fields of labor, of the life, unity, love and faithfulness which are exhibited in their work! These deliberations were marked by much scrutiny and honest labor, which will not be forgotten when those who heard return to their homes. The Lord owned his people and bound them closer together, and made them feel near one another in love.

The state of Society at large was exhibited on Second-day morning. It occupied one entire session. We may rarely witness a time of so much faithful labor and searching inquisition. What if judgment should begin, on such occasions, at the house of God! It is good when we can endure the sword which "turneth every way" and which can divide the joints and the marrow. We like to see men and women lay the lines to the stones of Zion and measure them accurately, and to see the workman with a skilful hammer knock off the spalls and bring the figures out in clear relief, and show how the fit is made in the Temple.

Religious talebearing was well analyzed. The artful telltale who sends church scandal from neighborhood to neighborhood, from State to State, and the ear that itches to hear bad news and colors it only to send it farther and make it worse, and the eye which delights to conceive distorted imagery and to contemplate it in deep coloring,—in fine, whose delight and happiness consists in congratulating himself on his own excellence and the contrast he makes with his object of criticism,—was forcibly and fully exposed.

Love, Charity, a proper estimate of all, were spoken to in terms of strong commendation. But to discharge our duty in the church, in the nation, in the world, we must be intelligent,—have clear, comprehensive and broad views of men and principles, and learn the art of reading suitable books, and how to glean the public news without being contaminated by its trash. This was a good day for the church. It will not be forgotten.

The General Committees on Education, on First-day, Scripture and Colored Schools, on Indian civilization and Bible distribution, &c., are occasions when in committee of the whole a free consultation is had on the reports from the Quarterly Meetings, and their statistics compared and digested into general reports on those subjects to the Yearly Meeting.

Some of the most interesting occasions of the Yearly Meeting were the meetings for worship. Not only was the house filled, holding near 2500, but three outdoor meetings were simultaneously conducted: a hungry multitude from all parts of the country, and made up largely of citizens of every order of religious sentiment, all having a common interest in the object of membership. The gospel had free course on these occasions. May the Good Husbandman, in time, gather a plentiful harvest!

Taken all together, the last Yearly Meeting at Plainfield was an occasion when the blessing of the Lord was felt and the church was refreshed together.

On the afternoon of the 23d, the last service was finished. The ministers from other churches had given to them assurances of the approval of the meeting. Responding epistles were sent out to the sisterhood of churches in Europe and America with the single exception. When will the broken link become warm enough to weld?

One circumstance cannot be overlooked. A general conference was held on the 22d and 23d by the associated committees of the American Yearly Meetings, on the management, civilization and Christianization of the Indian tribes. From one Yearly Meeting delegates were accredited from "an association of Friends." We were glad to have them, and would be glad to see many more with us of the same fraternity. Even churches should have exceptions under their rules of order. B. C. H.

Richmond, Va., 9th mo. 25th.

Dear friend Wm. J. Allinson.—I have just read with much interest in the Review, the article entitled "Lands for the Freedmen," taken from the Poughkeepsie Eagle, under the signature of W. B. C., and I desire to say that in my judgment it is a step in the right direction. The plan proposed is feasible, and must result, if carried out, in much good to the suffering freedmen, and prove a safe investment to the philanthropists thus employing their means. While I fully endorse the plan proposed for permanent aid, I am compelled to say that it could not reach their present necessities. The extreme drought of the summer has entirely destroyed the corn crop in many localities, and it is well known that this was their chief dependence. It is certain that help must be rendered by the hand of charity, as they are really now many of them on the very verge of starvation. Already many scholars are kept from our country schools to gather nuts in the woods to subsist upon, their parents not being able to provide meal for their dinners. A colored woman said to me a few days ago, "Walnut soup is mighty nice." The time which must elapse before they can "make corn" will call forth all their efforts to procure food, and it looks as though they would fail unless they get help. Many are now sowing the English turnip as the last resort, and some few to my knowledge have planted Irish potatoes since the rains have come. How much these efforts will do for them remains to be seen. I hope and trust, as their true condition becomes known, steps will be taken for their immediate relief, as well as to procure for them permanent homes, that they may enjoy something as their own and "not be burdened with high rents." May there be a noble band found who can really say and act up to the sentiment, "We want to give them a better chance to live."

Thy sincere friend, Samuel H. Jones.

New York, 9th mo. 21, 1869.

Dear friend W. J. Allinson.—In Review of the 18th, in speaking of the Society of Friends, thou says:—"Their strength, however, does not consist in numbers. A faithful upholding of the standard is required to make the mission successful. This may be done by a few: it will be more effectually done by many, if all are true to their calling. The exaltation of the principle is needed by the world; and we desire never to see it compromised or modified." In a company of Friends who were together conversing on religious subjects last evening, the desire prevailed that thou would give the readers of the Review a clear and full exposition of what thou means by the words, standard, mission and principle, as here used. I am glad to be the medium of communicating this desire, as I believe a more definite and clear understanding among the members of our own Society, as well as others, of what is the true standard we should uphold, and what is or should be our mission as a Society, would do much to promote the health of the body and further the cause of Christ.

Affectionately thy friend, W. H. Ladd.

THE EVER-WIDENING WORLD OF STARS.

And here it may be asked how the conclusion thus deduced from the arrangement of stars and nebulæ can be said to tend to enlarge our views of the world of stars. On the contrary, it might be urged, the views which had prevailed before, presented us with nobler conceptions of the universe. For we were able to recognize in the thousands of nebulæ which fleck the dark background of the sky, sidereal systems as noble as that of which our sun is a member; and in the existence of countless star systems we had a spectacle to contemplate before which the human intellect was compelled to bow in its utter powerlessness and insignificance: whereas it seems as though the new views would reduce the scope of our vision to a single galaxy of stars, unless some few members of the nebular system may still be looked on as outer star-schemes.

But on a closer inspection of the views I have been maintaining, it will appear that they largely enhance our conceptions of the scale on which the world of stars is constructed. Until now it has been held that the telescopes which man has been able to construct enabled us to scan the limits of our sidereal system, and to pass so readily beyond those limits as to become sensible of the existence of thousands of other schemes as noble as our own or nobler. But if the new views should be established, we should be compelled to recognize in the world of stars a system which our most powerful instruments are not fully able to gauge. The clusters of stars, whose splendor has so worthily excited the admiration of the Herschels, the Rosses, the Struves, and the Bonds, must be looked upon as among the glories of our own system, and indicative of the multiplied forms of structure or of aggregation to be found within its boundaries. As of late, our conceptions of the wealth of the solar system have been enhanced by the discovery of numberless new objects and new forms of matter existing within its range, and co-ordinating themselves in regular relations with the earlier known members of the system, so we seem now called on to recognize in the stellar world an unsuspected wealth of material, a hitherto unrecognized variety of cosmical forms, and an extension into regions of space to which our most powerful telescopes have not yet been able to penetrate.

But now I would call attention to a peculiarity of the southern skies which, while apparently affording conclusive testimony in favor of the new views, has unaccountably (in my opinion) been urged as an argument tending in quite another direction. There are to be seen in those skies two mysterious clouds of light, which were called by the first Europeans who sailed the southern seas the Magellanic clouds, and are now commonly spoken of by astronomers as the Nubeculæ. Examined by the powerful telescope of Sir John Herschel, these objects have been found to consist of small fixed stars and nebulæ, grouped together without any evidence of special arrangement, but still obviously intermixed,—not merely seen projected on the same field of view.

These strange objects have given rise to many speculations; and among the definite views put forward respecting them is one recently expressed in a most valuable communication to the Royal Astronomical Society from the pen of Mr. Cleveland Abbe, an astronomer who has labored in the sound school of the Poulkowa Observatory. Having recognized in the peculiar arrangement of stars and nebulæ above referred to, an argument that the nebulæ lie beyond our system, Mr. Abbe suggests that the Magellanic clouds are two of the nearest of the nebular systems, which thus exhibit larger dimensions than their fellow-schemes.

The basis of this, which may be termed the positive theory of the Nubeculæ, is the hypothesis which may be termed the negative theory. Whatever these objects may be, astronomers have said, they are quite distinct from the sidereal system, nor are the nebulæ seen within them to be looked upon as fellows of the other nebulæ. For in the Nubeculæ we see what we recognize nowhere else, the combination, namely, of clustering groups of stars and freely scattered nebulæ. It is the characteristic (still I am quoting the theory) of the sidereal system that where its splendors are greatest nebulæ are wanting; it is the characteristic of nebular aggregation that it withdraws itself in appearance from the neighborhood of clustering star groups. But in the Magellanic clouds neither of these characteristics is to be recognized; therefore these objects are distinct from either system.

Nor has another argument been wanting to indicate the distinction that exists between the Magellanic clouds and the other splendors of the celestial vault. Sir John Herschel, sweeping over their neighborhood with his 18-inch reflector, was struck with the singular barrenness of the skies around him. With that expressive verbiage which gives so great a charm to his astronomical descriptions, he forces on our attention, again and again, the poverty of the regions which lie around the Nubeculæ. "Oppressively barren," he describes them in one place; "the access to the Nubeculæ on all sides is through a desert," he says in another. And this peculiarity, thus established by the certain evidence of an observer so able and trustworthy, has been held by many to imply, in the clearest and most distinct manner, that there is no connection between the Nubeculæ and the stellar system.

To me the evidence afforded by the barrenness of the region round the Magellanic clouds points irresistibly in the opposite direction. Why should some outer system, free as is assumed of all association with our own, occupy that peculiarly barren space which so attracted the attention of Sir John Herschel? But if we look on the coincidence as striking in the case of one, how much more remarkable will it appear when the only two outer systems of the sort thus brought within our ken are associated in this way with the most singularly barren region in the whole heavens! Surely the more natural conclusion to be drawn from the phenomenon is that the richness of the Magellanic clouds and the poverty of the surrounding districts stand to each other in the most intimate correlation. Is there not reason for concluding that those districts are poor because of the action of the same process of aggregation which has attracted within the Nubeculæ a larger share than usual of stellar and nebular glories?*

It need hardly be mentioned that the former argument, on which the distinction between the Nubeculæ and other celestial objects has been founded, is disposed of at once if we recognize the stellar and nebular systems as in reality forming but a single scheme. Not only so, but the Nubeculæ afford a striking argument in favor of the latter view. To return to the somewhat homely illustration made use of above. Our conceptions of the original association between the stones and the gravel arranged in the manner indicated would certainly be strengthened, or would even be changed into absolute certainty, if we perceived in a part of the ground two heaps in which stones and gravel were intermixed. When I add that there are two distinctly marked nebular streams leading towards the Nubeculæ, as well as the several well-marked star-streams tending in the same direction, the evidence of association seems irresistibly strengthened.

If these views be accepted, we shall have to look upon the world of stars as made up of all classes of clustering aggregations, besides strange wisps and sprays extending throughout space is the most fantastic convolutions. Then also, while dismissing the idea that the nebulæ as a class are external systems, we may accept as highly probable the conclusion that some of the spiral or whirlpool nebulæ really lie far beyond the confines of our system. For we see in these objects the very picture of what the new views show our sidereal system to be. There are the spiral whirls corresponding to the double ring of the Milky Way; there are faint out-lying streamers corresponding to the phantom star-streams traced by Sir John Herschel; there, also, are bright single stars and miniature clusters,—nay, there also may even be recognized large knobs or lobes of clustering stars, forming no unapt analogue of the Magellanic clouds.—Fraser's Magazine.

NOTICE.

The Fifth Biennial Conference of Teachers and Delegates from Friends' First-day Schools in America will be held in Philadelphia, beginning Eleventh month 17th, 1869, at 4 o'clock P. M., for the consideration of the First-day School work and kindred subjects. All Friends interested in Scriptural Instruction are cordially invited to attend.

By order of the Executive Committee.

CHARLES TABER, Secretaries.
WM. G. RHOADS,

* Sir William Herschel has recorded a peculiarity respecting nebulæ which is worthy of mention in connection with the facts above considered. "I have found," he says, "that the spaces preceding nebulæ were generally quite deprived of stars, so as often to afford many fields without a single star."

JOHN HENRY BACKHOUSE.*

"He asked life of Thee, and Thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and ever." PSALM xxi. 4.

We asked for life, dear Lord, for him—
A life attuned unto Thy praise.
We asked in faith. Thou gavest him
The length of everlasting days.
Thou gavest service, made him meet
To sit amid the bloodwashed throng,
Then led him forth to Jesus' feet
To join the everlasting song.

We longed that earth might know his tread,
God-sent, amid her haunts of crime,
That his good record might be read
Throughout the coming years of time.
Thou hadst not thus o'erfilled his hand
With seed to sow on life's broad plain,
But called him where the reapers stand
To gather in the golden grain.

We asked a grandsire's mantle white
Might fall upon him, as he trod
Thy chosen pathway, in the light
Of Thy dear countenance, O God.
Thou hadst a better robe in store,
Thou wouldst not give thy dear child less;
Full white, he wears on yonder shore,
The robe of Jesus' righteousness.

The pathway which our prayers had planned
Was all beset with bristling thorns,
And Thou didst lead him by the hand
Into a path Thy love adorns
With "lilies of immortal peace,"
And where the tree of life has shed
Its twelve-fold fruit: where conflicts cease,
And over all Heaven's calm is spread.

Thou gavest richly, as a King,
In answer to our earnest prayer.
And now, those troubled hearts we bring,
Who, in their cup have found full share
Of Marah's drops of bitterness.
In parting from their loved one thus,
Be pleased their drooping hearts to bless—
Thou who alone canst comfort us.

Be near, through all these heavy days,
Apportioned, Father, by Thy will,
And let them murmur, in their praise,
"Thou smitest, but we love Thee still!"
No chastening, saith Thy voice so calm,
But proves their names are graven deep
Upon their Saviour's pierced palm;
Watch o'er them, Father, while they weep.

O! comfort them while tear-drops fall,
To Thy dear face their dim eyes raise,
And show them how Thou gav'st him all
The wealth of everlasting days.
Unto their faith, O Father, prove
The blessing which he has with Thee,
The fulness of a Saviour's love,
The glories of Eternity. A. B. T.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—European advices are to the 4th inst.

GREAT BRITAIN.—Lord Clarendon, in the course of an address delivered before the Hertfordshire Agricultural Society, acknowledged that the subject of land tenure in Ireland was a momentous one, but said it should not be considered a party question. The evils connected with the present system must be abated. He strongly condemned those landholders who ejected tenants and reaped the whole benefit of their labor and expenditure. He believed that the rights of property should be upheld and its duties enforced by law. The government, he said, intends to introduce a measure which will command the respect and praise of every honest man.

A vessel bringing the first cargo of tea of the new crop arrived in London on the 1st, having been only 64 days in making that part of the voyage from Java home.

FRANCE.—The Empress has again set out on her proposed Eastern tour, and on the 2d inst. had proceeded as far as Venice.

The official paper has announced that the Senate and Legislative Body have been convoked for 11th month 29th. Nearly all the journals express dissatisfaction that the meeting has been so long postponed.

SPAIN.—The disturbances at Barcelona had been quelled and the city was quiet; 125 persons had been arrested for complicity in the affair. Others had fled, destroying the telegraph wires and railroad tracks to prevent capture. A dispatch of the 5th from Madrid announced that telegraphic communication with the Southern provinces was interrupted, and a republican insurrection was believed to be in progress in that section. Formidable bands were also said to be collecting in Catalonia.

It was asserted that at a council of Ministers it had been agreed to propose to the Cortes the election as King, of the Duke of Genoa, a nephew of the King of Italy. The Liberals were said to be generally opposed to him. A later dispatch stated that a commission of 15 Deputies to the Cortes had been charged with the duty of reporting on the various candidates for the throne.

The Cortes met on the 3d. The government introduced a bill to suspend the rights of individuals until the insurrection in the South is suppressed.

A circular has been published in the official gazette, instructing the Captain General of Cuba to treat the rebel prisoners with humanity, and deal with their offences through the ordinary tribunals, and urging him at the same time to push forward reforms in his administration.

TURKEY.—The mediation of the great Powers of Europe in the matters at issue with Egypt is said to have been satisfactory.

THE SUEZ CANAL.—A dispatch from Alexandria of the 30th ult., announced that the barrier against the passage of the waters of the Bitter Lakes had been removed, and that M. Lesseps had passed through the canal, in a steamer, from Port Said to Suez, in 15 hours.

SOUTH AMERICA.—Advices from the hostile armies in Paraguay to 8th mo. 22d, have been received at Lisbon. On the 18th, the Allies attacked the forces of Lopez entrenched at Curupaity. The Paraguayans were completely defeated, losing 1000 killed. 300 prisoners and 12 cannon. Lopez, with the remainder of his forces, fled to Ignacion. On the 21st he was again attacked, losing 25 cannon. The Paraguayans abandoned all their steamers, which fell into the hands of the Allies. The provisional government established at Asuncion by the Allies had declared Lopez an outlaw. Another account (the date of which is not given) stated that Lopez, in evacuating Ascurra, removed every thing, including artillery; that during the pursuit, 3000 Paraguayans were attacked by 30,000 of the Allies, and in a desperate engagement of six hours, lost 2500 men. and all their archives and specie. Paraguayan accounts represented the Brazilian loss in these various battles as 8000 men. Lopez retired to the Grand Cordilleras and thence to Acquarsa, where he had previously prepared a new position for his forces. The Allies were said to be preparing to withdraw from Paraguay, leaving a few troops to support the provisional government. The Argentine government had recalled its contingent.

CHINA.—An Austrian official journal stated that the treaty between Austria and China was duly signed recently at Tien-tsin.

SANDWICH ISLANDS. — Several severe shocks of earthquake occurred in Hawaii in the 8th month, and general apprehensions were felt that still heavier ones might follow.

MEXICO.—The Congress assembled on the 16th ult., the anniversary of Mexican independence. The President's opening speech congratulated the members that they could celebrate that anniversary with peace prevailing throughout the republic, the laws obeyed, and the government strong enough to repress rebellion and disorder. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the last year showed $13,765,000 of receipts and $12,500,000 of expenditures, and stated that $2,000,000 had been applied to the payment of the public debt.

The Humboldt centennial was celebrated at the capital, all nationalities participating.

DOMESTIC.—The public debt statemement for the 1st inst. showed a total debt, principal and interest, of $2,634,609,806.09 ; cash, sinking fund and purchased bonds in Treasury, $166,114,783.98 ; leaving an excess of debt of $2,468,495,072.11. Decrease of debt during last month, $7,467,429.29 ; decrease since 3d mo. 1st, 1869, $56,968,187.90.

The receipts from internal revenue during the first quarter of the present fiscal year were $10,000,000 greater than during the corresponding period of 1868. This, it is stated, is attributable simply to a more efficient and honest administration of the law, as in the interval not only have imposts not been increased, but one tax, on manufactures, has been entirely abolished.

A shock of earthquake was felt at Fillmore, Utah, on the 1st inst., lasting about two minutes, and the next day, one occurred at San Lorenzo, Cal.

The boiler of a steam-engine exploded at the State Fair at Indianapolis, Ind., on the 1st, at a time when the grounds were crowded with visitors ; by which 20 persons were killed, and between 50 and 60 injured, some of them probably fatally.

Destructive freshets have occurred recently in Minnnesota. On the 3d inst. an unusually heavy rain fell east of the Alleghany Mountains, of the effects of which we have partial accounts from Washington, D. C., to Lewiston, Me. Throughout this extent, great damage was done, by the rising of all the streams, to railroads, bridges, buildings, &c. On the Schuylkill the freshet was the highest since that of 1850, and at some points it is said to have exceeded that.

In the latter part of the 8th month, a number of colored persons were driven out of Rutherford Co., Tenn., by lawless bands who attacked their houses at night, subjecting them in some cases to personal ill-treatment, and threatening their lives. Many of them took refuge in Nashville. A proclamation issued by the Governor proved ineffectual to arrest the outrages, and on the 31st of 8th month, the Governor made formal application to Gen. Lovell, commanding U. S. forces in that district, for troops to aid in suppressing these riotous proceedings, which, he said, had become too formidable to be overcome by the civil authority of the State. Detachments were accordingly sent to Monfreesboro and Smyrna.

Believing that it well becomes the Church thankfully to recognize, in those taken from it, that work of grace whereby they were brought into the love of Christ and prepared for His service, we think it right to record a brief memorial of our late dear friend Lucy Fowler.

She was the daughter of Nicholas and Ann Waterhouse, of Liverpool, and born in 1803, being one of a large family of brothers and sisters, with whom she shared the privilege of religious training and care. She became a member of our Monthly Meeting in 1826, by her marriage to our late dear friend Thomas Fowler, of Tottenham.

It was evident, in her early married life, that she was under much religious impression; and we believe that earnest and prayerful was the exercise of her spirit, both for herself and her dear husband; as also in the bringing up of their son and only child. A marked seriousness, and interest in our various religious meetings and concerns, commended her to the notice and esteem of her friends, among whom for many years she held the office of Overseer, manifesting much diligence therein, and especially on behalf of those requiring outward help as well as Christian care.

But it was not until several years after she had become a bereaved widow in 1851, that she gave up to confess her Lord in the public ministry of the word, under the constraining of His love and as an act of faith. Her communications were generally brief, but clear, giving no uncertain sound in the doctrine of redemption by the Saviour of sinners, and enforcing His own teaching, "Ye must be born again," as well as setting forth the work of the Spirit in the heart and the fruits thereof. Her invitations to "behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world," are fresh in our remembrance. She was also frequently and weightily engaged in prayer and supplication with thanksgiving.

Her ministry being evidently in the obedience of faith, and acceptable to us, was acknowledged by our Monthly Meeting in First Month, 1861. Although not apprehending herself called to travel distinctly as a Gospel messenger, there is no doubt that in her journeys, not a few of them on Christian errands, she was careful to attend to the requirings of religious duty. And very earnest were her desires and efforts for the gathering of souls to Christ, both within and without our own borders, and for the upholding of the whole truth of God contained in Holy Scripture. She was also, and that in a wide sense, "a succorer of many;" particularly in her latter years, when her Christian love flowed towards all, especially to those who loved the Lord Jesus in sincerity. This we could regard not as the result of natural disposition, but of the shedding abroad in her heart of the love of God. Nor would we omit, to the praise of His "power that worketh" in the contrite, believing and subjected soul, that she became what she was through many struggles and much conflict of flesh and spirit, as well as through tribulation, as appears by the following short extracts from the few notes that she left, which do not extend later than 1848, and which show that she was an experimental witness to the necessity of the work of an overcoming faith, and to its efficacy, even amid the infirmities she felt to abound.

"11 mo. 22, 1847.—Oh, for more willingness to be nothing, and to be esteemed nothing. I believe I do earnestly desire and pray that self may be slain in me, but the struggle between flesh and spirit is hard."

"8 mo. 20, 1848.—Returned home on the 15th in peace, having experienced much benefit in health from the change, as well as refreshment by many kindnesses received, and still more by sweet seasons from the Lord's presence: the language of the Psalmist appears to arise, 'Oh, bless our God, ye people, and cause the voice of His praise to be heard, who holdeth our soul in life, and suffereth not our feet to be moved.'"

"9 mo. 7, 1848.—'The Lord our Righteousness,' blessed words! but far more blessed to me The Lord my Righteousness."

Having been induced, from weakened health, to winter on the shores of the Mediterranean, and though considered to be much recruited thereby, she died at Cannes, after a sudden illness lasting only about an hour, on the night of the 20th of First Month, 1869. Her latter days had been marked by much serenity and peace, and before retiring to rest that last evening she had been sweetly engaged in prayer after the Scripture reading. With little suffering, unconsciously and gently she passed, we reverently believe, to her heavenly rest in the Saviour she loved, and whom it had been her delight to honor and to serve.

THE INWARD REVELATION OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

The kingdom of God cometh not with observation: neither shall they say, Lo here! or, lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you. Luke xvii. 20, 21.

For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Rom. xiv. 17.

For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power. 1 Cor. iv. 20.

Dear Christian reader, did it ever occur to thee that it is possible for thee to know thy Heavenly Father to reveal Himself to thee by an inward sense of His blessed presence, so that thou mayst talk with Him as to a personal friend; mayst tell him all thy trials, difficulties and needs; mayst ask Him for the desires of thy heart, as thou wouldst ask one able to grant thy requests? I say, dost thou believe all this possible and within thy reach? Let me assure thee it is, and very much more also, if thou wilt diligently seek for it. But thou mayst say, These things are too high for such an one as I to attain to, they have been known only by a favored few, as the Prophets, Apostles and such like; but for common folk in this life there is no such experience in store. Beloved reader, thou art mistaken. "God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness is accepted with Him." Dost thou believe on the Lord Jesus Christ; art thou born again; dost thou fear the Lord and work righteousness? If so, then thou art accepted of Him, and mayst look for Him, where only thou canst find Him, in His kingdom, which He Himself declares is within. Didst thou ever look for and seek Him in thy heart, for it is there He reveals Himself, and there only canst thou find Him? "For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them and walk in them." 2 Cor. vi. 16, and John xiv. 17. Now as the Scriptures assure us that in God we "live, move and have our being," and that we are His temple, is it not a matter of necessity, if we wish to find the Lord, that we should seek for Him in that place wherein He dwells? Some may say, How can I look for Him, how can I find him? Scripture answers, "Draw nigh to God, and He will draw nigh to you;" "Seek and ye shall find;" "Those that seek me early shall find me;" &c. It may be said to those who are in earnest to know the Lord, Be diligent in prayer. Our Saviour spake a parable to the intent that men should always pray and not faint; and "the Lord will be sought unto." We must wait upon Him through all the distractions of our wandering thoughts; we must not be discouraged, but to the best of our ability concentrate our thoughts upon God, seek Him with our whole heart, plead with Him to lift up the light of His countenance upon us, expecting this blessing, and that He will reveal Himself to us. If He tarry, wait in patience, realizing that we are before Him, and that in order to know Him, He must manifest Himself to our hearts, giving us an inward sense of His blessed presence and making us feel that He is our reconciled Heavenly Father.

The Apostle declares that we are reconciled to God by the death of His Son. So we are; and if we seek and find the Lord as above described, we shall know this great truth for ourselves, and shall go on our way rejoicing, feeling that through redeeming love we are delivered from the bondage of corruption, and are translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son. And then shall we know that this kingdom is indeed within; and that it is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost; neither is it in word but in power. J. M. W.

CONSECRATED LOOKING-GLASSES.

BY HOWARD CROSBY.

"And he made the laver of brass, and the foot of it of brass, of the looking-glasses of the women."—EXODUS XXXVIII. 8.

The laver stood before the tabernacle, between the brazen altar and the entrance of the sanctuary. As the altar represented the atoning work of Jesus, so the laver represented his cleansing work, the expiation for sin and the purifying of the heart being both necessary for entrance into the holy house of God. These were the only two articles of the holy furniture that were placed without the tabernacle. The candlestick, the shew-bread table, the incense-altar, and the ark were all within, unseen by the outside spectator. Those inner articles represented experiences of the renewed soul, but these two outer ones, the great altar and the laver, represented the means of renewal, without which there could be no such experiences. The very order in which these two were approached by the priest on entering the sanctuary is significant. First was the great altar, whereon the victim bled, and then, after this, the laver was reached. Thus was indicated the grand truth, that punishment for sin must first be administered by Infinite Justice before the polluted soul of man could receive the Holy Spirit and be cleansed. The altar exhibited death for sin; the laver, life obtained by that death. The altar showed Jesus carrying captivity captive; the laver showed him giving gifts to men. The altar was Calvary—the laver was Pentecost. The altar was the Christian's rescue—the laver was the Christian's life. Both these articles of furniture were made of brass, because they were without the tabernacle, where all could see them; but the articles within, representing the deep things of God as seen by the pardoned and cleansed heart, were of gold. There was in this difference a meaning of comparison. This pictorial gospel was enacted before Israel every day. Its general outline they could understand, pardon obtained through a substituted victim accepted by God, and the purifying of the soul by the grace of God: and with this general outline they doubtless had from priest and prophet and patriarchal tradition much that served to fill up the picture, now, by the divine purpose, lost to us who have the historic sacrifice in all its plainness. We can now look back to that which was instruction, and make it illustration. We can see in these two advance-guards of God's house the twin conditions of faith and holiness for the Christian citizenship. As without faith it is impossible to please God, so without holiness no man shall see the Lord. The two are inseparable. A man who trusts the sacrifice receives the Spirit, and a man who is full of the Spirit is trusting in the sacrifice. To say, "I am pardoned, and therefore I may sin as much as I please," is as absurd and impossible as to say, "I am pure, and therefore scorn a pardon." . . . But our text leads us to another spiritual consideration. We are told that Moses manufactured the beautiful laver out of the looking-glasses of the women, the polished brazen mirrors, which, before the invention of glass mirrors, performed their functions in private and domestic life. Now, such an act was not an accident, and its record is no accident. Every thing in this region of the tabernacle and its story is teeming with spiritual meaning. It is holy ground—it is enchanted ground. To argue here as you would before a heathen shrine is to bring down Jehovah to the level of Baal, and put the divine ordinances by the side of human inventions. Every order here given comes from the heart of God. To make it empty and meaningless is to blaspheme the Most High. Rather let us reverently strive to discover the meaning of these divine symbols and receive their high instruction. We may be sure that as much as possible of the ritual alphabet was decipherable by the ancient Jews to whom it was addressed. Some things, by their very nature, could not be understood until the event should interpret them; but much, very much must have been a Gospel and rule of life for present use and understanding. God does not delight, like the old Greek oracles, to puzzle and deceive. If he speaks darkly, it is because of a necessity. His desire is to enlighten and instruct his people, and he uses all means possible to this end. We may be sure from his character as given us in the Scriptures, and as recognized by our spiritual intuitions, that, in the Tabernacle and its ritual, there was a constant instruction of the people in great spiritual and practical truths as involved in the symbols daily beheld by them.

The fact that the whole of the large and beautiful laver was composed of the looking-glasses of Israelitish ladies, was a fact that must have associated itself with great tenacity with the sacred basin in the minds of all the Jewish beholders. Let us look with Jewish eyes upon the laver and learn the lesson that comes from this fact of its origin.

The looking-glass is the best representation of that microcosm of individuality which is known by the French word "toilette." There is a proper attention to this department of life necessary to meet the demands of cleanliness and neatness in both sexes; and from the simple fact that women have longer hair than men, the former must devote more time than the latter to this exercise. But that which may be rightly used for the modest purpose of neatness and cleanliness may very easily be abused for the immodest purpose of vanity and display. And this has been from time immemorial one of the peculiar temptations of the fairer sex, probably because they are the fairer. It was this temptation that had its warning in the construction of the laver. This emblem of holiness said in its symbolism, "Ye ladies of Israel, beware of vain show. Rather use your precious time and energy, which might be wasted on selfish adornments, in promoting the cause of holiness in your own hearts and the hearts of others." This voice speaks yet in the sacred history, and the apostles accompany it with their inspired injunctions. "Let women," says Paul, "adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety, not with braided hair or gold or pearls or costly array, but (which becometh women professing godliness) with good works." And Peter adds, "Whose adorning, let it not be the outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man (or personality) of the heart in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." It will not do for Christian women to slight these express and reiterated injunctions of God's word. They are written in God's word, because they are connected with spiritual prosperity and with God's honor. There is a practical infidelity common among some who bear Christ's name, which ignores the plain statements of the Bible by flippant allusions to Paul's [alleged] bachelorhood or to the advance of the 19th century. But it is the Holy Ghost who speaks through Paul the bachelor* and Peter the married man in precisely the same tones, and He speaks for the nineteenth and twenty-ninth century just as directly as for the first. The word of God abideth forever. That word declares that a vain adorning of the person is a hindrance to grace and displeasing to God; and yet, in spite of this witness of heaven, Christian women are constantly daring to say, "Oh! what harm can there be in it?" and the faithful sister who reminds them of God's will in the matter is set down as a puritan or fanatic. If I were called upon to point out the most alarming sins in this city to-day, those which are most widespread in their ravages, most deceitful in their influences, and most soul-destroying in their ultimate effects, I would not mention drunkenness with all its fearful havoc, nor gambling with its crazed victims, nor harlotry with its hellish orgies, but the love of money, on the part of men, and the love of display, on the part of women. While open vice sends its thousands, these fashionable and favored indulgences send their ten thousands to perdition. They sear the conscience, encrust the soul with an impenetrable shell of worldliness, debauch the affections from every high and heavenly object, and make the man or woman a worshipper of self. And, while doing all this, the poor victim is allowed by public opinion to think himself or herself a Christian; while the drunkard, the gambler, or the prostitute is not deceived by such a thought for a moment.

(To be concluded.)

* There is, we believe, no sufficient reason to call Paul a bachelor.—Ed.

WEARING MOURNING.

The following sensible article from the Central Baptist will meet the full approbation of every intelligent man and woman in the land. Speaking of the absurd custom of wearing mourning, the Baptist says:—

"We long for the day when this custom shall be obsolete. It is unbecoming the truly afflicted one. The wearer says, by the black garments, "I have lost a dear friend. I am in deep sorrow." But true grief does not wish to parade itself before the eye of the stranger; much less does it assert its extent. The stricken one naturally goes apart from the world to pour out the tears. Real affliction seeks privacy. It is no respect to the departed friend to say we are in sorrow. If we have real grief it will be discovered.

"When God has entered a household, in the awful chastisement of death, it is time for religious meditation and communion with God on the part of the survivors. How sadly out of place, then, are the milliner and the dressmaker, the trying-on of dresses, and the trimming of bonnets. There is something profane in exciting the vanity of a young girl by fitting a waist, or trying on a hat, when the corpse of a father is lying in an adjoining room. It is a sacrilege to drag the widow forth from her grief to be fitted for a gown, or to select a veil. It is often terribly oppressive to the poor. The widow left desolate, with half a dozen little children, the family means already reduced by the long sickness of the father, must draw on her scanty purse to pay for a new wardrobe, throughout, for herself and children, throwing away the goodly stock of garments already prepared, when she most likely knows not where she is to get bread for those little ones. Truly may fashion be called a tyrant, when it robs a widow of her last dollar. Surely your sorrow will not be questioned, even if you should not call in the milliner to help display it. Do not in your affliction help uphold a custom which will turn the afflictions of your poorer neighbor to deeper poverty, as well as sorrow."

The origin of the Wheeler street Meeting in 1656, in the then half-rural district of Spitalfields, is described as an assembly of a "few convinced" gathering "in a little upper room" in the house of one John Oakley. The congregation rapidly increased, and to provide for the enlarged number, a canvass tent was erected in the garden, and ultimately a meeting-house. It was from the Wheeler St. that William Penn was taken by Sir John Robinson, Governor of the Tower of London, five months after his famous trial for preaching in Gracious St. On this occasion, when before the Governor, he, after pleading nobly the rights of conscience, exclaimed, "I scorn that religion which is not worth suffering for and able to sustain them that are afflicted for it; mine is."

In 1742, the location becoming unsuitable for the meeting, it was given up, and the congregation connected with that at Devonshire House. This meeting took its name from its originally occupying a part of a great mansion belonging to the family of the Earl of Devonshire. About 1678, the first meeting-house was built on the property. In 1741, extensive alterations were effected. In 1766, the freehold of the property was obtained, and some adjoining lots having been purchased, in 1789 the two large meeting-houses in which the Yearly Meeting was held were built. Other additions have since been made, and the improvements now comprise three meeting-houses, thirteen dwelling-houses, a Literary Institute and about twenty rooms used for committees and other society purposes.

The early worshippers at Devonshire House had to bear their share of the persecution inflicted upon Non-conformists. Scarcely had they taken possession of their rooms in 1666, when the authorities seized it in the King's name, padlocked the door and affixed the mark of the broad arrow as a sign of its being Government property, under the Conventicle act.

No guard, however, was set to maintain the seizure, and accordingly Friends quietly removed the padlock and continued their meeting. Friends were frequently turned out of doors, and George Whitehead, John Burnyeat and other preachers were often arrested, and occasionally a score or two of their hearers with them were dragged off to Newgate. To be allowed to hold their meeting in the adjacent court, or street, even in hard frost or pelting rain, was often the best treatment they could hope for. But too frequently this open air worship was disturbed by the drum-beat of soldiery as they rushed up with swords and staves and cruelly maltreated the unoffending Quakers. One instance of oppression may be particularized, as it culminated in the martydom of the sufferer. It was on the 1st of Second month, 1683, that the meeting was violently broken up by Lieutenant Minchard and a band of soldiers. These laid about them unmercifully, and the Lieutenant himself struck John Sparsfield so violently on the head, that the poor man went home ill, and died in about ten days. The authorities thought it only decent to go through the forms of an inquiry. An inquest was held, but during the proceedings the guilty Lieutenant sat beside the coroner. The witnesses were snubbed and the jury brow-beaten, and a verdict of "death from natural causes" was finally recorded.

"That ancient and honorable elder, George Whitehead," was for fifty years a member of Devonshire House Meeting. He kept a grocer's shop in the vicinity. So frequent were his imprisonments, that he prepared before leaving his home for the probable contingency of having to spend the next night in Newgate or Bridewell. At the early age of 24, he with three other young companions were allowed to plead the cause of Friends at the bar of the House of Commons, when the bill of 1662 for the suppressing of Conventicles was under debate. He had naturally a courteous manner and a felicitous style of address, and was received with favor by those in authority. In the presence of four sovereigns in succession, Charles II., James II., William III., and George I., he stood forth as the undaunted champion of religious freedom whenever the course of legislation seemed to threaten the rights and privileges of his brethren. During the great plague in London, George Whitehead, though absent at its breaking out, on religious service, returned to aid his friends both in prison and at their homes, in the height of the pestilence. He says: "The Lord preserved me by his power, through faith, from that infectious distemper." In 1723, his long and laborious career came to a close. He gently passed away in his 87th year, having been a minister of the Gospel for threescore years and ten.

Some of the early minutes of Devonshire Monthly Meeting record the care of Friends respecting their poor members. At one time it is mentioned that "a shoemaker is out of work, and Friends are advised to let him have their shoes." At another, "a widow's little store of old money is exchanged for coins of full value," and "Sarah Downes, appearing here and requesting stuff to buy her a gown, John Simms is to lay out ten shillings for her."

On the subject of marriage we find on minute that "complaint is made that some Friends in marrying have spoken inaudibly," and advice is given from the Quarterly Meeting "that all Friends concerned having caution therein aforehand, may avoid having to speak twice, and that each Monthly Meeting, when they observe any defective therein, do cause such to speak twice at the times of their proposing their marriage, that they may be prepared to an audible, grave method of speaking, before they come to the time of their marriage meeting."

Another ancient meeting in London is the Peel Meeting. It was first held on the premises of John Elson, a carpenter. In his workshop he permitted the little flock of "Convinced" in that vicinity to assemble for worship. As early as 1656 Friends began to meet in the carpenter's yard, and ever since upon that spot the meeting has been maintained. Richard Claridge, originally a priest in the church of England, and afterwards a Baptist Minister, who joined Friends in 1696, was one of the prominent members of this meeting.

The rise of the Society of Friends on the south bank of the Thames is thus described:

"It was in the summer of 1654 that Francis Howgill and Edward Burrough were preaching and teaching in London and the neighborhood, as we have previously stated. One day they addressed an assembly at an Anabaptist meeting-place in Southwark. Much disputation followed; some pleading on one side and some on the other; but the result was that a number of the Anabaptists seceded and became Friends."

"As in other places, our first glimpse of the newly convinced reveal to us the little companies meeting in private houses to wait upon God. They told others of the treasure they had found, and from time to time "public Friends" came among them; and from day to day the churches were edified and multiplied. In 1654, we find one little company meeting at the house of David Fleming, in Blackman Street, and another "in the little parlor at William Shewen's house, in a yard at the sign of the two brewers in Bermondsey St. Then shortly afterwards a widow named Mary Webb allowed Friends to meet in the garden of her house in Fair Street. This assembly was the parent of the future Horsleydown Meeting."

A meeting-house was soon erected by the widow Webb and her friends, and it was not long before cruel persecutions assailed them. 'During the year 1662, eighty persons were at different times taken from this edifice to prison, of whom several died in gaol. In the following year we read of the silence of the meeting being broken by the sudden inrush of excited soldiers, firing their muskets as they entered. They would follow up this demonstration by bruising and cutting the unoffending worshippers, and even amused themselves by firing their muskets, charged with powder, whilst the muzzles were pressed against the dresses of the women so that their clothes were burnt and their bodies scorched. In succeeding years the meeting at Horsleydown was still kept up in the face of similar violence and the dragging off of twenty, thirty or even sixty of the attenders to prison. Some of these never regained their freedom in this life."

In 1670, a Royal mandate was issued that the meeting-house itself should be pulled down. On the 20th of the Eighth month this was carried into execution. On the following day Friends met and held their meeting on the heaps of rubbish till the soldiers appeared on the scene and dragged them away. It is hardly needful to recount in detail the harrowing scenes that occurred at this spot during the next four months. Friends were beaten and cut with clubs and pikes and halberts till their blood lay conspicuous in the street. Women and even girls were not spared; they suffered blows and wounds like their fathers and mothers, were dragged along the streets fastened to the saddle-bows of the cavalry, and otherwise maltreated; and still through all the meeting was kept up. "If you knew what orders we had you would say that we dealt mercifully with you," said a soldier on one occasion, although it seemed as if almost everything short of actual murder had already been attempted. The meeting-house was rebuilt, and Friends continued to meet in this locality until 1800, when the premises were sold, and the congregation joined to another meeting held at Redcross Street, called the New Park Meeting, and in later times known as the Southwark Meeting.

LIONS AND TIGERS, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL

Lions and tigers may be bought in London wholesale and retail, like haberdashery or cheese. At this moment bears, monkeys, zebras, tigers, leopards and other wild beasts are all on sale, together with a fine young lioness, who is warranted "to tear you to pieces if she can get at you," and birds and reptiles innumerable. These are at the great central warehouse for wild beasts in Ratcliffe highway; from which neat little parcels of tigers and zebras, ten of each in all, were sent last week to their purchasers in the provinces and on the Continent. There is no limit to this strange trade. The extremely animated stock can be inspected any day. Agents are at work for the wild beasts dealer in every quarter of the globe, and he dispatches "travellers" to pick up strange varieties in Central Africa or South America, just as other traders send buyers to Paris or the city. He has dealings, too, with most of the governments of Europe; our own Zoological Society pays him thousands, and his establishments are always filled with birds and animals enough to stock a menagerie. The supply varies daily, for consignments are constantly coming in, and the creatures sold are as constantly packed off; but call on Jamrach—the very name is savage, and strangely belies its courteous owner—when you will, a curiously lively collection will make themselves heard.

Once in Ratcliffe-highway you may find your way to Jamrach's by ear. The macaws, parrots and paroquets of his retail shop are shrieking always; you have but to follow their sounds to find yourself in one or other of his establishments. The first of them is given up to strange foreign ornaments, and the other to birds. In the one, vases, monsters, idols, joss-houses, mandarins' feathers, ivory knick-knacks, huge white tusks, with portraits of eminent men engraved on them in black, fans of immense capacity, and grotesque color, Chinese shoes, Japanese pictures, strange pipes and stranger gew-gaws are for sale.

At the end of the narrow yard is a sort of stable, over which is a loft to be gained by steps. The recent departure of the tigers and zebras has left the stable empty for the moment, and we ascend to the apartment above it, preceded by the attendant in charge. The manifestly business air of the place, and the way in which the denizens of the stall are regarded as mere items of stock, with fixed prices attached to each, soon affect a stranger. Insensibly to himself, he comes to regard wild beast dealing as an ordinary branch of commerce, the peculiarities of which sink into the background in the face of the matter-of-fact arrangements and forms of speech. It is beasts instead of hams or calicoes, that is all, and "We can do you a neat thing in hyenas!" or, "Can I tempt you with this tasty article in the boa-constrictor line?" would rouse no sense of incongruity if said. Accordingly when you are invited to pass up the ladder into the loft, you do so as carelessly as if complying with a request to walk from one show-room to another in a fashionable shop.

You are interested, but not excited, calmly willing to see all that is brought before you, but neither anxious or perturbed. But this lasts only till you are head and shoulders above the floor of the apartment reached by the ladder. It is quite open at the side by which it is gained from the cage-lined yard, and you are plainly seen by everything with flashing, luminous eyes all around it. If your pulse bounds up suddenly many degrees, if your face flushes and blanches alternately, and you feel a curious tightness across the chest, as if it were tied by a cord, which reminds you of that one great crisis in your life in which you feared you would succumb and go under to be seen of men no more—if these physical and mental phenomena assail you, there will be nothing exceptional in your case.

The contrast is great and sudden between what you have been seeing and what you see, and your temporary illusions as to the prosaic commerce in beasts are gone. A roar, a growl, a snort; a mad dash at iron bars; a frantic desire to flesh white and pointed fangs in your carcass; vigorous writhing and tossing by some powerful body upon a wooden floor, and against wooden partitions, which shake and rattle under the shocks they have to bear, and a kaleidoscopic effect in which ferociously beautiful eyes, a savage mouth cavernously open, tawny bristly hair, and ponderous limbs and talons are intermixed confusedly, form your greeting as you pass from the topmost rungs of the ladder to the floor. It is only a young lioness, who has "taken a fancy to you" in the most liberal sense of that phrase, but the transition is sudden, and you do not recover your presence of mind easily.

A cab drives up laden with what look like packing-cases, and a foreign-looking young man alights and presents a bill of lading. "A little lot of rare birds from America," it is explained; and the packing-cases turn out to be strong wooden cages, which, with the red ibises, the white eagles, and the "trumpet-bird" they hold are speedily brought in, amidst a chorus of derisive welcomes from the macaws. "When we've many animals waiting at a particular place we generally send an agent over for them. My son is on his way to Calcutta now, where there are three rhinoceroses, six tigers, some elephants and smaller things waiting to be brought away. The last pair of rhinoceroses I had I sold for £1,200; and I supply fine tigers at about £300 each, and zebras—I've a lot waiting at Southampton now—at from £450 to £500 the pair."

We learn, moreover, that Mr. Jamrach occasionally lends animals he has on hand, and that a couple of elephants belonging to him are at the "Jardin des Plantes" in Paris at this time; their keep and a considerable fixed sum per month being given as an equivalent for their presence. A tray of dead birds of rare plumage is here brought in, "the losses of a single day;" and a subsequent inspection of the wild beast dealer's books shows that hundreds and sometimes thousands of pounds a month are lost by death among the stock. "There'll always be a percentage of sickly beasts and birds in every hundred sent over, and as these mostly die, they make a heavy item when we cast them up at cost price in the books, as you see we do at the end of every month." The organization for the carrying on of this strange trade is not the least curious of the many curious things connected with it. No native hunter or trapper, in any part of the globe, however remote, but knows where Jamrach's agent and Jamrach's purchase money can be found; and from an Indian jungle to an American prairie or an Esquimaux hut, commercial agitation and the hope of gain prevail, whenever anything of an extraordinary or unusual character is caught. The trade list of this singular place is a lesson in natural history; a visit and conversation there, is to learn natural history coupled in the oddest way with political economy and profit and loss.—London Daily News.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH 16, 1869.

Possible Overturnings.—It is not our desire to meddle with the family difficulties of other religious societies, and we would not wittingly make any statements constructively unjust. But knowing the high value attached by Episcopalians to their Book of Common Prayer, (which one of their Bishops called—"that book which is only not the Bible;") it is interesting to notice the extending dissatisfaction with it as unprotestant in some parts, and the demand for a revision. This is, however, objected to by some as an insufficient remedy for the ritualistic extravagances which seem to be gaining ground. The venerable Stephen H. Tyng, referring to various suggested amendments, says:

"The consideration of these specified desires has only served to strengthen my conviction that all attempts at separate, limited and partial amendments will fail to satisfy those for whom we act, and will impede rather than promote the one great end, to which we must look, if we shall be compelled to adopt it—viz., the establishment, under the gracious providence of God, of a Church, whose principles shall be true, and whose formularies and standards shall perfectly conform to them and embody them."

Again he says:

"Much as I have shrunk from such a prospect, I cannot resist the conviction that we are fast tending to an entire reconstruction of our ecclesiastical system. The avulsive action in our Church manifestly increases continually, both among the laity and clergy. I look forward to the general meetings of this autumn as an occasion at which we shall probably settle finally great principles of contest and action, either resulting in our separation or our submission," &c.

In view of such possible new organization, Dr. Tyng claims for it the right of constructing its own platform.

"If such a reconstruction is to be accomplished, the body formed anew must have, and will claim, the privilege of providing for itself the aspects, the utterances and the forms which shall be considered most adapted to its new condition. No other persons or assemblies can perform or prepare this work."

The Protestant Churchman, an ably conducted periodical whose editors may be supposed to understand the facts of the day, has given repeated intimations that a large portion of the Evangelical members must be driven from the present organization, unless there be some check to the extreme pretensions and the rigorous rule of which grievous complaint is made. In an editorial with the caption, "Two families in one house," the Churchman asserts:

"The High Church Ritualists all regard the authority of the visible Church as equal, or superior, to that of the Bible, and deny the right of individuals to interpret it. They believe there can be no Church without a Bishop, and that all Churches with Bishops are true branches of the Catholic Church. Hence their Romish sympathies and predilections. They also hold and teach the efficacy of sacramental grace, in the regeneration of baptized infants, in Confirmation and the Holy Communion; and they also hold to the power of priestly absolution, believing that we can come to Christ acceptably only through a human, sinful Priest, who, so that he be a 'Priest,' may be as ignorant of the power of religion in his heart, as he is enslaved to its outward forms."

All this is given as information which will interest the readers of the Review. It may serve to show to some who are unstable that there is no permanent and true rest, for them that are spiritual, in what a poet called a "sweet ritual, beautiful though dead,"—and that an array of imposing forms will not impart the life of religion or satisfy the hungry soul. That there are many sincere Christians of the denomination now referred to who are, with good and sufficient reason, uneasy and alarmed at the growing tendency to a reliance upon forms, is, we trust, a cheering indication. If it be so

"That forth, in His appointed hour,
The Spirit of the Lord is going,"

we trust that many souls, being breathed upon and quickened, will experience that "the word of the Lord is quick and powerful," and that, receiving grace upon grace, they will know of a truth that the typical and the ritual are not the glorious Reality which they once foreshadowed, and in whom they were fulfilled; and that the dispensation of the Holy Ghost, not consisting in meats and drinks and divers washings, is emphatically one of Spirit and of Life.

To do Good and Communicate Forget not.—Cases frequently come to our knowledge of persons anxious to receive the Review, whose lack of pecuniary means forbids the expense, and correspondents send us word that our paper might advantageously be presented to such and such Libraries, Reading-rooms, Colleges, Prisons, &c. The Review aims not to be a money-making concern. There was formerly a contingent fund, which was entirely expended during several years of loss by non-receipt of payment from a large number of distant subscribers, and before the price was reluctantly raised.

A number of our Friends, in different localities, knowing of persons to whom the Review would be acceptable, quietly subscribe for them. Some others have sent to this office the price of a specified number of copies, to be sent in our discretion, and such liberal and judicious contributions are scrupulously appropriated as directed. Grateful acknowledgments are occasionally sent to us, and from one just received an extract is given:

"Through the kindness of a Friend the Review has reached my secluded home. It was received with tears of gratitude, and welcomed as a special messenger of peace and love. Whilst my spirit is exercised with a desire that its perusal may prove a spiritual blessing to me and the loved ones at home, I also desire that a blessing may attend its perusal everywhere, and that it may still prove a blessing to the Church."

The Review has many friends, whose unity and sympathy are strengthening to the Editor, in an engagement which causes a daily sense of responsibility. Among these there are some to whom it may be only needful to suggest that it is in their power, in this way, to enlarge our circulation, and thus at once sustain the paper on a sound and safe basis, (pecuniarily,) and confer a substantial benefit upon a number of persons, (assuming an average of five readers of each copy.) Does it occur to those who expend largely in book and tract distribution that the Review includes both books and tracts, and, if made a domestic visitor, would be a welcome missionary, introducing topics of interest and instruction to the solitary apartment, to the fire-side group, and to the evening circle?

The Serpent's Bite and the Adder's Sting.—In this week's department of Correspondence will be found extracts from a letter of Eli Jones, which, however, was not sent for publication. He will excuse the liberty, for he practically confesses the sentiment, "We are not our own." It is committed to the printer, and sent forth to the readers of the Review, with a very fervent breathing in prayer that the last paragraph, on the subject of Intemperance, may, by the great Husbandman, be guided as good seed into good ground, and there take root and bear fruit, God giving the increase.

In all the wide field for philanthropic labor we know not that there is any department which presents a stronger claim than the temperance cause. And the service needed is a varied one. First, let every one present a blameless example, and thus employ a potent means to encourage entire abstinence from all that can intoxicate. Be faithful in the exercise of moral suasion upon all occasions. Public speaking upon the subject may be the duty of many. There are many thousands whose right line of service may be, under the heavenly influence of the Saviour's love, to afford a happy companionship to persons in danger of becoming inebriates,—to those who, to gratify their social feelings, resort to drinking-saloons. Speak to such tempted ones kindly—walk with them in the street—make them thy personal friends—visit them and receive their visits—invite them to libraries and places of safely acquiring instruction—lend them books—be happy thyself in making them so. Love is the fulfilling of the law, and it is the strongest power in the moral universe. Think of the example of the most merciful Saviour, when,

"For thee and such as thee, impelled by love,
He left the mansions of the blest on high, Midst sin and pain and grief and fear to move,"

and be willing to forego some luxury of privacy and tranquil enjoyment, if peradventure thou mayest be enabled to please a neighbor for his good unto edification. How many a friendless youth has, by his mere social longings, been drawn to seek society amidst snares and pit-falls, and has gone down to the chambers of death because no man sufficiently cared for his soul to give him safe and holy surroundings.

There are not a few who are ready to denounce the drunkard, and who would visit with legal penalties the outbreaks of the inebriate, never having stretched forth a hand to his rescue, nor sought to enamor him with the green pastures and still waters of a virtuous life. But there is a more excellent way:

"You say Sir Andrew with his love of law;
And we, the Saviour with his law of love."

AUTHORITY TO PREACH.—A correspondent asks: "How far is it allowable for a minister of another Christian denomination to take part, as a minister, in a Friends' meeting?"

It will be readily conceded that such a person cannot claim a right paramount to that possessed by our own members. And membership in the Society of Friends does not include or convey the privilege of speaking in a meeting for worship. In such meeting, as we previously had occasion to remark, "no one has a right to speak who has a right to be silent." In an abstract view, denominational membership has nothing to do with the question. The only ministry which the Society of Friends can recognize is that which the Holy Spirit calls for and moves unto at the time: not a general call to preach sometimes, but a special qualification and call to do it now. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." A servant of the Most High may enter the meeting of a Society in whose list of members his name is not to be found, and be constrained to deliver a message. The authority is one which we recognize, and without which we do not endorse or justify an offering in preaching or in prayer, even from one of our acknowledged ministers who may often before have given full proof of his ministry. Rebecca Jones was a member of the Episcopal Church. She was drawn to attend Friends' meetings, but never asked to be enrolled as a member. Her mouth was opened in living ministry, the source and authority of which were so evident, that the Church felt bound to acknowledge the gift, and recorded her as a minister. Thus made an officer in the Society, her membership followed on the principle that "the greater includes the less." We need not tell how beloved she was for the work's sake, and that she was a succorer to many, in this land and beyond the ocean.

Have we sufficiently answered the question? A person who moves under the immediate inspiration of the Divine Spirit in an act of Christian ministry, has an authority which the Church or body of Christ, if convinced thereof, is bound to admit; and to deem this "anointing" limited to any particular class of believers, were inconsistent with our belief in the universality of Divine grace. At the same time, a minister who does not accept the theory of ministry which is organic in the Society of Friends, would be unlikely, when in one of our meetings, to wait for any more distinct and present evidence of a call to speak in his Master's name, than he would look for before his own congregation, to whom he is bound by contract to preach at stated times. If he, not being a member, should interrupt the devotional silence on an authority which, in the case of a member, would be an insufficient warrant, we see not how to avoid the conclusion that his ministration is intrusive. Nor does this expression of sentiment include any taint of uncharitableness. An authorized and living ministry is a blessing to be thankfully cherished by the Church. A message from Him who is the Head, should ever be reverently received by a congregation. And it is truly a favor when, in such congregation, those whom the Holy Ghost and the Church have appointed as watchers of the flock, are so quick of understanding in His holy fear as to be enabled to distinguish His message from the voice of the stranger.

GRATEFUL ACKNOWLEDGEMENT is due from the Editor to all the Friends who have kindly furnished him with accounts of Yearly Meetings. When two Correspondents have simultaneously written, both have been valuable as confirming each other, supplying items which one may have overlooked, and saving the Review from risk of inaccuracy.

It is supposed that letters from Ohio Yearly Meeting have been lost in the mail, and the delay is regretted, as we incidentally hear that it was a highly favored season. The Clerk has kindly promised to send the printed minutes.

A SIGNATURE NECESSARY.—It is required that the Editor should be apprized of the names of those who write for the Review. This is of course confidential if so wished.

The "pigeon holes" of our office contain sundry manuscripts which, for want of a signature, remain unread.

ANNUAL MEETING OF PHILADELPHIA AUXILIARY BIBLE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS, Fourth-day evening, 27th inst., at 7½ o'clock.

DIED.

BALDWIN.—On the 27th of Eighth month, 1869, William Baldwin, son of Isaac and Sarah Baldwin, in the 42d year of his age; a member of Shawnee Monthly Meeting, Kansas. He was a bright example in the attendance of religious meetings, and in upholding and supporting the doctrines and principles of our religious Society. In the removal of this dear Friend his family and friends have experienced a great bereavement; but an abiding belief is felt that, having done his day's work in the daytime, he has been permitted by the mercy of God (in Christ Jesus our Lord) to enter into everlasting rest and peace.

MEADER.—Suddenly, in Rochester, N. H., on the 13th of Ninth month, 1869, Hanson Meader, in the 62d year of his age; an esteemed member of Dover Monthly Meeting. Consistent as a Christian and exemplary as husband, father and neighbor, a loss has been sustained under which his family and friends have the comfortable assurance that, through living, practical faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and through His mercy, his purified spirit is at rest with the redeemed.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DIRIGO, MAINE, 10th mo. 5, 1869.

My dear friend William J. Allinson. * * * We reached our home on the 10th of 8th month, after a rather long and in some respects unpleasant passage across the Atlantic, and found our dear aged mothers, though feeble from great age, still able to welcome us in our coming and enjoy delightfully the society of their children and friends. * * *

I have been solicited by the people in several neighborhoods to come and tell them about what I have seen in the Bible Lands. In some instances I have responded to the invitation. The desire to hear appears to be very general. I feel it a privilege, and to some extent a duty, to tell, as I have opportunity, of what we have seen of the Lord's work in those far off lands, and of his protecting care amid dangers, seen and unseen, with the added testimony that the word of the Lord is good unto his servants in this age as heretofore: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." "Let all his servants say, The Name of the Lord be magnified!"

Among many other special blessings for which we should thank and bless our Heavenly Father, during our late visit to Palestine, is that of a good interpreter, in the person of Jacob Hishmeh, who seems to have been providentially supplied, and whose heart is really in the work. From a letter received since our return I propose to give thee a few extracts.

"The day after your departure I left Caifer and reached Nazareth in the afternoon, and found my family enjoying good health. The next morning I was called upon by the Maronite Priest to thank me for the Bible he received from me. He told me that he was longing to obtain this precious Book of God for a long time, but was not allowed by his superiors to obtain it." * * * "Almost all the ladies expressed a great desire to see Mrs. Jones another time, because they said they cannot forget her word of exhortation mixed with Christian love to them. I went to the villeges of Cana, Endor, Nain, Shunem, the town of Jezreel, and the larger village of Nures, which is situated on the top of the mountains of Gilboa, and held meetings in all these villages, and I am happy to write thee how I was welcomed and kindly received in every one of them, my hearers giving great attention to what was read and spoken. This filled my heart with joy and thanksgiving.

The good Sheik of Endor accompanied me to all these villages and introduced me to his brother, the Sheik of Nain, who asked me to visit him often. At reading the 6th chapter of Luke, he said, "I believe with all my heart that it is Jesus of Nazareth who raised to life the son of the widow woman in this village."

At Nablous I met my dearest friend, Chalil Jamal, who is going to spend about a month among the Arab Bedouins beyond Jordan to preach, God willing.

Sheik Ali El Mohamad of Endor, Sheik Zain El Ali of Shunem and Sheik Ali El Hassan of Singiel, send to you all their salutations, and my friend Chalil Jamil, who is now beyond Jordan, sends his love to you. * * * All the congregation at Jerusalem send you their salutations. * * * Please send me Arabic Bibles and Psalms from the new edition. Many people are very anxious to have these books."

A dear friend of Stoke Newington, in a letter, makes reference to Elkanah and Irena Beard, and says: "Robert and Christian Alsop have gone with them to the south of France, and will see them (D. V.) safe on board the Nyanza for Alexandria on Seventh-day, the 19th (of 9th mo.); after which they must go forward alone as to provided companionship, but followed by the prayers of many, and equally under His care who has promised to be with His own disciples alway —'even unto the end of the world.'" It is fitting that these dear friends should be followed to their distant field of labor by the prayers of their fellow-believers on either side of the great waters. May they not be withheld. * * * * *

Sarah F. Smiley was expected on the 9th ult. at Aberdeen, on her return from the Orkney Islands. * * * * *

James Owen, accompanied by Isaac Sharp, was at my last accounts in the vicinity of London, and appears to have been well received.

One naturally turns from a review of the work in foreign lands to inquire what is being done in our widespread country to roll back the increasing tide of evil constantly setting in upon us by the annual influx of hundreds of thousands of emigrants and from the demoralization of our home-born citizens consequent upon the late terrible war, and the fearful scourge of intemperance resulting from the improper use of intoxicating liquors. I sincerely rejoice in what Friends are doing to ameliorate the condition of the Red Man resident in our western wilds, and for the black man, both freed and free born. I am glad also to notice a growing interest in First-day schools, and in Biblical instruction in general. And I would that the hands of each class of these workers might be strengthened in the Lord by the sympathy and prayers of their brethren, and so labor in His fear as to be blessed with the greatest measure of success. Then how large and rich the harvest!

But have we no tears to shed,—no effort to put forth to save the inebriate from his fearful doom, if he continue as such? No sympathy to extend—no work of love to perform for his more than widowed wife or more than orphaned children? Are there not fellow-servants within the pale of our Society who would gain more than a penny a day if willing to labor in this field—a field hitherto but little occupied by our members outside of the fold. Is it enough that we have to some extent washed our hands from the baneful effects of the evil? No, not while our country groans beneath a load that annually bears down to the grave thousands of her sons. No, not while there is one for whom Christ died that stands in need of our help, and who, if we will, can be aided by us to walk in the path of virtue. * * * * *

ELI JONES.

THE SOLAR MUTABILITY.

Science is every day teaching us to think of the sun, and what have now been so long called the "fixed" stars, with less and less of that sense of fixity which their enormous importance to planetary beings would seem to render desirable. Not only have we learned that all these so-called fixed centres of separate universes are themselves travelling in different directions (dragging their planetary systems after them) with enormous speed, though their distances from our own system are so great that, in the few centuries we have had to study them, the change has not become very apparent to ordinary perceptions; but we have also learned that many of them are "variable" stars,—our own sun amongst the number,—becoming brighter, and again less bright at fixed intervals of years; that some of them have broken up and disappeared some years (or perhaps thousands of years) before the blank caused by their disappearance could have struck the human retina. Nay, more, we now know that our own sun, (resembling in this, probably, most other solar bodies of the same kind) is in so highly fluid and excitable a condition as to be constantly sending out from its surface forked tongues (thousands of miles in extent) of inflamed hydrogen gas, like the flickering streams of light from the stars of a street illumination; and, moreover, as to be subject to great periodical disturbances, now called "magnetic storms," which are in all probability caused by certain combinations in the movements of those little solid bodies, on one of which we live, round the sun. Even now one such epoch of magnetic storm seems to be thought pretty near at hand. The sun has been lately exhibiting the most surprising forms of disturbance, and presenting to scientific eyes less "fixity" of essence than ever. Spots so vast that we must estimate their dimensions by millions of square miles, have broken out from time to time, and have presented rapid changes of figure, indicating the action of forces of inconceivable intensity. Clusters of smaller spots, extending over yet vaster areas, have exhibited every form of disturbance known to the solar physicist, and every degree of light, from the apparent blackness (in reality only relative) of the nuclei, to the intense brilliancy of the faculous ridges.

And we now know that these appearances are not merely matters for the curious, with which, as they happen at a distance of above ninety millions of miles, practical men need not concern themselves. In point of fact, it is by no means impossible that the issues of peace or war, of a financial crisis, or a religious agitation, may be closely bound up with these phenomena,—if not, indeed,—which is also quite possible,—the sudden disappearance of our whole system after the fashion of other solar systems which have thus disappeared. This much, at least, is certain, that the vast changes now going on in the physical constitution of the sun are changes which do most powerfully affect the electric condition of our earth, which have in former years caused the most violent disturbances in the various artificial as well as natural electric apparatuses of the world we live in, and which, to speak of the least of all its possible effects, might, just as well as not, happen some day to throw the electric condition of every telegrapic cable on our planet, under the sea or above it, into the most dire confusion, and send down telegraphic companies' shares to zero in a lump, even if they did not contrive to telegraph to us, after some strange inarticulate fashion, that shares in all public companies, even in that very limited public company, the human race, are, in a physical point of view, of very doubtful value indeed. Let us explain briefly to what we allude.

On September 1, 1859, shortly before noon, two astronomers,—Messrs. Hodgson and Carrington,—one at Oxford, the other in London, were at the same instant scrutinizing a large group of sun spots. On a sudden two intensely bright patches of light appeared in front of the cluster. So brilliant were they that the observers thought the darkening screens attached to their telescopes must have become fractured. But this was found not to be the case. The bright spots indicated some process going on upon the sun's surface,—a process of such activity that within five minutes the spots travelled over a space of nearly 34,000 miles. Now, at the Kew Observatory there are self-registering magnetic instruments which indicate the processes of change by which the subtle influences of terrestrial magnetism wax and wane. At one time the line traced by the pointer will be marked by scarcely perceptible undulations, indicating the almost quiescent state of the great terrestrial magnet. At another, well-marked waves along the line exhibit the pulsations of the magnetic system, influenced in a manner as yet unintelligible to the physicist. And then there is a third form of disturbance,—the sharp, sudden jerks of the pointer exhibiting the occurrence of those mysterious phenomena termed "magnetic storms." When the records of the Kew Observatory came to be looked over, it was found that at the very instant in which the brilliant spots of light had appeared to Messrs. Hodgson and Carrington, the self-registering instruments had been subjected to the third and most significant form of disturbance,—a magnetic storm began, in fact, as the light broke out on the sun's surface. But this was not the only evidence of the sympathy with which the earth responded to the solar action. It was subsequently found that soon after the spots of light had appeared the whole frame of the earth had thrilled under a mysterious magnetic influence. At the West Indies, in South America, in Australia, wherever magnetic observations are systematically made, the observers had the same story to tell. In the telegraph stations at Washington and Philadelphia the signalmen received strong electric shocks. In Norway telegraphic machinery was set on fire. The pen of Bain's telegraph was followed by a flame. And wherever telegraphic wires were in action, well-marked indications of disturbance presented themselves. Even this, however, was not all. The great magnetic storm was not a mere instantaneous electric throe. Hours passed before the disturbed earth resumed its ordinary state. And thus it happened that in nearly all parts of the earth night fell while the storm was yet in progress. During that night magnificent auroras spread their waving streamers over the sky, both in the northern and the southern hemispheres. As the disturbed needle vibrated, the colored streamers waved responsive, and it was only when the magnetic storm was subsiding, that the auroral lights faded from the heavens.

Now, it is evident that these phenomena show the most intimate relation between these peculiar disturbances in the sun and the magnetic currents of our own earth. Directly one of these changes takes place upwards of ninety millions of miles away, the electric condition of our planet is changed in some mysterious way, of which our instruments, and even the condition of our sky, bear record. The pens of all our telegraphic wires may some day trace in flame a handwriting more ominous of human destiny, than was the handwriting which during Belshazzar's feast traced a warning on the wall of the fall of the Babylonian dynasty. Moreover, note this, that these changes in the condition of the sun take place at intervals of about eleven years. The variable star which swings us round it, as well as supplying us with light and heat and (apparently) magnetism, clouds over every eleven years with these spots, so that it seems most likely that every eleven years certain magnetic conditions recur which have not occurred in the interval. If so, perhaps, the magnetic excitement of 1859 will recur, and it may be in much greater force next year,—in 1870. And if it does, how are we to say what may or what may not recur with it? It is quite possible that those periods of speculative financial excitement—which are also said to follow a periodic law of something very like the same period—may be more or less dependent on the magnetic condition of our planet, that so mean a phenomenon as speculative frenzy on the various stock exchanges of Europe may be more or less connected with these wonderful discharges of voltaic batteries in the sun. Is it quite impossible that the electric political condition of Europe in 1848,—and again at an interval of eleven years, in the year of Italian revival and revolution, 1859,—may not recur after one more period of eleven years, in 1870, in consequence of the returning epoch of magnetic excitement in the sun? It would be ridiculous to affirm that there could be no connection between the moral excitability of nations and electric phenomena on so grand a scale as this: nor would it in any degree be a grossly materialistic explanation of moral and spiritual changes, any more than it is a materialistic explanation of moral and spiritual changes, to say that starving people are deficient in moral spirit, and that a storm of rain depresses the most gallant army that ever fought. Could we really establish any periodical law of electric excitement on the earth, it would not be irrational, but in the highest degree rational, to expect marked human phenomena in connection with it,—either a great concurrent depression or a great concurrent stimulus to the energies of the human brain.

But after all, what strikes our imagination most is the curious insight we are beginning to glean of the highly susceptible and sensitive constitution of the sun. That a mass but little denser, even as a whole, than water, nearly four times as light, bulk for bulk, as that of our own earth, and surrounded by an envelope of burning gas, which is by comparison with the intense heat and light of the proper surface of the sun itself mere cold and darkness,—that a mere wandering flame of this kind, shooting rapidly through space, an iron smelting furnace throwing out tongues of fire on all sides, and so highly susceptible to external influence that certain combinations of planets which, when all thrown into the same scale, would make up only an infinitesimal portion of the sun's mass, cause the most marvellous disturbances in his physical constitution and lead to magnetic storms such as we have described on his surface,—that such a body as this, we say, should yet for thousands of years exercise so orderly, continuous, and consistent an influence over the development of our terrestrial world and our human affairs, does seem truly marvellous. Can anything be conceived less apparently likely to lead to fixity of tenure in our universe than a centre for it such as this,—a great boiling furnace of forces enveloped in an atmosphere of flaming gas, and subject to the most violent superficial excitements under the most apparently insignificant external influences? The old Hebrew conception of an earth "founded on the seas and established on the floods," which had been made so fast that it "could not be moved," was a conception of perfect solidity compared to that heliocentric basis of our universe,—a hurricane of flame the disturbances of which might perhaps be best represented to our imaginations by the occasional explosion of a planet or two of nitro-glycerine,—which we are compelled to substitute. Yet hence proceed attractions of gravitation which have not sensibly altered during the life of man upon the earth,—waves of light indicating by their spectra the burning of the very same substances in the sun as were being consumed in all probability when the words "let light be" were first registered,—and, as we now appear likely to learn, periodic magnetic impulses, recurring with the punctuality of seasons and eclipses, certain to be full of import for us, and yet not improbably of the same nature as those greater hurricanes by which other suns have perished. Is it possible to conceive a more apparently unstable centre and fountain of a universe of law and order? Is it possible to conceive a more impressive lesson on the words, "He maketh his ministers a flaming fire"?—Spectator.

ACCURACY.

I do not know that there is anything, except it be humility, which is so valuable as an incident of education as accuracy. And accuracy can be taught. Direct lies told to the world are as dust in the balance when weighed against the falsehoods of inaccuracy. These are the fatal things. And they are all-pervading. I scarcely care what is taught to the young if it will but implant in them the habit of accuracy.

Now, look at the matter in this light. Take the speech of any man for any given day. For once that he wilfully gives a wrong color (with an eye to his own interests) to anything which he states or narrates, he mistakes or misdescribes twenty times, on account of his inability to tell anything accurately.

Besides, there is this important result from a habit of accurrcy, that it produces truthfulness, even on those occasions where a man would be tempted to be untruthful. He gradnally gets to love accuracy more even than his own interests: at last he has a passion for accuracy'—Arthur Helps.

DROUGHT, A BLESSING.

While a most protracted and extensive drought is filling the minds of our people with apprehension or alarm, it may perhaps afford us comfort to reflect that the silent, but irresistible forces of nature are operating particularly during drought for our good; that only while the heavens are as brass, and the clouds deny their rain, and the hot winds lick up from the soil its scanty moisture, can the hidden wealth of the earth, far beneath its surface, be brought to the soil and made available for the support of its future vegetation. Yet such indeed is the case. Every crop that we take from the soil, robs it of its elements of fertility. Moreover, all the rain that flows from the soil, carries down to the ocean its soluble constituents, which alone supply food to plants. These exhaustive processes would at length render the soil utterly barren if there were no process of compensation. Now, to understand the philosophy of droughts, let us reflect a moment upon the following familiar facts. If you take a lump of sugar, and hold a part of it, no matter how small, in contact with water, the water will diffuse itself by capillary attraction through the whole lump. But the rate at which the water will rise through the sugar, will depend upon its hygrometic state. If the lump be very dry, the water will rise through it with corresponding rapidity; but not at all if it be already saturated with water. In general terms, the drier the sugar, the larger the amount of water it will take up by capillarity. This power of capillary attraction belongs, to some extent, to all soils; and water is constantly rising in this way from the sub-soil, and in the exact proportion of the dryness of the surface. But this water coming from beneath, brings with it, of necessity, all the soluble constituents of the earth with which it has come in contact, and, evaporating from the surface, leaves there, available for future vegetation, all these constituents which it has dissolved at great depths below, and which can be brought up in no other possible way, just as a solution of sugar or of salt leaves on evaporation all the sugar or salt behind. No substance in the solid form enters into the circulation of plants, but only in a state of solution, and hence as successive crops and rains are constantly removing from the soil those soluble constituents on which alone its productive capacity depends, they are constantly being re-supplied to the soil during dry seasons, and the more rapidly the drier the surface of the earth becomes.

Thus the drought is really the key which unlocks to the tiller of the soil the exhaustless store-house of fertilizing material, which lie buried far beneath the reach of the implements of his art. Drought then is a blessing, and God is wiser than man.—Richmond Rel. Herald.

IMPURE WATER.

Few of us are aware of the deleterious effects of impure water, or how prone water is to imbibe the impurities of the air. Many of us think if the water is clear and cold it must be perfectly pure, though it has stood in a close bedroom twenty-four hours; but this is far from true. If a pitcher of water is set in a room, for only a few hours, it will absorb nearly all the respired and perspired gases in the room, the air of which will have become purer, but the water utterly filthy. The colder the water is, the greater the capacity to contain the gases. At ordinary temperatures a pail of water can contain a great amount of ammonia and carbonic acid gas; and its capacity to absorb these gases is nearly doubled by reducing the water to the temperature of ice. This plainly shows us that water kept in a room over night is totally unfit for drinking purposes, and should not be used to gargle the throat; also that a large pail of water standing in a room would help to purify the atmosphere, but should be thrown away the next morning. It also teaches us the reason that the water from a pump should always be pumped out in the morning before any of it is used. We are lamentably ignorant of many of the properties of air and water, two of the most important elements of our nature.—Exchange.

If an earthly prince quit his palace to visit the cottage of a poor peasant, it is thought great condescension; what then shall we think of the King of kings, who deigns to fix his abode in an humble, contrite spirit.

—Exchange.

Religion is so far from barring men from innocent pleasure, or comfort of human life, that it purifies the pleasures of it, and renders them more grateful and generous. And besides this, it brings mighty pleasures of its own, those of a glorious hope, a serene mind, a calm and undisturbed conscience, which do far out-relish the most studied and artificial luxuries.—Shirley.

Taxation.—It would be thought a bad government that should tax its people one-tenth of their time, to be employed in public service; but idleness taxes many of us much more, if we reckon all that is spent in absolute sloth, or doing of nothing, with that which is spent in idle enjoyment, or amusements that amount to nothing. Sloth, like rust, consumes faster than labor wears, while the key often used is always bright.—Franklin.

Reason cannot show itself more reasonable than to leave reasoning upon things above reason.—Sir P. Sidney.

LIVING WATER.

Wells there are many whose waters alluring
Tempt us to come with our pitchers of earth;
Ever we grasp after treasure enduring;
Ever we fail, in our hearts there is dearth.

Fountains with glory or power o'erflowing,
Some that are shallow and some that are deep:
Thither our fathers went, there we are going,—
Just as they taught us the way we will keep.

E'en at the pure founts of truth we may stumble,
Trusting tradition and groping in thought;
Proudly we turn from the lore of the humble,
Quaffing to thirst again, labor for nought.

"Ask of me"—"ask of me"—haply we hear it—
Only a Wayfarer was it we saw?
Ah, but we said in the pride of our spirit,
"Deep is the well—Thou hast nothing to draw"

Wedded and widowed in loss and vexation,
Leave we the world—its delusion is burst;
Yet all unsatisfied, Well of Salvation,
Turn we to Thee, in humility versed.

O for the pure and perennial water,
Living and free and with love welling o'er!
Fountain of Life! all our cherished wells naught are;
Give us to drink, that we thirst nevermore.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—Advices from Europe to the 11th inst. have been received.

GREAT BRITAIN.—Parliament has been prorogued to 11th mo. 2d.

A "Church Congress" opened at Liverpool on the 6th.

A meeting to advocate the extension of amnesty to the Fenian prisoners was held at Notting Hill, a suburb of London, on the 10th, and is said to have been attended by 40,000 persons. Inflammatory speeches were made, but the meeting was orderly. Meetings for the same object have been held at Dublin, Cork, Ennis and Templemore.

FRANCE.—Jules Favre, one of the Liberal Deputies recently elected to the Legislative Body from Paris, has called a meeting of Opposition members, to take action with regard to the delay in opening the session. Some of the Deputies have declared their intention to proceed to the hall of meeting on the 28th inst., considering that the legal date for assembling the Chamber. One journal has asserted that they propose to sign a protest declaring that the Emperor has violated the Constitution, and that they consider themselves absolved thereby from their oaths of fidelity to him. One Deputy, Keratry, has publicly announced that he will not go to the chamber on that day. Most of the journals have deprecated the proposed action.

A formidable riot broke out among the miners employed by a railroad company, in the department of Aveyron, on the 7th inst., and was suppressed only by military force. The rioters attempted to drown the chief engineer of the company, burned the store houses and attacked the forges.

SPAIN.—Martial law has been declared in Catalonia and Andalusia.

The Cortes, on the 7th, passed the bill suspending the constitutional guarantees during the insurrection. The Republican Deputies refused to participate longer in the deliberations of the Chambers.

The accounts respecting the progress of the republican insurrection are not very definite, but they appear to indicate that it was becoming rather formidable in extent. It was officially announced that combats between the troops and the insurgents had occurred in Catalonia, Aragon, Old Castile and Andalusia, in which the troops had been victorious. Republican accounts represented that the insurrection was gaining ground, and that the government feared an attack on Madrid, against which precautions had been taken. The republicans captured the town of Reus in Catalonia, but evacuated it on the approach of troops, and a number of them were officially reported to have subsequently surrendered.

The French and English societies for the abolition of slavery had sent an address to Marshal Serrano, the Regent, asking him to use all his efforts to abolish slavery in Cuba; reminding him of his own remark, in a speech in 1865, that slavery only exists in the civilized world as a Spanish institution, as Brazil, though it has not yet abolished it, has promised to occupy herself with the solution of the problem.

PRUSSIA.—The budget for 1870, submitted to the Diet on the 8th inst., shows a deficit of 5,400,000 thalers, which it is proposed to meet by increasing the excise and income tax 25 per cent. The King's speech at the opening of the Diet alluded to the successful efforts to preserve friendly relations with foreign powers, and expressed a hope for similar success in the future. He announced that reforms would be introduced placing the eastern provinces on a basis of self-government, and that new laws relating to public education would be submitted.

AUSTRIA.—The Emperor is expected to start about the 24th inst., on a journey to the East, joining the French Empress at Constantinople, and with her and the Sultan, proceeding, by way of Jaffa and Jerusalem, to Suez to attend the opening of the canal.

GERMANY.—A treaty has been concluded between Wurtemburg and the North German Confederation, which allows subjects of each to serve in the armies of the other.

TURKEY.—The great Powers, it is reported, have withdrawn their interference in the dispute with Egypt, leaving the Sultan and the Viceroy to settle it for themselves.

WEST INDIES.—On the 17th ult. the island of St. Thomas was visited by a severe earthquake, which materially damaged many buildings in the capital. Nine distinct shocks occurred within eight hours, producing general consternation.

DOMESTIC.—Ex-President Franklin Pierce died at Concord N. H. on the 8th inst., in his 65th year.

At the opening of the Virginia Legislature, on the 6th inst., Republican members presented a protest against any legislative action, the members not having taken the "iron-clad" oath, and the body being therefore, in their view, illegal. In the House it was referred, and in the Senate laid on the table. On the 8th both Houses ratified the 14th and 15th Constitutional amendments. In the House there were only six votes against them, and in the Senate four against the 14th, and two against the 15th. In the House an amendment to the resolution ratifying the 15th amendment, making it take effect on the admission of the State to the Union, received only five votes. A resolution was offered and referred, proposing, in view of doubts as the legality of the Legislature, to re enact both amendments after the admission of the State. The Legislature adjourned to the 18th inst.

The President issued a proclamation on the 5th, recommending that the 18th of next month be observed as a day of general thanksgiving.

The Postmaster General is said to have opened negotiations with the British Post-office Department, with a view to a further reduction of the rates of postage between the two countries, from twelve to six cents per half-ounce.

A large meeting held a few days since at Salt Lake City, appointed a committee to draft a memorial to Congress asking the admission of Utah as a State, the memorial represents the population of Utah to be 150,000.

The storm of the 4th inst. was extremely violent at Eastport Me., and great damage was done in that as well as other sections of the State. One of the tributaries of the Androscoggin is reported to have risen 36 feet in 12 hours. Reports of great devastation have come from all the region visited by the storm. At Sackville, New Brunswick, a violent gale was accompanied by the highest tide ever known there; the dikes along the shores were broken, the marshes were flooded, thousands of tons of hay destroyed, and several thousand cattle and sheep drowned. In the Bay of Fundy, and around St. John's, the tide rose to a great height. This storm is said to have been predicted, on scientific grounds, by Lieut. Saxby of the British Navy, in the 12th month last.

SUMMARY OF NEWS 144

THE ASSOCIATED EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF FRIENDS ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,

Met by appointment at Plainfield, Ind., on Fourth-day, Ninth month 22d, 1869, and closed its sittings on the afternoon of the following day.

In the absence of the Clerk, Charles F. Coffin performed his duties.

A minute from the Committee of Iowa Yearly Meeting on Indian Affairs informed of the appointment of Jos. D. Hoag as a member of this Committee, in place of Enoch Hoag. The members of the Committee, with one exception, were present either in person or by substitute duly accredited.

Very interesting reports from Thomas Wistar of his recent visit to the Indian tribes located in Kansas, and from John Butler and Achilles Pugh of their visit to the Kiowa and Camanche Agency and the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Agency, (both in the Territory south of Kansas,) were received and read; also one from Enoch Hoag, Superintendent, giving detailed information concerning the several tribes under his care. (Extracts from these reports are reserved for a future number.)

Lawrie Tatum, Agent for the Kiowas and Camanches, was present, and made a statement of the condition and wants of the Indians under his charge, especially as to the kind of provisions furnished for their subsistence. He expressed his belief that they cannot be kept on their present reservation, without the substitution of wheat flour for corn, (which is furnished them in the grain,) giving each Indian the same rations as a soldier (112½ lbs. flour for 100 days.) Serious consequences may result from a continuance of the present state of things. The Committee was also informed that the Indians under care of Brinton Darlington were similarly circumstanced.

Agent Tatum also informed that he needs the assistance of two men in distributing provisions, and the services of a clerk; as he is now discharging duties greater than one man can long perform. He has contracted for fencing a large quantity of land broken up the past season for the Indians, but since doing so has been informed by the the Department that there are no funds now available for the purpose. The Indians under his care also need a physician, to which they are entitled by treaty.

The subject of the education of the Indians, and the present condition of the tribes under our charge in reference to it, claimed attention, and George K. Jenkins, David Hunt, Benjamin H. Wright and Edward Earle were appointed a Committee on Education, and were directed to learn the condition of the several tribes, and the engagements made with them by the Government, in this respect. They will report to the Clerk of this Committee as soon as practicable, with a definite plan of operations.

The subject of the payment of annuities in money to the Wichitas and affiliated bands, as suggested by them through our visiting Committee, was considered, and the Committee united in judgment that it is not expedient that such payment should be made in money.

Charles F. Coffin, Edward W. Howland and Francis T. King were appointed to render advice and assistance to Enoch Hoag, Superintendent, in reference to the safe keeping and transmission of the funds which may come into his hands; and were directed to give him such instructions as they may think necessary.

The following records were made as the judgment of the Executive Committee, and the Clerk was directed so to notify the Superintendent, and through him the Agents, of the Central Superintendency:

1. Agents should in every instance where practicable reside upon, or adjacent to, the reservations which they have in charge, and when for want of necessary buildings they cannot do so at once, they should provide as soon as possible to do so.

2. No agent should engage in other business, or be directly or indirectly concerned in trading operations, or participants in profits of business conducted with the Indians by traders licensed by the agents, but their time should be devoted exclusively to the duties of their office and the welfare of the Indians. If found deficient in either of these respects, they will be immediately reported for discharge.

3. Care should be taken by all agents not to commit themselves by accepting free tickets over railroads, or otherwise, so as to prevent their freedom of action in any case which may concern such railroads or their officers.

Francis T. King, Thomas Wistar, Benjamin Tatham, John B. Garrett and Charles F. Coffin were appointed to visit Washington as occasion may require, and to lay before the Government the following subjects, and such others as may from time to time arise, and report to each meeting of this Committee:

1. The change of rations desired by the Indians under care of Agents Tatum and Darlington.

2. The need of a clerk and two aids in distributing rations, for each of those Agents.

3. The need of increased appropriations for fencing and farming in those Agencies.

4. The request of the Cheyennes for the release of members of that tribe held by the United States as prisoners of war.

5. The request of the Arapahoes for a separate reservation.

6. Similar request of the Wichitas and affiliated bands.

7. Proposed discontinuance of the Osage River Agency.

8. Jurisdiction over tribes removed to the limits of the Southern Superintendency.

9. Improper exposure of provisions, &c., intended for the Indians.

The Friends appointed at last meeting to receive, consider and approve nominations for farmers and other employées, made a written report, and were continued to the service; and Agents were again directed to be careful to submit the names of all persons proposed for appointment as farmers and mechanics, and other subordinate officers and employées, (except teachers, who are to be approved by our Committee on Education), to this sub-committee for approval, before forwarding them to the Department.

Condensed from the Committee's minutes,

JOHN B. GARRETT, Clerk.

For Friends' Review.

COMPLETENESS OF CHARACTER.

I have read with some interest Dr. Hartshorne's essay on Completeness of Character, and should have been pleased if, in some points, he had been more definite and practical. He says, "Were one to try thus to place perfection or completeness of character, as a goal for the mind's conception, it may be hard, in view of its distance, to say or know just what or where it is." Not taking upon me to controvert this position, or at least to say positively that it is erroneous, the following remarks may be looked upon rather as suggestions or questions bearing on the subject.

Character in its most general sense may be defined as a mark by which one thing is distinguished from another. The lion has a character, the lamb has a character; the eagle has a chatacter, the dove has a character; and these characters are all complete, all perfect, and we may say, all different. If the lion should become mild and gentle in all its actions, should refuse animal food and eat grass,—if the lamb should begin to kill and eat other animals, and take upon itself the habits of the lion,—we should say that both these animals had lost their characters. The characters of both, as such, would be incomplete, imperfect, destroyed. The same is true of any animal or of any substance in nature. If a drug, by exposure to air or heat, or in any other way, medically or chemically, should become inert or changed, we might say it had lost its character.

The term character as applied to persons does not differ in meaning, but is said by Worcester to be "the assemblage of qualities which distinguish one person from another." So far as the physique is concerned, different constitutions have, of course, different characters; and so far as the physical manifestations are in accordance with that difference of organization, all these may be said to be complete or perfect. These matters, so far as they are independent of the will, certainly manifest themselves in a natural, and therefore a perfect manner.

This question, then, is narrowed down to that of perfection in man as a moral agent, or of man as a being having a free will and a sense of duty; for I cannot conceive of a moral agent, except in connection with both sense of duty and freedom of will. Is not, then, a moral agent, the manifestation of whose will is in accordance with his sense of duty, perfect? or has not such a being a complete character? This definition, I believe, will hold through all degrees of barbarism and civilization. The perfection of character in any individual man is the accordance of his will with his sense of duty. Of course, then, what is perfection in one man is not perfection in another.

And here we are brought to that doctrine which I regard as one of the cardinal principles of the Society of Friends—"That the grace of God, which brings salvation, hath appeared to all men, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in the present world," The man who hearkens to this grace, follows and obeys it, in my opinion, has a perfect character. I speak now of this matter only as a question of definition; as to the possibility, difficulty and rarity of its attainment there is probably no difference of opinion.

The same definition will hold, if, with the author of the address recently delivered before the Alumni at Haverford, we adopt the belief of the progress of the species and its infinite approximation toward the likeness of God.

ANECDOTE OF ELIZABETH WALKER.

The following interesting relation being communicated by Elizabeth H. Walker to our aged friend Samuel Gummere,* was by him thought worthy of being committed to writing, as an instructive instance of Divine power manifested in the conducting of events to the fulfilment of his own requirings when human reasoning has so operated as to induce the creature to shrink from and even endeavor to act counter to apprehended duty. The first circumstance may appear not very remarkable, yet as connected with future events seems proper to retain.

Coming to Lake Ontario to cross in order to perform a religious visit in Upper Canada, when about to go on board the sloop, the captain taking one of the carriage horses by the reins and leading him in, the other horse followed on board of his own accord, at which the captain seeming to marvel, was answered, the horse was used to crossing waters. After having performed the visit in prospect in that country, and being about to return, on approaching Kingston, E. W. felt an intimation of duty to have a meeting with the people there; but being the time of the Supreme Court, and the Chief Judge and a number of the great men of that country being in town, she gave way to reasoning, concluding that if once on board and set off, the concern might pass away. Accordingly in the morning, coming to the water-side to embark, the same captain with whom they (she and companions) had crossed before, being about to take them on board, found one of the horses refused to be led. After using considerable endeavors himself and with the assistance of other men to force the horse on, and all without effect, he queried if it were not the same horse which had been so remarkably tractable before. In relating the circumstance, Elizabeth said she stood in amazement; she saw the cause, and, to use her own expression, "I saw that I was Jonah." However, they hoisted the horse on board by means of tackle, and proceeded with a fair prospect a little way, when a friend asking the captain how long he thought it might take to reach the other side, was answered, probably half an hour; when presently a tremendous storm arose, and they appeared every moment likely to be swallowed up in the waves. In this awful situation they remained from about eight to twelve o'clock. The captain said he had attended that ferry about thirty years, and had never seen the like; and that there must be some cause. E. W.'s companion then coming to her where she sat overwhelmed with confusion, told her she must give up to return, their lives being every moment in jeopardy. She could only answer that she was now willing to do anything. He then went to the captain and proposed his returning, but was answered it was equally impossible to return to the place from whence they came as to go forward. On being queried with whether there was no other point he could reach, (they being still near the Canada shore,) he replied that he might possibly reach the King's Navy Yard, but that no American vessel was permitted to land there. The place being near, and the sentinel on guard in full view, Elizabeth says she recollected that she had been a subject to the King of England, and did not know that she had done anything to forfeit her rights; she therefore desired the captain to hail the sentinel with his trumpet and inform him that one of his Majesty's subjects was on board, and being in distress desired permission to land; but they received answer that he durst not allow it, as it would be at the peril of his life. He was then queried of whether there was any superior officer at the place, and he answered that the admiral was there. It was desired that he might be informed that one of the King's subjects being in distress and danger, did not ask it as a favor, but claimed as a right to receive protection. A sloop was then sent out to bring them ashore. Being landed with their baggage, &c., they had an interview with the admiral and some other great men, among whom was the judge before mentioned. She informed them of her desire to have a meeting, to which they readily assented, and concluded for it to be held at what they called the Church; and a messenger was sent to obtain the privilege, who returned with the answer that the priest was gone from home and the key was lost, so that they could not get entrance. The judge then said that should not disappoint their having a meeting. There being a large ball-room in the place, they set about preparing it for the purpose and giving notice of the meeting. At three o'clock, about two hours from their landing, a large number being assembled, a satisfactory meeting was held; after which, they being retired to quarters for the night, the judge sent his footman to inquire whether he might be permitted to pay them a visit, and was answered that if he had a desire so to do there would be no objection. He came, and in conversation informed them that he being an Englishman, and brought up in what is termed high life, had also been in several considerable stations under Government, and that with respect to religion, he had been an Episcopalian, a Roman Catholic and a Presbyterian, but now he believed he had all yet to learn; and herewith seemed inclined to drop the subject as respecting himself; but Elizabeth thought (though he endeavored to give conversation a different turn) that there was still something throbbing in his heart that had not yet come out. At length he said he had been a great persecutor, he being a colonel in the military as well as a civil judge; had been severe with Friends on account of their non-compliance with military requisitions. He said he had done it in the integrity of his heart, supposing their refusal to proceed from obstinacy; but now was satisfied they acted from principle, and he was therefore determined to persecute them no more; and as respected what was past, all the restitution he saw in his power to make, and which was his determination to fulfil, was, that when any Friend came that way with certificates, and desired to have meetings among them, it should be his part to make way for them. The next morning they came again to the water to cross, and the men who had the preceding day assisted in getting the horse on board again offered their assistance. "No," said the captain, "the work is now done, I can take him myself;" and taking hold of the bridle led him gently in.

Some time after, the troubles between the two countries taking place, Elizabeth was desirous to know whether this great man had kept the promise he had so solemnly made not to persecute Friends for their religious testimony, and was informed that within his jurisdiction only one member had suffered on that account, and that he had not in time informed them that he was a member, neither did his conduct bespeak him to be one.

JAMES OWEN'S VISIT TO NORWAY, ETC.

(EXTRACTS FROM I. SHARP'S JOURNAL.)

Hjoring is the most northerly town of Jutland, and thither we proceeded on Second-day morning, the 16th of Eighth month, taking our seats in the mail, which passes over an excellent road, through a district without hedges or fences and almost destitute of trees. The soil for the most part is very sandy, interspersed with large tracts of boggy land, which appear to offer an inexhaustible supply of fuel. The people look remarkably healthy, and are generally well dressed. The farms are extensive, but their cultivation appears capable of great improvement. We had with us the company of Mads Larsen, a young man professing with Friends, with whom we have been much interested: he works with his own hands during the week as a shoemaker or in farm work, and labors for his Lord as ability is afforded on First-day in word and doctrine. His pecuniary resources are small, and we believe his work of faith has been owned and blessed by the Good Shepherd. In the afternoon a call was made on a man and his wife who professed with Friends; and in the evening, at seven, about 100 assembled in response to a general invitation: the meeting was solid and settled, and no doubt rested on our minds of having been rightly directed to this extreme point, although involving a considerable amount of travel to get at it. We left the following morning a little before eight, prior to which three individuals professing with Friends called at our lodgings, to whom James Owen addressed a few parting words of loving counsel. The day was fine, and after a pleasant ride we got back to Aalborg about two. In the evening there was a religious gathering at Neil Madsen's. The 107th Psalm was read, and, after a time of brief silence, prayer was vocally offered for a parting blessing, and on behalf of a younger brother, engaged in his own land to labor in word and doctrine, &c. James Owen's address was of an individual character, and his voice was subsequently heard in prayer. It was about ten when the little company, thus assembled in a small upper room, dispersed; I trust it may be said grateful and glad of heart for the mercies of the day.

On the morning of Fourth-day, Eighth month 18th, the mail started punctually as the clock struck five. The mist soon cleared away, and the day proved fine and warm. In the harvest-field the reapers were busily at work, and many an interesting and animating scene was presented as we passed along; a great desire, however, appears in the minds of many for emigration, and thousands upon thousands have already left for the more fertile west. We reached Randers about one, and in the evening a second meeting was held in the house of Rasmus K. Khœr; about fifteen being present, more or less professing with Friends. This little company was lovingly addressed by James Owen, whose mind had been introduced into deep sympathy for them and for those of this class scattered up and down in this land, and they were encouraged to believe that, if they continued faithful to their Lord and leader, brighter days are in store for them. We left Randers the following morning, and reached Veile about half past one. Through the kindness of B. Smith, the Wesleyan Chapel was placed at the service of our friend, and at eight, the time appointed, was already pretty well filled —nearly 200 persons assembled. The meeting, which was considerably larger than the one held here last week, was an open and relieving time, and left abundant cause to say, "The Lord hath not forgotten to be gracious."

The following morning, Eighth month 20th, we were kindly entertained at breakfast at the house of G. Lovegrove; our kind friend, B. Smith, the Wesleyan minister above named, being also there. Before we left the table, James Owen was engaged in prayer; and perhaps it is not too much to say, that this little blending of the social and the religious, where our own mother tongue was understood without interpreting, proved a season of refreshment to the body and the soul. At 8.45 we left by rail for Frederecia, at which place are six Friends, who regularly meet for divine worship on First-day and also during the week. For this little company we felt much interested, and the time spent thus among them proved to our mutual comfort. From hence we passed forward by rail and reached Hadersleben, and at five feasted on the letters which awaited our arrival there. No meeting is kept up at this place, but there are several residing there whose views are much in accordance with those of our religious Society.

Seventh-day, the 21st, was much occupied in arranging for two meetings on the morrow. Three times we had to appear at the office of the burgomaster before our object was effected. We were treated with great civility, but were entirely unable to obtain permission for any meeting before four o'clock in the afternoon.

Eighth month 22d, First-day.—In the morning a small meeting was held at the house of Niels Nielsen, and we afterwards called on an afflicted sister—poor, lame, and in great suffering, but who said with tears, instructively and submissively, "Nothing has been laid upon me for which strength has not been given me to bear." She was addressed by James Owen, in the language of sympathy and encouragement—few of the calls which we have made have left a deeper impression on our minds, the supporting power of Divine grace being instructively manifest. In a public hall hired for the occasion, two meetings were held, one at four o'clock and the other at seven o'clock; they were attended by much proving and the exercise of faith, but were held to satisfaction; and thus closed peacefully the service which was, I thankfully believe and trust, ordered of the Lord and owned by Him in Jutland and Schleswig. On the following morning we parted with our friend Reier Reierson, who as interpreter had been with us many weeks, and who was about to return to Stavanger, viâ Copenhagen; at noon we left for Hamburg, and reached that city about ten o'clock at night.

On Fourth-day we were present at the usual mid-week meeting at Minden, and on Sixth-day two meetings were held at Berlin; Louis Rasche and F. A. Finka bearing us company from Minden, the latter as interpreter. At Berlin we received much kindness from Clement Achard, the Wesleyan minister, the use having been generously granted by him of the commodious and excellent place of worship belonging to the Wesleyans, wherein a good solid meeting was held, with which he expressed his full satisfaction. There was much in our being at Berlin calculated to awaken deep feeling and to ponder well the pathway of our feet, so that a peaceful release in returning from thence was cause for reverent thankfulness.

A meeting was held at Oberkerchen, at the house of Frederick Kromer, on Seventh-day evening, with those who profess with Friends. It was an open and refreshing season, wherein James Owen's message of loving encouragement to be faithful in allegiance to their Lord was not, I trust, uttered in vain.

On First-day morning, the 29th, the meeting at Minden was held in usual course; at three in the afternoon, the Two Months Meeting, and a public meeting in the evening, about 135 being present; and on the following evening a public meeting at Pyrmont, a small meeting having been held in the afternoon with the little remnant of Friends remaining at this place. Early in the morning of Fifth-day, the 22d of Ninth month, we were favored to land at Dover in safety and in peace, grateful and glad of heart for the goodness and mercy which followed us day by day in a three months' sojourn in Continental lands, in a service of love and blessing.

THE LONDON FRIENDS' MEETINGS AND THEIR ASSOCIATIONS.

Westminster Monthly Meeting.

"In the earliest period of the history of the Society of Friends there appear to have been three places in or near the city of Westminster at which meetings were regularly held,—viz., at Stephen Hart's in New Palace Yard, at William Woodcock's in the Savoy, and at Worcester House in the Strand."

The meeting at Stephen Hart's may be considered as the precursor of the present Westminster Meeting. A constant attender of this meeting was Gilbert Latey. He was a prosperous tradesman in the Strand in London; a master tailor, who by strict attention to business and by his upright conduct had so come into esteem with the gentlemen of fortune about the Court as to have a large and profitable business among them. But becoming a Friend, and no longer easy to make such gay clothing as the fops required, he, by declining such orders, lost all his fair prospects of making a fortune, and for a time seemed to imperil the business itself. But his integrity was blessed, and a good steady custom remained. He placed his talents at the service of his friends, giving them the benefit of such access as he had to the people at the Court, where he would often plead in their favor. Gilbert was personally much esteemed by the authorities, although they might either deride or object to his peculiar views; and even Charles II. would have a kind word for the conscientious tailor. The King when out hunting one day saw Gilbert Latey coming along the road on his way to a meeting, and the merry monarch calling out made the Friend come up alongside, and exchanged words of cheer, parting quite affectionately.

An interesting incident in the life of Gilbert Latey is taken from his biography.

He was once waiting on Lady Sawkell in connection with his business, when Sir William Sawkell, who commanded under the Earl of Oxford, came into the room. He had a kind respect for G. L., and presently asked him, "What meeting do you go to?"

"Sometimes to one and sometimes to another," said the worthy tailor.

"The reason," said Sir William, "why I asked you, is because I have orders to go and break up a meeting of your people at Hammersmith, which I have deferred executing; and now I have a fresh command laid on me, and I cannot avoid it, but must go there on Sunday next; and therefore I speak in kindness to you, if you use at any time to go there, that you refrain coming that day, for I receive my command now from so high a hand, that I dare not omit executing thereof."

Gilbert Latey immediately found it laid upon him to be present on the occasion, and before parting, informed the Knight that he should be there.

Gilbert went to the meeting on the following First-day, and was preaching when the troopers rushed in. They listened awhile, but presently one shouted, "This man will never have done, let us pull him down."

"Who commands you," said Gilbert as the soldiers laid hands on him.

"Sir William Sawkell," said the troopers.

"Tell him I am here, and that my name is Gilbert Latey."

Sir William, who is described as a lusty, jolly man, came in trembling and exclaimed, "Latey, did I not tell you that I was commanded to be here to-day?"

"Thou didst so," said Gilbert, "but did I not tell thee I was commanded by a greater than thou art that I must be here also?"

"Go; get thee gone about thy business," cried the Knight, "and I will take care concerning the rest here met."

"If thou hast any respect for me, discharge the rest, and let me be thy prisoner," said Gilbert.

After some time the Knight was persuaded to take this course. Gilbert was taken and fined. Some of the others present were also distrained upon, but through G. Latey's kind offices their goods were restored to them again.

About a century later the eminent Dr. Fothergill removed to reside within the compass of Westminster Monthly Meeting. He was one of the principal founders of Ackworth School, and all through life, amidst his most varied, numerous and arduous engagements, had taken a share in the management of the affairs of the Society, becoming much interested in the settlement of the discipline engaged in by London Yearly Meeting in 1760, &c.

He was a friend and supporter of John Howard in his work, became intimate with Dr. Franklin, and was one of three in an important conference with that philosopher to endeavor on terms so as to avert the disruption of the American colonies from the mother country.

"I wished at my first setting out," he observes, "I wished most fervently, and I endeavor after it still, to do the business that occurred, with all the diligence I could, as a present duty, and endeavored to repress every rising idea of its consequences; knowing most assuredly that there was a hand which could easily overthrow every pursuit of this kind, and baffle every attempt either to acquire fame or wealth. And with a great degree of gratitude I look back to the gracious, secret preserver that kept my mind more attentive to the discharge of my present anxious care for those I visited, than either to the profits or the credit resulting from it: and I am sure, to be kept under such a circumscribed, unaspiring temper of mind, doing every thing with diligence, humility, and as in the sight of the God of healing, frees the mind from much unavailing distress and consequential disappointment." Such were the maxims of this wise and good man.

In 1814, the Emperor Alexander of Russia attended Westminster Meeting with the Duchess of Oldenburg and others. It is said that this great potentate afterwards acknowledged to William Allen and Stephen Grellet that he had felt at that hour, as he listened to the ministry of Richard Phillips and John Wilkinson, or waited in silence with the other worshippers, a communion with the Majesty of All, greater than any he had ever known in connection with the grandest church ceremonial. Certain it is that he rose from his seat in a very tender and affectionate spirit, and shook hands with all around so warmly and heartily as to evince how deeply he had been interested.

The Burial-ground at Bunhill Fields.

This was the earliest freehold property possessed by the Society of Friends in London.

If the visitor at the present day, entering in by the Coleman Street Gate, will turn to the right and walk forward till he stands about ninety feet from the western wall, he will face a nearly square plot of ground that may well by its associations awaken thoughts of earnest interest. There lie about 1100 Friends who were carried off in that terrible year of the Great Plague. There were interred all that was mortal of Samuel Fisher, Richard Hubberthorne, Edward Burrough, and about ninety other of our martyrs, who were carried to the spot on the shoulders of their brethren from the crowded prison in which they expired. Here also lie the sufferers who died on board the ship that was to have transported them to the western plantations. Turning to other portions of the ground, we may just allude to George Whitehead as conspicuous among a host of worthies who found in Bunhill Fields their last earthly resting-place. But the funeral which makes this burial-ground pre-eminently worthy of notice in connection with the history of Friends is of course that of George Fox. There used to be a small stone on the spot, marked by the initials "G. F.," which it is said became so great an object of interest to Friends visiting London from the country, that a worthy member of some influence in the London Meetings caused it to be removed, applying to it the same term Hezekiah used in destroying Moses' serpent,—"Neshustan"—a piece of brass.

On the east side of George Fox was buried two years afterwards his faithful friend and co-worker Stephen Crisp. At the south end of the grave was interred the worthy minister and writer Alexander Parker, who came up to London with George Fox in 1654, and who seems by his letters to have maintained an especially fraternal affection for George and Margaret Fox. To allude in detail to the various individuals of note among Friends interred in this burial-ground would be to prolong this chapter to an almost indefinite extent. Few perhaps are aware, as they look at the flat, unmounded surface, that the silent population of this grave-yard is within a thousand of the whole number of the Society of Friends at present in England and Wales. The names of persons registered as buried here is very close upon 12,000, besides many unrecorded funerals; and taking this into account, how extraordinary is the spectacle! A green oasis in the great city, containing more than 12.000 corpses, many of them once the possessors of names held in high honor and veneration, and yet not a solitary gravestone—not even a grassy mound to mark the resting place of any individual! Surely the rich and poor have here mingled together in a way few other burial-grounds can show.

Bunhill Fields burying-ground has been closed for interment since the year 1855. It remains in our day a broad walled-in space, surrounded by a teeming population mostly composed of the poorer classes. It would afford an admirable site for the erection of a mission hall, with schools, &c.; and what fitter memorial could be raised over the graves of these zealous dead, who bore so good confession in their lives, and suffered much, even unto death, for the extension of the Kingdom of Jesus?

Morning Meeting of Ministers and Elders.

The earliest records of this meeting commence in 1673. The first members were the men ministers exclusively. Afterwards elders were added from the six Monthly Meetings of London, and subsequently elders from country Monthly Meetings.

Under date Second month 24th, 1794, there is entered upon the minutes a report from a committee the meeting had appointed to inquire into its origin and duties, from which the following is taken as one of the early objects of its establishment:

The Committee report "That as early as 1675 the orderly dispersion of ministers to the several meetings for worship, according to their concern or freedom, was a principal part of its care; and it was the practice for them to meet on a First-day morning to confer together; but that meeting has dropped into disuse, as well as the practice that gave rise to it."

It appears to have been arranged for all men ministers when in town to assemble at Ellis Hookes' chamber as early as 8 o'clock, when, after a short devotional opportunity, they dispersed themselves among the meetings, according to an arrangement that had been agreed on; whilst those about to visit the more distant ones, mounted the horses that stood outside, brought up in readiness for their use. This was as early as 1675.

The books in which these arrangements were made remain; they comprise ten folios, with the pages ruled so as to have the various meeting-houses under separate columns, with the Friend's names who had felt either free to offer, or had been appointed to attend, entered under the names of the respective meetings, which practice was kept up for a century. Ellis Hookes, as Clerk to the Morning Meeting, had charge of the book in which those willing to attend meetings as ministers wrote down their names, and for a great length of time the tacit permission to do this, was the only acknowledgment of any one being recognized as a minister; and the first sign of a Monthly Meeting being dissatisfied with the ministry of any particular person is found in their objecting to such an one putting his name in the book.

Respecting the ministry generally, caution was shown, as a minute occurs in 1696 to the purport, that the names of those who speak a few words are not to be suddenly entered, nor to appear in the public gallery, until proof have been given.

It was also minuted that care should be taken that no marriage take place without notice, that "the publique laborers as are free may be at them, there being a service for the Lord at them."

(To be concluded.)

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH 23, 1869.

"It Sees to the End."—The Nation, referring to the reckless abandonment of the principles of integrity with which the speculators in gold recently fell, or rather plunged "into divers temptations and a snare," briefly presents the following graphic and humiliating picture:

"The operations of the Exchange were of course simply gambling on a scale never before witnessed' dozens of enormous fortunes being on the table at once, and lost or won in the twinkling of an eye; and this not in a quiet, well-furnished room, by a dozen silent men, but publicly by hundreds of howling, desperate men, maddened out of all calculation by frightful alternations of hope and fear, protracted through fifty-six hours, and all this literally in the presence of an astonished, disgusted and alarmed nation."

Another New York journal, after describing the scene in Wall Street "on any day when the Board of Brokers is in full operation,"—the "glaring eyes, fierce gesticulations and Babel of discordant cries,"—thus describes "the Pandemonium that ruled during the fever heat of the gold struggle:"

"Instead of beholding men transacting business, one would have thought he was looking on a herd of wolves fighting over their evening repast of blood. The yells and shouts rose over the high buildings, and were heard even above the din and uproar of Broadway."

And some of these men who determined to be rich, we suppose claimed and at times endeavored to be followers of Him who said to His disciples: "Ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world." And yet he who would be the disciple of the meek and lowly One must be filled with and actuated by that love which "seeketh not its own," much less seeks in covetousness that which belongs to others. A letter which lies before us, commenting upon this mammon-madness, thus pertinently presents a consideration which those will do well to ponder, who would "use this world as not abusing it," and who in the integrity of their hearts desire to "provide things honest in the sight of all men," and, while so engaged, not to "serve two masters:"

"The distinction between the operations of these speculative gamblers in gold or merchandize, and the operations of legitimate trade, is a very important one. How can this distinction always be seen? How can a merchant avoid being drawn into gambling? Only by keeping carefully alive to the limitations of a tender conscience."

That eminent servant of the Lord, Arthur Howell, (whose memory is blessed,) even in business transactions lived as a servant with his eye to His Master, and whilst laying in his stock in trade he would stay his purchases when a check was received from that Monitor to the least touches of whose finger his soul was sensitive. Does this sound strangely? He walked by that Spirit of which a dying penitent beautifully testified: "It sees to the end of all temptation."

Speculation in business is apt to include an expectation to gain by the loss of others. By crafty greed the price is suddenly raised of coal, of flour, or other absolute necessities, just at the time when the poor will be the most distressed thereby; and thousands famish with cold and hunger that a few may be enriched. Such overreaching combination is not legitimate business. It is a temptation and a snare of the evil one. Happy is he who, being anointed with the eye-salve of the kingdom, "sees to the end."

Our correspondent continues:

"What a privilege and responsibilty it is to have membership in a religious Society which, in its discipline, maintains a testimony against these things,—against these hazardous operations, whether they be successful or not!"

Very comprehensive is Paul's injunction to the Philippians, nor is it less applicable after the lapse of centuries and in a land to him unknown:

"Let your moderation be known unto all men: the Lord is at hand! Be careful for nothing, [give not place to carking care]; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the grace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."

These words of the Apostle appropriately introduced his charge to let the mind dwell upon such things as are true, honest, just, pure, lovely and of good report. This would be a sure preventive against hurtful lusts and that inordinate love of money, "which, while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows." "O man of God," said Paul, "flee these things!"

How Forcible are Right Words.—There was no extravagance or exaggeration in the strong declaration of the Apostle that the inspired Scriptures "are profitable for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect,—thoroughly furnished unto all good works." How often does it occur that a familiar text is brought home to one's heart and understanding with a freshness and fulness of meaning never before appreciated, meeting the soul's present need, and shedding upon the path in which we ought to tread a ray of that light which it is the good pleasure of our perfect Exemplar shall shine more and more unto the perfect day. Thoroughly furnished we may be, and the assurance is emphatic that "the man of God may be perfect." To become so, it is needful to be graffed into the living vine, and he that is thus in Christ Jesus is a new creature.

These remarks have been suggested by reading the comprehensive charge given by Saul of Tarsus to the Thessalonians in these few words:

"See that none render evil for evil unto any: but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves and to all."

How complete the code of Christian ethics included in this brief passage, leaving, one might conclude, no room for any one to err who shall religiously observe its teaching. It comprehends the golden rule. It is a peace sermon, condemning all that is incompatible with the perfection of love. Stand in the light and read this text! Walk in the light and live it out! Let every one do so—and there will be a revival that cannot be doubted or gainsayed. What a tide of love would sweep over the land! What forbearance, what preference of others over one's self! No evil surmisings, self of no reputation, worldly vanities esteemed no longer, carnal desires Christ-subjected, Christians bearing one another's burdens and their Master's law fulfilled! Places of dissipation deserted, houses of prayer thronged, the people ever following that which is good, both among themselves and to all.

North Carolina.—The Life of Stephen Grellet, and other standard Friends' books, will be on sale, at reduced prices, at the time of the Yearly Meeting at New Garden.

MARRIED,

At a Friends' Meeting, in Portsmouth, R. I., on the 9th of Ninth month, 1869, William Chace, of Fall River, member of Swanzea Monthly Meeting, Mass., to Abba Dennis, of Portsmouth, member of Rhode Island Monthly Meeting.

DIED.

COOK.—Near Centreville, Ind., on the 5th of Eighth month, 1869, Isom Cook, in the 35th year of his age. And on the 5th of Ninth month, 1869, William Cook, in the 20th year of his age,—both sons of Jehu and Mary Cook, deceased, and members of West Grove Monthly Meeting.

MOORMAN.—Near Jamestown, Ohio, on the 13th of Ninth mo., 1869, Manson H. Moorman, a member of Dover Monthly Meeting, in the 53d year of his age.

PEARSON.—At the hour of midnight, Ninth mo. 9th, 1869, whilst absent from home to attend the Yearly Meeting at Oskaloosa, Catharine Pearson, wife of Wm. Pearson, in her 69th year; a member and elder of New Sharon Monthly Meeting, Iowa. This dear Friend, though feeble, was in usual health till within an hour of her death. Her disease was supposed to be an affection of the heart, causing intense bodily sufferiug; and yet, perfectly aware of her condition, like a good soldier of the cross, she prayed only for patience to continue faithful unto the end, and committing her spirit into the keeping of the Lord Jesus, at the "midnight call" was found ready.

COWGILL.—In Champaign Co., Ohio, on the 12th of Ninth month, 1869, Henry Cowgill, aged nearly 67 years; a worthy member and elder of Goshen Monthly Meeting. In early life this dear Friend chose "the straight and narrow way," and he continued to advance steadily in his Christian course. During several years of gradually-failing health, the Great Refiner seemed to have been purifying him from all remaining stains, and making him fully ready for His Kingdom. As his close approached, he was preserved in entire calmness, being graciously granted an assurance that the Saviour, in whose atoning mercy he had trusted with unwavering faith, had prepared a place for him in the "Father's house;" and he awaited patiently, and without a murmur, his summons thither,—a fitting end for one whose life had been devoted to doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with his God.

TAYLOR.—On the 14th inst,, at the residence of her son Geo. W. Taylor, in New Garden, Pa., Elizabeth Taylor, in the 94th year of her age.

"Those who sleep in Jesus, will God bring with him." 1 Thess. iv. 14.

BIBLE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

The Annual Meeting of "The Bible Association of Friends in America" will be held in the Committee room of the Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on the evening of Fourth-day, the 3d of Eleventh month, at 8 o'clock.

The members of the Philadelphia Auxiliary, both men and women, and Friends generally, are invited to attend.

WM. L. EDWARDS, Secretary.

NOTICE.

The Publisher regrets that by mistake the notice of the meeting of Haverford Alumni, sent for insertion last week, was then omitted.

CORRESPONDENCE.

OSKALOOSA, IA. (From an Eastern Friend in attendance on the Yearly Meeting.)—I have been much comforted in attending Iowa Yearly Meeting. There is no cause of alarm about Quakerism in the West. I think there is sufficient ballast to keep the old ship from keeling too much. By and by the wind will subside, and she will right again and pursue her onward course, for the Pilot is still on board, who has guided her thus far.

RICH SQUARE MONTHLY MEETING, IOWA, is held at Smyrna on the first Seventh-day in each month. It has one hundred members, who are much scattered over this beautiful prairie country, some of them being in Missouri. We are enabled on meeting days to convene quite a goodly number, and an increasing desire is with us to know the way and to walk therein. It is hoped that some of the Friends who are moving westward may be directed hither, and that the Lord may be pleased to make them helpful to us. There is plenty of room, and the laborers among us are few in consideration of the plenteous harvest.

THE INDIAN PAYMENT—THE OSAGE TREATY.

MONTGOMERY, KAN., Sept. 27.

In company with Colonel Coffey, of Coffeyville, on the morning of the 27th, I started up the Verdigris river, to this place, to witness what I had never seen before—an Indian payment.

Arriving at this place we found Superintendent Hoag, Isaac T. Gibson, the new agent, and Jonathan Richards, clerk to the Superintendent, Major G. C. Snow, former agent of the Osages, and the usual amount of white men, who, through curiosity or cupidity, generally congregate at such times and places.

The tribe enrolled 4,381 souls, and about one thousand of the chiefs, headmen, braves and their attendants, were on the ground, seated in their accustomed order in semicircle, dressed in their usual fantastic costume, though somewhat faded out for the want of stamps to buy red paint, blankets and "sich," owing to the delay in their payments.

On the assembling of the council Major Snow made his farewell address to the Osage Indians. He referred to his long official connection with this agency, to the difficulties and embarrassments which had surrounded him in the discharge of his duties, and trusted that the dissensions and party strife were now in a measure done away with, and told them to let the advice given them by the Superintendent and Agent sink deep into their hearts, for they were their true friends. He counseled unity of action in the future, a just regard for the rights of each other and the whites, and pointed out the only way for them to become great and prosperous; by accepting the civilization of the whites, by cultivating the soil, raising cattle, and educating their children, thus becoming independent in their new home provided for them by the treaty. At the close of the Major's remarks he shook hands with them and bade them farewell as agent.

Superintendent Hoag then addressed the Osages, and said substantially as follows:

My brothers! I am happy to meet you. I have long desired this opportunity to talk with you, but my duty with other tribes has prevented my being with you till this day. I call you brothers because we have all one common father. The Great Creator of all made the white man, the red man and the black man equal. He gave to the white man no more natural rights than He gave to the red man; and I claim from you no rights and privileges but such as I extend to you, and you should claim from me no more than you extend to me. I have long wanted to have a plain talk with you, and am glad to see so many here to-day. The history of your people is but a recital of suffering and wrong. You have been made to recede West, at the approach of your white brother, until you crossed the great river (Mississippi). Since that time the emigration of your pale brother, from the Old World and from the States, has poured in upon your hunting lands and passed over them to the mines of California, until you are surrounded by thickly settled States, East, West and North; and, for the comfort and convenience of those States east of you and west of you, they have built railroads, emigrant roads and military roads across your broad hunting grounds, driving the buffalo therefrom, no more to return. This has brought trouble and sometimes war upon you. Your Great Father and the good people of the States have seen this to their deep sorrow. They have wished you could live in peace, but have failed to help you. They have told you that your young men would see the day when the buffalo will have passed away from the earth, and if we judge the future by the past the alternative is plainly marked out before you. Either adopt the industrial habits of your pale brothers, or waste away from this earth by causes which you cannot resist. The Government has wisely purchased a great country south of you, rich in soil, timber, rivers and creeks, and made arrangements with most of the tribes, securing to them future homes where they may settle near each other and become one strong Indian nation to themselves. Your Great Father wants you to go there, and each of you to have his farm, raise his own ponies, cattle, sheep, hogs, and have his fields of wheat, and corn, and gardens, and fruit, and his comfortable houses and barns, and his schools for the education and civilization of his children, make your own laws and administer and execute them, and be in all respects as prosperous and have all the enjoyments your white brothers have. This is what we desire for you; and if you will co-operate with us, give us your labor and influence, it is all within your reach. I want you all to remember that it is industrial labor that makes the white man rich and prosperous, and it is the education of his youth that makes him strong as a nation. The same blessings are at your command, and a better day is in store for you in the future, if you will labor with us for it.

I again urge you to educate your children. If one of you steal from your pale brother a pony, or one of his children, it is sent on the telegraph or written on paper and sent all over the States, and all the people hear of it and feel very angry with the Indians. But if one of the bad white men steal one of your ponies or one of your children, there is no one to write it on paper and to send it amongst all the Indians that they may know the wrong done to them. And why not? Because the poor Indian cannot read. He has not sent his children to school. Your country is very large, reaching three hundred miles towards the setting sun and thirty miles north; large enough to give each one of your nation 1,300 acres. And instead of this making you rich it makes you very poor. You are now oppressed by whites covering your broad fields. We regret that this is so, but we cannot help it. You signed a treaty with the Government last year, in which I think you were to receive as annuity $95,000 a year for sixteen years, part for schools and part for industrial and national purposes. Your Father at Washington writes to me that he has heard you are not satisfied with it, and requests me to ask you if that is so? And if you are not satisfied with it, he wants you to tell him why you are dissatisfied. I do not want you to think that I am in favor of the treaty, or that I am opposed to it. I want to know just how you feel about it; and in telling me I want you to be honest with me, and I will be honest with you. Tell me your own words, that I may tell them to your Great Father.

After further remarks full of kind counsel and advice, the Superintendent closed his speech to the chiefs, and then came the reply from the counsellors and chiefs.

Beaver said—I am glad to see you have given us good advice. We want time to consult about what you have said about the treaty. Our minds are scattered, and we will have to consult with one another.

The Superintendent said—Interested white men will seek to influence you to do wrong. You must not be divided in your councils, nor listen to their advice.

Twelve O'clock said—I have just learned that one of my counsellors is against the treaty. I am surprised at it.

Wat-in-ca said—Some more than one year ago some Commissioners had talk with us. The Great Father wished to purchase the Osage lands. I am the man that talked. I did not refuse my country to them. While we were in council something happened which disturbed our minds very much. After we had signed the treaty, I had another talk. I heard that these commissioners were not sent from the Great Father. I learned that it was a railroad company that had sent them.

We consider we have only one President. If the Great Father wishes to purchase we will sell. You told us that a country had been selected for us. The country is too small. We want to know how many thousand dollars you have for us.

Hard-Rope said—We understand you come to inquire about the treaty. The Osages treated away this country one year ago. They said they come to tell the truth. The Commissioners told us the Great Father wanted our country. The Commissioners told us that all lost money would be restored, and all depredations forgotten. Thinking of our women and children, we let the land go. Since we signed the treaty, we have been told, by a white man, that the Commissioners were not sent by the Great Father, but by a railroad company. I wish to know what kind of a country we are to have. I do not think the Great Father is able to buy our lands.

Kan-se-ca-le said—I want to know if the money you have for us is hard money. I want hard money; I want you to try and get hard money in payment for our land.

August Captain, counsellor for the half-breeds, said—I am an Osage. I was called upon by the Commissioners to assist in interpreting the treaty. It was correct and just; during the council, before signing the treaty, no threats were made, but we all signed the treaty willingly. As one of the interpreters, I deny that any threats were made. The nearest a threat was made by Col. Murphy, one of the Commissioners, who said: Then I suppose you consider yourselves an independent nation and strong enough to defend yourselves. I translated all that was said. Hard-Rope, who talks about threats being made, is the man who led the party, who murdered the white man. All the bad talk they speak about happened after the signing of the treaty. Col. Taylor, the Commissioner, told them he felt for them as his own children; that he had a duty to perform which touched his feelings. . . . . .

Superintendent Hoag said—If I understand you, you have been told by some bad white men that the Commissioners sent here were not sent by the President, your Great Father, but were sent by a railroad company. I have a paper sent to me by your Great Father at Washington, which says that Commissioner Taylor, Col. Murphy and Major Snow, were sent by the President to make a treaty with you. What will he think of you when I tell him that it is said the railroad company sent commissioners, when he sent them himself. It is charged that they bribed, scared and threatened you. Men ought to be careful in their statements. I know Commissioner Taylor; he is a good man; your true friend. So is Col. Murphy. I don't want you to think I desire to influence you for or against the treaty, but only tell you that you may know the facts about the treaty. If you thought they were not sent by the Government, you had reason to distrust them; but they were. You wanted to know how large the country is you are going to. I am told it is about three hundred acres for every man, woman and child of the Osages—not large enough for you to hunt buffalo on, but too large for you to farm. I do believe it best for you to have less land and cultivate more; have houses and stock, and raise more to support you. Now, a word about hard money. You made a treaty and sold off part of your land east of you, and were to get your pay in such articles as the Secretary of the Interior should say—money, clothing and provisions. Your father, the President, did not promise you hard money. He sends you by me just such money as he uses and as I use myself. He has formerly sent you clothing and food, and this time you preferred money. I have brought for you just such as he has sent you, and I shall pay it all to you. . . .

Isaac T. Gibson, the new Agent, said—I am a stranger among you. I don't know that your roll is right. I want to be honest. I am not willing one of you shall be cheated. It is my opinion deception has been used in making out the roll. I cannot permit this. I hope you will be honest with me; and I believe you should have another enrollment, and let us all be honest in making the new enrollment. You are going on a buffalo hunt. I want to give you good advice; when you meet Arapahoes, Cheyennes and those hostile to you, be friendly. Their agents are friends of mine, and will advise them to treat you friendly. It is wrong to fight one another; treat one another as brothers, this will please your Great Father at Washington. I want you to catch many buffalo, and get furs, for you will need them. I will now live among you. I want to tell your young men that labor is honorable. I left the plow in the field to come and stay with you.

Superintendent Hoag said — The Great Father has made it a rule that all Indians outside of their reservations will be regarded by the military as hostile, and when you go out to hunt you must get a writing from the Superintendent, and when you see soldiers on the plains send a man to them with the writing, and that will inform them you are loyal and peaceable.

Twelve O'clock said—You have given us good talk. I was out on the plains; the wild Indians came to my camp; I fed them; they killed two of my people; I did not fight them; I came back crying; I am poor, don't know as I shall go hunting any more.

Dry Feather said to Agent Gibson: I give up to you to say at what point you will live. I will tell you what I will do. Three bands of us have been living on the Verdigris. We have signed a treaty. The whites have crowded us out. I will take my people and go into the Indian country. These white people have corrupted our chiefs. They are now trying to get our chiefs divided. When you get to Washington, ask our Great Father what this white man is who came here and said to us that we had made no treaty; that the Osages would stay here; that it was our land; that our Great Father did not send the commissioners, but a railroad company sent them. This white man came here and said great things; said he had scattered the treaty. God knows I don't believe what that white man says. I want you to tell us what this man is. . . . . .

Strike Axe said: Father! You asked us yesterday about the treaty, after which you would let the Great Father know. We used to do business peaceably on the Neosho with the Government. We spoke pleasantly in the daylight, true and right. My people, yesterday, when asked about the treaty, ought to have said to you, plainly, that they had treated their lands away. They now want the Great Father to give them a little more. You said you would help us.

When you go to Washington, tell our Great Father there is one old Osage chief who wants his money for his land. I am getting old, my son. I may soon die. I hope you will take care of me, as you promised. My son takes my place. I give back to him.

. . . White Hair said: We don't make much talk. We speak to you in unity. We did treat our lands away, after which the young men said the price was too small. If the Great Father wants our lands, we will go to our new home.

Superintendent Hoay said: I have now heard your talk. I will tell your Great Father at Washington what you have said. I will speak well of you. He will be glad to hear from you. I shall try and make your condition better. There is a better day in the future. But we can do but little for you unless you take hold and work with us. Let me say to you again, what I told you yesterday, educate your children, raise produce, raise cattle and have farms and houses like white men for the sustenance and comfort of your families. Some of you have spoken of going to a reservation in the Indian country. The treaty is not ratified yet. There is no certainty that you will be protected there. It is a good place for you, and your Great Father, the President, wants you to go there, but not until the treaty is ratified, or if it should fail, some other arrangement made for you, and then you will be protected there, and we will help you improve and make good homes there. Now the President sent you $7,500 three moons ago. You were out on the hunt. I could not see you, and I asked him to send your full payment and pay you both at once. He now sends you $7,500 more, and I have it here to pay you.

The roll was called and the money paid, amounting to about $2.25 per capita. The Indians were very quiet and peaceable; more so than usual on pay day. The Superintendent and his Clerk go North. The new agent remains with the Indians. They seem pleased that the agent is to reside among them.

From the many abortive attempts to control, civilize and Christianize the tribes of our State, I had almost concluded all efforts in this direction of no avail. Yet there is a nameless power and influence over the Indians in the candor, honesty and kindness of Superintendent Hoag and Agent Gibson in transacting their business with them, and I cannot but believe that they will succeed in instructing this turbulent tribe into many of the arts of civilized life. The "law of kindness" will find a response in the hearts of men, civlized and savage, from the rising to the setting sun. They seek now to have this tribe and all others conform to the universal law of man's existence and "labor." This is without doubt the true solution of this vexed question; and with the tribes congregated in the Indian country below, an ocean of civilization around them, a stern necessity compelling them to effort, the comforts and luxuries of industry inviting them to labor, and a genial climate, we may expect to see the experiment of Christianizing the Indian yet succeed. BY HOWARD CROSBY.

In regard to the love of personal display, note these things:

1. It is emphasizing the wrong portion of our personality. Our souls live forever. Their virtues ought to shine forth to God's glory. But these bodies are bags of bones to be mouldered into dust. Emphasizing the body is to emphasize vanity. And here we may make the remark that, as a soul appreciates its own growth, it refuses to exalt the body. It is the empty mind that loves most to adorn the body. A meek and quiet spirit and a life full of good works hold up the right thing for an example to the race. They commend what God loves to the imitation and acceptance of others; but a bedizened body turns the heads of fools into a false course of emulation, and reduces a woman to rivalry with the peacocks.

2. Again, it involves a wicked consumption of time and money. Hours are robbed from the use of the higher nature in order to bedeck this decaying tent. The diary of a fashionable Christian woman would be a sad history to read, if we only looked at the one item of the use of time. Look over the day from nine in the morning to twelve or two at night—fifteen or seventeen hours—and if it is a fully fashionable day, with its hollow visiting, its dinner and its evening party, you have at least four hours of the looking-glass, while all the rest (except ten minutes given in all to running over a chapter and a form of prayer in the morning and at night) belongs to the world as distinct from and opposed to God. This is the full-blown fashionable Christian woman. Preserve the principle, but reduce the dimensions, and you have a very common type of Christian lady. As with time, so with money. The quality and quantity alike empty the purse. By actual computation, a fashionable lady's garments and adornments (taking the average) would neatly clothe twenty of the most refined of her sex. She has put upon her person twenty times more than was necessary to give her the modest and becoming appearance God requires. Where the waste can be afforded, it is a fearful misplacement of value ; but alas! where in one case it can be afforded, in a thousand it produces debt, domestic jarring, and, often, bankruptcy.

3. Again, it is childish ; a stooping to trifles. The lady who puts on a diamond ring, and then carefully takes her glove off at the public assembly, is simply acting the rôle of the nursery. She is indulging the most infantile of all vanities, the vanity of self-decoration, a vanity seen to prevail among the blacks of Central Africa and among barbarians generally. It is nothing in her favor that she exhibits the jewel. It does not prove a noble character, or betoken cultivation or genius; it does not even show the small glory of the possession of wealth; for it is a common thing for jewelry to be worn, where, in order to wear it, grinding penury is borne. I do not dwell on the folly of personal decoration from a worldly stand-point, or I might show that the beautiful woman appears the fairest when in simple costume, and that jewelry and finery make the ugly face more conspicously ugly. I treat the whole matter from a Christian point of view. I call attention to God's reiterated command to his children to avoid display, and, especially to women, to avoid personal decoration. I show you that it is exalting the body to the prejudice of the soul, that it is fearful waste of time and money, and that it ill becomes the dignity of Christian character. The inner life with God naturally rejects these external gew-gaws, and revolts at the thought of giving its strength to the hair-dresser, the mantua-maker, and the jeweler. A self-decorator loses all the sweet delicacy and tenderness of the spiritual life—by a law as irreversible as that the fall of one scale implies the rise of the other. The self-decorator is, moreover, as guilty in the sight of God as the maker of counterfeit money. She is endeavoring to establish a false measure of value—to divert attention from her real worth to a factitious worth made up by accidents, all of which a wooden statue could wear as well. The self-decorator is, therefore, a deceiver as well as a trifler; and in her deceit she leads hosts of weak minds to struggle for pre-eminence according to the standard of personal upholstery, to the production of an incalculable amount of jealousy, disappointment, unrest, and extravagance, under all which their weak minds become the weaker and their puny lives the more completely worthless before God and man. The three glories of a woman—her triple crown, which makes her power more efficient than that of the Vatican, and constitutes her in her true and normal life the minister of grace and health to the race—are modesty, truth, and sympathy. All three of these are tarnished by the self-decorator. For modesty, we have the brazen face with which young misses even stare unblushingly at all they meet; for truth, we have the perpetual lie of fashionable society ; and for sympathy, the headlong plunge after selfish indulgence. I do not speak as a cynic, as one who would morosely deny the proper recreations and light enjoyments that our natures need as they do air and food, nor do I ignore the fact that some noble spirits are faithfully resisting this spreading evil ; but, with all these allowances, I see the Christian church violently invaded by this fatal iniquity ; I see the Christian mothers justifying it on every hand, and Christian daughters dragged into the vortex by the very hands that ought to have been thrown around them for protection ; I see the influence of this self-decoration by the force of example extending itself over all classes and conditions of society, like a subtle poison, eating out the life of Christianity and leaving the mere name. And, seeing this, I cannot keep silent without becoming a partaker of the sin. It is my duty to warn Christian women of this foe to piety that they are more or less nursing in their hearts and in their families, and to urge them to that simplicity of apparel which is alone consistent with a Christian heart, and which will ever help them to be separated from a vain and godless world. Alas! That is the very thing that so many do not wish! They love the world, and separation from its empty shows is a sad thought to them. Is there such a soul here to-day ? I say in all solemnity—can you be a Christian? Are you bound to Jesus the Lord by the blood-bought ties of a renewed affection? Have you received the Holy Spirit, the sweet earnest of your heavenly glory? How can I believe it? How can you believe it, when you acknowledge that the world's glittering vanities are your fascinators? If you realized that you belonged to Christ, that your treasures were laid up in heaven, you would emphasize your separation from the world—you would take delight in the company of the faithful—and you would most cheerfully bear whatever reproach the gay and silly might cast upon you, because you shunned their meretricious adornments. You would rather suffer reproach with the people of God than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. Now, I know very well that some are ready to say, "This is all ranting. Can't we wear fine jewelry and elegant head-dresses and costly hats any more? Are we to be like Quakers? Are all the world so wrong? And do not thousands of good Christians indulge in all this?" But, dear friends, protesting and ridicule are not arguments worth a straw against a plain declaration of a divine principle. It is your duty to dress with simplicity and frugality; and you refuse that duty at your peril. "Let your adorning not be the outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." Obey that command, and if it leads you to be a Quaker, be a Quaker.

But, after all, I know that the true place for reform to begin is in the heart. I know that if you draw nearer to Jesus and behold him more clearly, if you weigh your privileges in him and count the mercies of the Lord to your soul, if you think of the love of that Redeemer's heart which now yearns for you and seeks to win you closer to itself—then the looking-glasses will be gladly brought to the Lord and dedicated to his use—then the time and money and energy you have used in self-decoration and display will be spent in the maintance of that holiuess which is so acceptable to your God. Then you will have courage enough to be independent of the world's decrees, and you will find a delight in being singular where the singularity is a badge of the Lord's love.

The religion of Jesus is not one thing to the poor and another thing to the rich; it is not one thing to the fashionable and another thing to the modest. It is the same to all. It is self-abnegation, that Jesus may be all in all. Jesus has no greater enemy than self. The self-decorator is giving aid and comfort to that enemy. In the face of this truth and by the love of Jesus, I beseech you, Christian women, women of the true Israel, consecrate your looking-glasses to the Lord.

THE LOVED AND LOST.

The loved and lost! why do we call them lost,
Because we miss them on the onward road?
God's unseen angel o'er our pathway crossed,
Looked on us all, and loving them the most,
Straightway relieved them of life's heavy load.

They are not lost! they are within the door
That shuts out loss and every hurtful thing—
With angels bright, and loved ones gone before,
In their Redeemer's presence evermore,
And God himself their Lord and Judge and King.

And this we call "a loss;" Oh, selfish sorrow
Of selfish hearts! Oh we of little faith!
Let us look round, some argument to borrow,
Why we in patience should await the morrow,
That surely must succeed this night of death.

Aye, look upon this dreary desert path,
The thorns and thistles wheresoe'er we turn;
What trials and what tears, what wrongs and wrath,
What struggles and what strife the journey hath!
They have escaped from these, and lo! we mourn.

Ask the poor sailor, when the wreck is done,
Who with his treasures strove the shore to reach,
While with the raging waves he battled on,
Was it not joy, when every hope seemed gone,
To see his loved ones landed on the beach?

A poor wayfarer, leading by the hand
A little child, had halted by the well,
To wash from off her feet the clinging sand,
And tell the tired boy of that bright land,
Where, this long journey passed, they longed to dwell.

When lo! the Lord, who many mansions had,
Drew near, and looked upon the suffering twain—
Then pitying spake, "Give me the little lad;
In strength renewed, and glorious beauty clad,
I'll bring him with me when I come again."

Did she make answer, selfishly and wrong,
"Nay, but the woes, I feel he too must share!"
Oh, rather, bursting into grateful song,
She went her way rejoicing, and made strong,
To struggle on, since he was freed from care.

We will do likewise: death hath made no breach
In love and sympathy, in hope and trust;
No outward sign or sound our ears can reach,
But there's an inward spiritual speech
That greets us still, though mortal tongues be dust.

It bids us do the work that they laid down,
Take up the song where they left off the strain,
So journeying till we reach the heavenly town,
Where are laid up our treasures and our crown,
And our lost loved ones will be found again.

IDLENESS is a constant sin, and labor is a duty. Idleness is but the devil's home for temptation, and for unprofitable, distractory musings. Labor profiteth others and ourselves.—Baxter.

TRUTH.—He that could make a real progress in knowledge must dedicate his age as well as youth, the latter growths as well as the first fruits, at the altar of Truth.—Beckley's Sirus.

HUMILITY.—Sense shines with the greatest beauty when it is set in humility. An humble, able man is a jewel worth a kingdom.—Wm. Penn.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—European advices are to the 18th inst.

GREAT BRITAIN.—O'Donoghue, M. P. for Kerry and Tralee, recently writing to the Dublin Amnesty Association on the course of the government towards political prisoners, declared that the members of the government, collectively and individually, commiserate the Fenian prisoners, and are anxious to liberate them if it can be done consistently with their duty to the State, but that he is convinced that they cannot without betraying their trust and degrading their functions, yield any thing to the faintest semblance of unconstitutional pressure.

FRANCE.—It is mentioned as a circumstance of some significance, that three large public meetings were held in Paris on the 13th inst., without disturbance, and without interference by the police.

The Siecle, in an article reviewing the general policy of the empire, censures the support given to the temporal power of the Pope, and declares that the time has come when France desires to know something of her foreign as well as her home policy; to know the end pursued, whether peace or war.

The Empress had arrived at Constantinople. and had been received by the Sultan with great ceremony.

The Opposition members of the Legislative Body held a meeting on the 18th, at which they drew up and signed a manifesto, declaring that they will not go to the chamber on the 26th, as had been proposed, because they do not wish to provoke a demonstration and imperil returning liberty. A pacific revolution, the result of which is daily becoming clearer, having commenced, they must not become the instrument or furnish a pretext for disorder. The Opposition will await the meeting of the Legislative Body on the day to which it has been postponed by the government, when they will demand to know the reason for this new wrong, and will steadily pursue the work of urging the democratic and radical demands of the country.

"Father" Hyacinthe, the monk whose recent withdrawal from his order has excited much interest in the religious world, has come to the United States, having landed in New York on the 18th inst.

EGYPT.—The inundation of the Nile, which has been unusually high, is subsiding, and damage to the cotton crop is no longer apprehended. The losses sustained probably will not exceed 300 bales. A dam on the Suez canal gave way, but did no great harm to the works, though a large quantity of material was destroyed. It is feared the canal must be deepened before it can be used.

A dispatch from Bombay to London, dated the 6th inst., stated that a letter from Dr. Livingstone, the celebrated traveller, had reached that place, written in the 7th month, 1868, when he was at Lake Banglewe, in good health and spirits. He mentioned incidentally that he believed he had found the true source of the Nile. Another dispatch, of the 11th, says that Dr. Kirke of Zanzibar had informed the government there, that a caravan had brought to Zanzibar the news that Dr. L. had arrived at Niyi safe and well. He was on his way to the coast, the way to which was open and safe. What part of the coast was meant is not stated. Another caravan was expected, with later information of his progress.

SPAIN.—The insurgents in the city of Valencia, after having been besieged for several days by the government troops, offered to capitulate, and sent a deputation headed by the Archbishop, to intercede on their behalf, but all terms were refused and unconditional surrender was demanded. On the 16th, the troops attacked the city, aided by artillery, and after a contest of some hours, the insurgents surrendered. Their leaders were said to have disappeared, but were supposed to be hidden in the city or vicinity. The insurrection, apparently, was still active in several other quarters, and more fighting was reported in Catalonia and Granada. A republic had been proclaimed at Malaga and Valladolid, and the former city had been placed under martial law. The republican Deputies absente themselves from the Cortes, and some of them were supposed to be with the insurgents. A committee appointed to inquire into their conduct, recommended the passing of a vote of censure against those who had left their post in the Chamber, and the institution of legal proceedings against such as had taken an active part in the insurrection. Authority had been given to prosecute 17 of them. Castelar, the celebrated republican leader in the Cortes, was said to have fled to Portugal, having been threatened with assassination. A number of republican journals published in the provinces had been suppressed by the local authorities as inciting to insurrection, and three in Madrid had been similarly treated. Some prominent republicans had been arrested.

Deputies from Porto Rico had appeared in the Cortes. One of their first acts was to present a demand for colonial liberties and reforms.

Dispatches from Madrid of the 16th announced that the sessions of the Cortes had been suspended, without the appointment of a day for reassembling.

SOUTH AMERICA.—Late advices say that Lopez had arrived at San Estanislans, where the Paraguayan accounts represented that he had established new lines of defence, and that he had a considerable force and plenty of artillery. The Allies had suspended the pursuit, for want of horses and mules, but intended to resume it when the army should be reorganized.

DOMESTIC.—The President has appointed Major General Wm. M. Belknap of Iowa, as Secretary of War. Since the death of Gen. Rawlins, the post has been filled temporarily by Gen. Sherman.

In a case recently tried before Judge Sawyer in San Francisco, the testimony of Chinese witnesses was offered, and was objected to, under the law of California excluding such witnesses. The Judge decided that the 14th amendment of the United States Constitution overpowers the State law, and that the evidence should be received.

The Virginia Legislature, on the 19th inst., elected as U. S. Senators from that State, John F. Lewis for the long term, and J. W. Johnston for the short term, both of whom, it is stated, can take the test oath.

The officer in charge of the Money Order division of the Post-office Department reports that during the year ending with Sixth month last, 2,300,000 money orders were issued, amounting to $46,000,000, against $16,000,000 the previous year.

SUMMARY OF NEWS 159

Report of ENOCH HOAG, Superintendent, to the "Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs."

Esteemed Friends.—I regret that proper attention to my duties here will prevent my meeting your committee on the 22d inst. I will, however, endeavor to give you some statements in reference to the tribes in Kansas, most of which I have visited and councilled with twice.

Of the tribes under agents Tatum and Darlington, your committee who have visited them will be able to afford you the necessary information. For the last named agent and the tribes under his care I have felt much interest, and some anxiety, as they have given our Government much trouble. I have long been of the opinion that they were dissatisfied with their treaty. They have remained outside of the reservation assigned to them by said treaty, and assign as a reason therefor an unwillingness to remove thither, not having understood this to be the precise location in the Indian Territory the Government assigned to them when they signed the treaty. The agent, with General Hazen, held a council with them at which the dissatisfaction mentioned above was reaffirmed. On a subsequent visit from General Hazen, I obtained from him his views thereon, and information of their desire in the matter, and with his statement, I forwarded to the Department an urgent recommendation that no further time be lost in placing that tribe upon the land of their choice. I received an early reply, an extract from which I herewith enclose. I immediately sent to the agent's assistance a man well qualified for the service, with a good team and carriage to aid him, first, with the chiefs and head men of the tribe, to repair to their contemplated home and select a location for their settlement, for agency, &c., and to forthwith remove thither said Indians.

There has also been some dissatisfaction arising from a reduction of rations, and withholding coffee and sugar. An appeal was forwarded by this office on the 10th of Eighth month, and on the 17th of Eighth month a response was received from the Commissioner. (Extract herewith.) We have now reasonable hope for progress in this agency.

I forbear speaking of the Kiowa, Camanche, Apache and affiliated tribes, apprehending their agent will be with you, who can better inform you of their condition than I can. I desire his labors in the South should meet your approval, and claim your hearty support. Though a great undertaking, it is practical and in harmony with the principles of the "Peace Commission" who negotiated the treaty, as well as with the policy of the Government. With the exception of the present cost of living, wheat, corn and vegetables can be raised as cheaply there as they can here, and even from this point to that agency, the Government is paying for transportation $1.50 per hundred pounds for each hundred miles, (distance 500 miles,) making the mere freight of a bushel of wheat or corn $4.50, besides the original cost.

The Kickapoos, numbering about 325, are in two bands—one living upon allotted lands in severalty. This band has a mission school, small, but increasing, and will be improved by our watchful care. The other band, called the "prairie band," hold their land in common, but cultivate their separate lots. We are about starting a school for them. They are anxious for an increase of schools, and assure us of their co-operation. This tribe is self-sustaining, and many of them have good farms, crops and herds. They have made a treaty with the Central Branch U. P. Railroad for sale of their lands, not yet ratified, and they desire it should not be. Under the watchful care of their agent, Miles, their best interests will be safely guarded.

The Pottawatomies, 2,000 in number, have one good school under the control of the Catholics, largely attended and well managed, receiving from the Government $75 for each scholar per annum, for board, clothing and tuition. They own a large tract of land secured to them by treaty, upon which they raise subsistence for the support of the scholars, and make it a paying institution. About 600 of this tribe have taken their share of the common reserve in allotments, and have become citizens of the United States. Several hundred more have applied for the same, which will soon be granted. The residue, called the "prairie band," hold their land in common, and, like the Kickapoos, desire a school, which we shall soon open for them. This tribe is also self-sustaining and improving. Many have good farms and fields of corn, wheat, &c. The allotted portion of this tribe propose to sell out and go to the Indian country. The other band desire to remain where they are. Their newly appointed agent has not yet arrived at his post.

The Kansas Indians, about 540 in number, are poor, and have been much neglected and abused. They have a rich reserve in the valley of the Neosho river, said reserve being about 15 miles in length. They have negotiated a treaty in which they stipulate to sell their lands to the U. P. Railroad, Southern Branch, with a view of removing to the Indian Territory. Said treaty is not ratified, and they desire it should not be. None of their children have been in school for several years. We are about opening one in the mission buildings formerly occupied for that purpose by Friends. The Indians promise us their co-operation.

By the mismanagement of their affairs, their accumulated school fund was expended last winter for their subsistence. We would appeal to the associated committee to aid in the education of this tribe. They having been the most neglected, are the most needy, and most dependent of all the tribes in Kansas. I am confident that whatever aid you can extend to them will be judiciously expended by agent Stubbs, who is industriously laboring for their best interest. Their educational interests should not be allowed to suffer.

The Sac and Fox Indians, about 700 in number, have one mission school in successful operation, small but increasing. They are self-sustaining. They negotiated a treaty with the Government, and selected a new home in the Creek country, adjoining the Seminoles on the north, and will probably remove thither this fall. We should organize more educational labor amongst them at once if they were to remain here. They will need our care in this respect in their new homes. Our friend, Thomas Miller, is carefully looking after their interests.

The Delawares, 1,000 in number, have executed the stipulations of their treaty, and have removed to the Cherokee country, and have become indentified with said Cherokees, and having been absorbed by the latter tribe, their nationality has become extinct. They desire a school and if I learn they are under our supervision, we will look after their interests. Their tribal organization is dissolved, but the services of their agent, Pratt, are yet retained for the closing up of their business.

The Shawnees, about 650 in number, are, for the most part, self-sustaining and doing well. Their lands have rapidly advanced in value, and having this year effected an arragement with the Cherokees, under the approval of the President, they will very soon remove to that country, become a part of that nation, and their tribal organization become extinct. In some respects their condition will be improved. They have for years been overrun and annoyed by whites through inefficiency in the administration of their affairs. They will go to a good country where provision is made for the education of their youth, and their civil rights will be better guarded. It is, therefore, probable that this agency, now filled by R. L. Roberts, will soon be abolished.

The Osages, about 3,500 in number, have been much neglected. Their condition is similar to the Kansas tribe. They speak the same langaage, and are much like them in their habits. Their agent, Snow, lives far from them, and they have for years received but little benefit from their agent, except the receipt of their annuities. Being poor, and forbidden by Government from going to the plains for buffalo, for fear of collision with warlike Indians or soldiers, they have been driven, from want, to make depredations upon herds passing through their lands from Texas. They have one good school, long established and kept up by the Catholics. They are a powerful tribe, interested in education and agriculture, and before the war were quite prosperous. I have strong hopes that under the administration of our efficient agent, Isaac T. Gibson, who will enter upon his services next week, we shall ere long see an improvement in this neglected tribe. They have negotiated a treaty with the Government in which they dispose of all their lands, and agree to go to a new home in the Indian country. Said treaty has not yet been ratified. I think they will eventually be moved where they will be less exposed to the baneful influences by which they are at present surrounded. Their domain is too extensive for their use, being about 300 miles long from east to west, and, excluding their "trust lands," 30 miles wide.

The Peorias, Piankeshaws, Kaskaskias and Weas of the Osage river agency have lately removed from Miami County, Kansas, to the northeast corner of the Indian country, and are in prosperous circumstances. I have recently visited them and paid them large annuities. I find them interested in education and industrial labor, and with proper care on the part of the Government, they will soon equal their neighbors the Cherokees, in civilization. They want schools, which we are preparing for them.

The remaining tribe of this agency, the Miamis, nunbering about 90, are, in a good degree, civilized and on allotted farms, in Miami County, and will remain there. I have recommended that they be under the immediate care of this office, and that the agency be abolished at an early day. Agent Stanley is at present attending to their interests.

The Senecas, mixed Senecas and Shawnees, and Quapaws, in the northeast part of the Indian country, have been for some years past under the care of special agent George Mitchell. They are all doing well. They have made selections in a very good country, and are, with very few exceptions, improving in the various departments of industry, and are all desirous of improvement in education.

The Ottawas, Munsees and the Chippewas are small remnants of tribes within the Sac and Fox agency. They are prosperous, and live as the white people, have schools, &c.

The Wyandottes once became citizens, but are asking to be once more restored to their original status. They will move down among the Senecas.

We have to surmount formidable obstacles in the way of civilization of the Indians in Kansas, from the fact that they are nearly all in a migratory state. While some of them are desirous of remaining here, they well know it is the policy of the Government to remove them at an early day. This unsettled condition retards our labor, both in agriculture and schools. But in our desire that our labor may harmonize with that of the Government, so far as it can in justice to the tribes, our efforts are not relaxed in working for their comfort, improvement and happiness wherever we find an opening, even under adverse circumstances.

I inclose herewith an extract from General Hazen's report to General Sherman upon Indian Affairs, and dated 7th mo. 1st, 1869.

Respectfully, your friend,

ENOCH HOAG,
Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

It belongs to the Protestant Church to make great account of the Bible. For this it has been distinguished from the first days of the Reformation; and we hope the time may never come when it shall be less sacredly regarded or highly prized. As an inspired revelation from God, and as meeting us in a darkened and perverted world, surrounded as we are by sin, error, and temptation, all calculated to lead us astray and involve us in utter ruin at last, it fully merits, and should always receive, our deepest veneration, and excite our profoundest study.

But it cannot be denied that our professed regard for the Bible is not always illustrated in such a manner as best to prove its sincerity. The claims of the Bible are not to be put off with eulogies, however high-wrought and beautiful these may be. There are many, who would be quite willing to fight for the Bible, who yet find it very difficult even to read it with any degree of concentration and care, to say nothing of shaping their lives by its precepts. Weeks and months, in the case of some, are allowed to pass away before they once turn to its sacred pages; and then, often, the only purpose that actuates them is an idle curiosity, or the deiire to controvert the position taken by some one else in regard to its teachings,

With all the effort that has been made in its favor, the fact still remains and is patent —the Bible does not sustain that sacred relation to the heart that it ought to sustain—is not for the general Protestant mind that holy and sublime interest that it should be—does not carry in it that grand treasure which in words we attribute to it. Here and there an earnest, old-style Protestant Christian may be found, who, in the way of practical attention to the Bible, consistently illustrates and forcibly proves his profession. He has given his heart and mind to the work of poring over its pages. Not only his spare time, but the time also which he cannot so well spare, he seizes and devotes to this purpose. It is the man of his counsel and the guide of his steps. His earnestness is seen in the biblical literature which he has gathered, by which he is aided in unlocking its meaning and coming to the possession of its lofty truths. Thus he honors the Bible truly. He seeks to enter it, not simply with his own narrow mind, uneducated, or half educated, preoccupied and full of predilections and prejudices, nor yet with the best and most highly developed intellect. It deserves, he says, more than this. It is worthy of the best thought, guided by the most ardent prayers of all the ages of the Church. Into this he endeavors to live himself, so that he may be the better qualified properly to honor the Sacred Treasure, and from it derive those lessons which may guide him on his way through a perverted world to his Father's house.

But how seldom do we find such instances of Bible devotion at the present day! How seldom it is that persons are found seeking aids, of the character indicated, to help them to a proper understanding of the Scripture! When it is read, it is for the most part in a perfectly disconnected way, without rule or system of any kind. The whole manner of Bible reading, as a general thing, shows plainly enough, that however precious the Bible may be in itself, it is not for the readers what, in their professions, they say it is.

There is plainly a deception in regard to this subject. Our professions are ill sustained by our conduct. Love for the Bible or attachment to it, is not by any means as great as we often suppose. How is this general carelessness to be accounted for? Not, certainly, on the ground of an insufficient effort to circulate the Holy Scriptures. No period has been more distinguished for work of this character than the present. Besides, men are exhorted to read and treasure it with an earnestness which has certainly never been surpassed; and yet the fact is, that previous periods are far in advance of the present in earnest, deep, prayerful searchings of the sacred text.

We press the question: why are the Holy Scriptures so superficially skimmed over, so thoughtlessly read, so generally neglected and dishonored? There is no fact but that has its producing cause somewhere, or in something; and certainly there is such a cause for this. It is important that we should understand it. In no other way can it be removed. The Holy Scriptures demand a reverence which, we must all confess, they do not receive. To cultivate this, the cause producing the present irreverence must be ascertained and removed. This must be ascertained, not by one mind, nor by one hundred, but by the general Christian mind. All earnest spirits are interested in this question. What mind, zealous for the glory of God and the proper honor of His message, can rest satisfied with the present status of professedly Christian communities in their relation to the Bible? And then, even the present posture of the mind in relation to the Scriptures, bad as it is, is rapidly growing into one that is worse. The evil seems to be increasing day by day. What must the end be? We shall not now indicate our own view as to the cause of this growing evil. Our object is to start the question in other minds: Why is the Holy Bible thus neglected and dishonored, although so freely and generally circulated?—Ref. Church Messenger.

MADAGASCAR.

"The following extracts from a letter from Mr. Cameron, who is connected with the Madagascar Mission of the Society, present striking illustrations of the use made by God of secondary influences in the extension of the kingdom of Christ.

"After referring to the kinds of clay found in the island, and the quality of the bricks which can be made there, he replies as follows, to an inquiry whether there is scope for the employment by the Government or others of the services of a general engineer:—

"'This appears to me to be a subject of some importance. My actual employment in Madagascar has been more in that capacity than in any single branch of trade or business. After I had been more than a year in Madagascar, the first Radama, shortly before his death, sent messages to me, requesting me to turn my attention to any department of art or science, or to the introduction of any improvement which I thought might be beneficial to his country, and saying that he would aid and support me as might appear necessary. This request arose partly from my having brought out and set up the cotton machinery sent out to him by the directors of the day; and, probably, in part from the following, common enough, but, to me, somewhat remarkable circumstance. 1. Before leaving London, in 1826, I observed one day on a mantel-piece, in a room of the old Mission-house, a small case containing two or three small bottles of acids, apparently not used for any purpose. I requested permission to take it with me to Madagascar, where it might be found useful. I soon got possession of the acids, and brought them with me. 2. When I arrived here, I found that Radama, a short time before, had instituted a general search for limestone, and had offered a reward to any native who should discover it, so that many of the natives, and some of the French and English, had searched the country: but in their opinion, no limestone was to be found in it. 3. Soon after my arrival, happening to examine some of the specimens collected by Europeans, I soon found, with the aid of the acids from London, that some of the specimens were limestone; and soon after, by the same means, limestone was found in several places not far from the capital.

"'These things helped to show Radama that there was still much to be found out in this country, and led him, no doubt, to make the proposal referred to.'

"As to the chemist no material substance is rubbish, so in the kingdom of Divine Providence there are no trifles, no accidents. These bottles of acids, set aside no man knows when or by whom, were designed by the Divine mind which is 'wonderful in counsel' to render valuable aid in Madagascar, in conciliating rulers to foreigners who had come on an important errand, in inspiring confidence in them, and thus in inducing those in authority to permit, if not directly to promote, the work of the Christian missionary. The idolatrous Queen, who afterwards became the severe persecutor, without doubt felt this confidence in the missionaries, and thus sought their aid in promoting the welfare of her people. This appears from the following passage in Mr. Cameron's letter:—

"'But soon after this Radama died, and his death, as is well known, cast a shade over the first Mission. It is also well known that Radama's successor, soon after she came to the throne, abolished Radama's treaty with the British Government for the suppression of the slave trade from Madagascar, and sent away the British agent, under circumstances dictated by her heathenish priesthood. But it is not so well known that immediately after this she called a meeting of all the missionaries, when she enquired of them whether they could not teach her people something else besides reading, writing, and arithmetic. They replied that reading, writing, and arithmetic were but the rudiments of education; and they mentioned, among other things, the ancient languages, mathematics, &c. &c., as not yet introduced to her kingdom. This was carried to the Queen, and she replied by again thanking them for what they had so well done; but she did not see the use of her people learning languages which were not spoken.'

"The influence of the acids in connection with the discovery of limestone still continued to work, though Radama I. was dead. His successor, the Queen before referred to, also looks to the missionaries for aid in developing the resources of her kingdom. After giving the Queen's reply to the offer of the missionaries to teach the ancient languages, Mr. Cameron adds:—

"'She then inquired whether there were not any who could teach her people to make soap out of materials found in her country. The late Mr. Griffiths turned to me and asked whether I could not reply to that question. I told him to tell the Queen that I would endeavor to give them an answer in a week.

"'The subject of soap-making was all but new to me. But again, with the aid of the cids, after many experiments with different native plants, I found that the ashes of a certain vegetable, accidentally introduced a few years before from the Mauritius, contained a very large proportion of a good carbonate of potash. The vegetable was collected, dried, burnt, &c., and at the time appointed I took up to the meeting, I think, two bars of soap, which I assured them were made of materials found in Madagascar. This greatly pleased the native officers, and the Queen became softened in her bearing towards us. In the course of a few weeks, I entered into a contract with them to manufacture soap—the Queen finding materials and labor; and half the quantity made was to be hers and half mine.

"'The French, as well as ourselves, have done much to promote physical improvements among the Malagasy. Had they been more successful in their endeavors, and we less so, the two missions at the present time might have occupied altered positions in the estimation of leading Malagasy; not that the Gospel had lost its resistless power, but because men, ignorant of the Gospel, at first judge of systems by the apparent fruit they bear.'"

"The following extract referring to Ranavalona I., who is frequently regarded only in the character of a persecutor of the Christians, distinctly shows that she was unconsciously employed by the Head of the Church as his instrument in leading on and preparing the people to brave and bear faithfully unto the end the fierce flame of persecution which she herself afterwards kindled:—

"'And though not generally known in the present day, Ranavalona I. at that time sanctioned and assisted the translation and printing of the Scriptures; so that the first edition was printed in Madagascar under her auspices. She was also the first to sanction the natives being baptized and formed into churches. She was also the first to sanction the preaching of the Gospel to adults, apart from the common school education of children. And what she did at that time for the promotion of Christian truth, though without the intention, on her part, of doing so, became, no doubt, the means of preparing the martyrs of future years to bear up under the fiery trials which she afterwards caused to fall upon them, and strengthening them even to seal their testimony to Christian truth with their blood! However, after a very few years, she held her great assembly of the people in February, 1835, in which she first announced the satisfactory completion of my contracts, and then issued that edict which, for twenty-five years afterwards, caused so much sorrow and suffering and death to the sincere disciples of the Saviour.'

"Mr. Cameron concludes his interesting letter by referring to a recent instance in which his mechanical talent has been employed by the present Government of Madagascar.

"'April 7th, 1869.—The canal which conveys water from the river to the reservoir, referred to in the former part of this letter, did not give unmixed satisfaction. The dam, or weir, across the river required frequent renewal, and the water dammed up overflowed a good deal of rice ground, more valuable now than it was thirty years ago. The present government applied to me to know whether any improvement could be made in the mode of leading out the water. I recommended them to put up a water wheel, to raise a portion of the water of the river a few feet above its general surface, so as to cause the water to flow from the wheel into the canal with a much lower weir, and without overflowing the rice grounds. This has been done within the last six months, and two weeks ago the Queen and her court came to see it, and to set it a-going. As a very large proportion of the people had no idea of the working-power of water, they were very much pleased, and, I hope, instructed by the sight. A stream of water, three feet broad and nearly one foot deep, thrown up by the wheel, and moving onwards at a slow pace, six feet above the level of the water of the river, was to all of them a new sight. And some of them saw at once that thousands of acres of good land, just beyond the reach of the highest waters of a river, could by such means be converted into valuable rice grounds. The Queen looked on with intense interest, and both she and her officers expressed to me their very great satisfaction.'"

The following account of the Queen's marriage and baptism is taken from a letter addressed to Mr. Cameron by the excellent native preacher Andriambelo. It is dated May 3d, 1869:—

"And on the 19th February, 1869, the Queen and the Prime Minister sent for Andriambelo and Rahanamy, and before them they entered into a (marriage) contract, good and fair; and we gave them suitable expostulation in reference to the same.

"And on the 21st February, 1869, there were assembled in the Court-yard, the officers, and the judges, and the head men of the common people, and the nobles, and preachers from each of the town churches. And after preaching, prayer, and singing, Andriambelo baptized the Queen and the Prime Minister, when many of the people were greatly surprised, for they saw that the Queen and the Prime Minister, and the Christians present, were all weeping and greatly moved.

"On the 22d February, the Queen gave a feast within the Court-yard to the officers and to the leaders of the people, to the preachers and to the soldiers; and she said to them, 'I rejoice in the blessing of God, and I have called you to eat and drink with me.' And the Prime Minister replied, saying, 'Let our thanksgiving, O Queen, be unto God; for we all rejoice in the approach you have made unto Him.' And three of the preachers engaged in prayer during the feast. And from this time the Queen and the Prime Minister have been diligent, and have made good progress in their knowledge of God. I am surprised at the progress the Queen makes with the book of instruction I had from the missionaries. The Prime Minister also took the lessons with me, and I thanked God when I saw the progress he had made, and praised him for his diligence even before his face. And I have told him that, without doubt, God has been merciful to him in enlightening his mind to know these things."—London Missionary Chronicle.

MEN WANTED.

The great want of the age is men who are not for Sale; men who are honest—sound from centre to circumference—true to the heart's core, who hold honesty to be always the best policy, and dishonesty a folly and shocking bad policy; men who, next to honesty, regard generosity to be the most captivating and profitable principle any person can practise; men who will condemn wrong in friend or foe, in themselves as well as others; men who will do right by Christian means at all risks; men who can tell the truth and look the whole world and the Spirit of Evil right in the eyes; men that neither brag nor run; men that neither flag nor flinch; men in whom the current of rellgious faith runs still and strong for sectarian limits, but too strong for sectarian bonds; men who are no-wise disheartened by the small success which has too often attended the best endeavors of the benevolent to rectify the disorders of society, and who will not slacken their labors till judgment be set upon the earth, and mankind are as happy as it is possible for them to be in this world; men who regard the Deity as the source of all real good, and, therefore, look for it from Him, and on human instrumentality but as a medium of its communication; men who will not live by the follies, vices or bad habits of others; men who know their message and tell it; men who know their duty and do it; men, no matter their grade, who know their place and fill it; men that will not lie; men that are not too lazy to work, and who do not think work an indignity; men who are not too proud to be thought poor; men who are willing to eat only what they have earned, and wear only what they have paid for; men who will appropriate nothing to their own use but what they have obtained by thoroughly conscientious and equitable means; men who regard mankind as one great family, and, therefore, look on War as fratricide on an immense scale, and strive for its abolition accordingly; men who recognise the fact that disinterested philanthropy was the grand and only principle which prompted Jesus Christ to appear on earth and sacrifice his life for man's temporal and everlasting benefit, and, therefore, that the same principle, made manifest in action, is an essential and a prominent characteristic of all his true disciples; men who see and own a brother in every man, no matter how poor, or low, or wicked he is.—Newspaper Paragraph, Revised and Enlarged.—English Leaflet.

BIBLE WORK AMONG THE NEEDY.

Extracts from the Diary of J. H. Mims, Feld Agent of the South-Western Bible Society in Louisiana.

1869. May 3.—Called on a good brother, who informed me of a family of Catholics just below him; "but," said he, "you need not stop, for they will not have a Bible on any terms." I did stop, and sold to the man and his wife two Bibles—one in French and one in English! Another poor French family, living close by, was supplied with a French Bible free. Distributed twelve volumes of the Scriptures this day.

May 8.—Left early, without taking breakfast; made thirteen miles, and arrived in Alexandria, calling on the families as I went in. Found two widows in a house, one of whom had no Bible—the other only a part of an old Bible; supplied them both gratuitously. Met a poor man going out of town, with a daughter in his wagon, who had, just a few days before, become insane. The physician could do her no good, and he was on his way home, fifty miles in the pine woods, without a Bible, and unable to buy one; gave him one in the name of the South-Western Bible Society, which was thankfully received. . . .

May 21.—Started for Pine Island: visited twelve families on the way; seeing an humble cottage some distance off from the road, I called, but the occupants were absent. Taking out a sixty cent Bible I wrote on the fly leaf, "Please to accept this Bible as a present from the S. W. B. S. If you have a Bible, then please to hand it to some one of your friends who is without a Bible;" and left the precious volume on the water shelf, outside the house.

May 22.—Being directed to take the left of my road, I did so; but the "left" road finally dwindled down to a cow-path, obstructed by logs, leading across deep gulches, in one of which I came near smashing my buggy; got into a swamp, no road visible; left my buggy and struck a circle, but found no road; quit the swamp; took to the hills; and after serpentining around deep branches, logs, and thickets for a long time, I espied a fence, made for it, and found a family without a Bible or Testament; they were poor people; gave them a Bible. Met another family without a Bible—another, and another before night—all were supplied, but one refusing.

May 26.—Returning, came to the humble cottage where I left the Bible on the water shelf; found the good lady and the children at home; I addressed them thus: "In passing here a few days ago, and finding you not at home, and fearing yon did not have a Bible, and expecting that it would not be convenient for me to pass this way again soon, I took the liberty of leaving a Bible on the water shelf, and hope you will not think hard of me for doing so." "Thank you, sir," said she—"we did not have a Bible, and were very glad to get one," "Are you able to pay for it?" "Yes, sir, I have some money." The Bible was paid for. At night had preaching and a Bible address; audience full and attentive. Received a donation of $5 for the Bible cause.

May 29. (Sunday.)—The people began to pour in from different directions from ten to twelve miles around. There were seats for 120 people, but we soon found that the house would not contain more than half. Adjourned to a beautiful shady grove near by. After dinner (collation on the ground) made a Bible address, which seemed to interest the people. A collection was taken up for the Bible cause, amounting to $17. I now harnessed up in a hurry and made for an appointment at Holly Grove, twelve miles distant. Roads in a miserable condition. At dark a good number of people came out, and we had a time of thrilling interest.

June 3.—Roads impassable for a vehicle. Mr. C. kindly offered me a good horse; accepting it, and filling my saddle bags with a dozen or so volumes, started in quest of the humble cottages in the wild woods; rode all day through swamps, over hills, along trails, and called on fourteen families, seven of which were without Bibles; supplied them. I had yet to go four miles to an appointment, where I arrived in good time, and found a large congregation of people, many of whom had followed the plough all day; had a Bible address.

Incidents.—"You need not call on Mr. —— and wife; they are infidels, and will insult you; they would not have a Bible on any terms." "How far is it to their house?" "One mile and a half." "I must by all means see them; I should consider my visit to this neighborhood half lost if I were not to call upon them." I went; was kindly received. I found him to be the man who had written to me many months before, begging for a Bible, though he was nearly 200 miles from me. "I want a family Bible," said he,

"and intend getting one as soon as I can raise the money." "You can take this Testament, as a present from the South-Western Bible Society, and read it till you can get a large Bible. Will you read it?" "Thank you, sir; I will read it."

June 9.—Nine miles brought me to Mr. Hathaway's, on Calcasieu River, forty-three miles from Alexandria, where at night we had a congregation at the house of a poor afflicted widow. She had been confined to her bed for ten years, unable to walk; had not heard a sermon in all that time. I presented the Gospel of St. John, in large type, to this poor widow, in the name of the South-Western Bible Society. It was received with thanks and a flood of tears. She has long been an humble follower of Jesus, and says she is waiting for the summons to depart.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH 30, 1869.

Baltimore Yearly Meeting opened on Seventh-day, Tenth month 16th. This body, which may be regarded as parent to the four western Yearly Meetings, although comparatively small, maintains a position of responsibility and usefulness, and is felt as a widely extended influence for good.

Previous to entering upon the transaction of the business, a precious season of quiet waiting upon the Lord was attended with a comforting sense of His gracious Presence in the midst to do His people good.

The following Friends from other Yearly Meetings were present with credentials:

From New England Y.M., Thos. B. Nichols, Phebe R. Gifford, (both ministers,) Rachel B. Nichols, (an Elder.) From Ohio Y.M., Jesse T. Hartley, Edward C. Young, (both ministers,) Eliza W. Young. From Indiana Y.M., Joel Bean and Hannah Bean, (both ministers.) From Indiana Y.M., Robert W. Douglass, (a minister.) From Western Y.M., Ruth Ann Stanton, (a minister,) Robt. W. Hodson, Saml. Hadley, Eliza W. Hadley, (all Elders.)

The reading of the minutes of the last annual assembly was attended with unusual interest, the proceedings including large evidence of religious life and Christian philanthropy. Upon the nomination of the Representatives, the Yearly Meeting united in reappointing Francis T. King and James Carey to the Clerkship.

The subject of Correspondence was approached with a remarkable appreciation of its importance, and with an understanding that it was to receive the deep and deliberate attention of the assembled Church. Accordingly the mind of the meeting was given up, with absorbing and expansive interest, to the world-embracing considerations with which Christians of different lands are exercised in a peculiarly history-making era. By the Epistles now presented, events and tendencies were brought to view such as would have called forth the energies of the first Friends had they occurred in their day:—the national and religious convulsions in Spain; the movements which affect the connections of Church and State; the spiritual enlightenment of prominent men who are in a transition state from popery; the progress of Christianity in Pagan lands; and the increasingly recognized work of the Spirit, both in our own beloved Society and the world at large. The testimony against Slavery was alluded to as having been borne by the different Yearly Meetings, and as having rested like a blessing upon the Church. The work on behalf of the Freedmen was brought into view; also the Peace movement and the Christian efforts for the benefit of the deeply wronged aborigines of this continent. Thus, having given welcome to the gospel messengers from abroad, and having read with earnest attention the Epistles from ten distant churches, the heart of the meeting, so to speak, expanded with unfeigned love of the brethren, far and near, into a preparation to enter, without the selfishness of isolation or exclusiveness, into the business that should come before Friends, as members in particular of the body of Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named. The one meeting which stands self-isolated from the family compact was remembered with a Christian desire that at a not distant time she may cease to say of other members of the body, "We have no need of you," and with a true sense of hunger and of thirst seek refreshment from the streams of love which flow from beneath the altar and gladden the whole heritage of God. At a subsequent sitting Epistles were issued, addressed to all the corresponding Yearly Meetings.

The meeting of Third-day was appropriated to the answering of the twelve Annual Queries, before entering upon which the meeting was baptized into a living exercise for the spiritual health of the body, under which solemn preparation the state of Society was taken up and very solidly conducted. Solemnity, harmony and deliberateness characterized the occasion. The subjects of the several Queries were each considered with a fulness of Christian concern which is embodied in the following minute:

"As the life and prosperity of the Church consist in its nearness to Him who unto it is Head over all things, an earnest solicitude pervaded the meeting that all may perform, with willing hearts, the reasonable service of presenting our bodies before Him, a living sacrifice, waiting, in reverent prostration of soul, for the Comforter whom He has sent to guide us into all truth, and to pour upon us the Anointing required to qualify us for every work of our day. For this it was felt to be essential that the two commands so like unto each other, on which hang all the law and the prophets, be dutifully maintained. Loving the Lord with all the heart, we should love the assemblies of His people and the place where His honor dwelleth, and not merely attend religious meetings because we are concerned thus openly to confess our allegiance, but because we should know that all our springs are in Him, our Saviour and Redeemer, and that an hour spent with those who are truly gathered in His Name, where His presence in the midst is a certainty, a blessed reality, is worth more than any association for the purpose of earthly enjoyment. A living exercise of soul to seek first the kingdom and the righteousness of heaven, will not admit of the neglect of a service acceptable to Him, in which the sincere seeker is not left merely to hope that perhaps His Presence may be granted, but can rest upon the unequivocal assurance, "There am I." When difficulties in the attendance of meetings are surmounted in faith in our heavenly Father and in the drawings of His love, it will be found that He is rich in blessing, ready to hear and to help. Refreshment from His felt presence in the midst will be especially known at such seasons, and, as the door of the heart is opened unto Him, He will come in, and the blessed communion will be experienced which constitutes the true supper of the Lord.

A very solemn conviction prevailed that a preparation of heart should be observed for presenting ourselves before the Most High God, and that we should go to our meetings prayerfully, desiring and seeking a blessing from Him whose hand is full of gifts, and who giveth as a King and as a tender Father to those who as dear children ask of Him in the confidence of loving faith; remembering also that it is the hungry soul that seeks food and is fed by Him who will give meat indeed, and bread from heaven which will nourish unto eternal life. So precious is the flowing of the Divine life from vessel to vessel when they are arranged in order for the service of the temple, that many a true worshipper can say as said the Psalmist, "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go up to the house of the Lord, to the mountain of the God of Jacob;" and being here taught, whether mediately or immediately, of His holy will, ability may be experienced, not only to walk in His paths, but even to run in the way of His commandments.

The value was felt of a gospel ministry whose source is the Anointing; and whilst a high estimate was placed upon the preciousness of silent adoration, and it was felt that worship consists in the intercourse between the soul and its Creator, who for this purpose seeketh spiritual worshippers, it was also felt that if all were faithful, the Spirit's outpouring would render many more sons and daughters fruitful in the field of offering, making others with themselves joyful in the house of prayer.

That love to God which is a preparation for heaven is also a qualification for the fulfilling of the whole Divine law in our earthly walk. This will preserve us as a united people, and will so rebuke the accuser of the brethren that scandal and detraction will be uncongenial to our spirits and foreign to our lips.

In the travail of the Church for the spiritual health of its members, the meeting passed into a concern in reference to the beloved youth, upon whom so many hopes are placed, and for whom so many prayers are raised. A yearning was felt that parents may go in and out before their offspring with a safe and holy example, placing no stumbling blocks or occasions of offence in their way; also that Friends should avoid and teach their children to avoid frivolous and fashionable and dissipating associations, foolish talking and jesting, and pernicious and unprofitable reading, which, if pursued, will be stored in the memory, and even in seasons when the soul is seeking communion with the Lord of life, the tempter will bring up evil images and hurtful sentiments, and trouble if not turn aside the seeking mind.

Friends were encouraged to a diligent perusal and circulation of the Holy Scriptures, upon which our Religious Society has always placed so high a value, insomuch that in its very early days, far in advance of all associations for gratuitous Bible distribution, its discipline required that the families of all poor Friends should be freely furnished therewith.

Friends were exhorted to purity and holiness of life, and to think upon those things which are pure, true, honest, lovely and of good report.

A sense of the great and increasing evil of Intemperance in the land, induced a strong desire that all Friends should be blameless in this respect, and that they should set a safe example to all those within the circle of their influence. A debt in the way of example was felt to be due to those before whom the sn res of life are spread, and to the struggling inebriate who is striving to reform, and who cannot take an occasioual drink of any intoxicating beverage without relapsing into intemperance. Whilst on our own behalf we put up the petition, 'Lead us not into temptation,' let us, in the fear of God and in love to our brother, see to it that we do not present to him, by example or otherwise, a temptation by which his moral power and his capability to reform will be weakened.

A concern was felt for the careful observance of that true Christian simplicity in which so many of our worthy predecessors and contemporaries have been led, and in which they have found safety and peace. How desirable it is that self should be of no reputation, that our adorning should be that which is highly esteemed in the Divine sight, and that we be concerned to seek honor not of one another but of Him who can dignify with immortality and crown with eternal life"

On Fourth-day, the men and women being in joint session, the London General Epistle was read to the comfort and edification of Friends, and fifteen hundred copies were promptly printed in the form of a neat tract for distribution. The minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings were also read, and it was truly instructive to observe that a small number of Friends, having their hearts imbued with love, and in the absence of any opposing element, may be enabled to serve their generation efficiently and according to the will of God. The assigned quotas of this Yearly Meeting for the Indian and the Peace concerns were cheerfully appropriated, and $1,000 was raised by voluntary contribution for the Southern Aid Association.

It has been previously stated in the Review that the valuable property formerly occupied by Baltimore Friends as a meeting house was for a nominal price passed over to the colored people as a Normal School, to which our Friends continue to devote much care. The following Report of the Committee upon the Colored Population was read and approved.

To the Meeting for Sufferings:

The Committee upon the Colored Population of our State, continue to act with the "Baltimore Association for the Moral and Educational Improvement of the Colored People."

This Association has shown no abatement in its interest and labor on behalf of the Freedmen.

It has sustained 61 Schools the past year in Maryland, exclusive of those in the city of Baltimore, employing 64 teachers, and numbering about 5,000 pupils. Besides these Schools the Freedmen's Bureau has 82 Schools and about 4,000 pupils under its care in the lower part of the State.

In the city of Baltimore there are 13 Colored Schools, 39 teachers, and 1,312 scholars, a part of the regular School System of the city, and we are pleased to acknowledge the liberality and care shown by the authorities in their support and efficiency. They have recently raised their grade to that of Grammar Schools.

Besides these, there are about 30 private Colored Schools, mostly for young children—many of these are very small and inferior.

The Normal School is still an interesting feature in this work—the centre of it—and it is entering upon another year, with the promise of great usefulness to the cause of Education among the colored people of our own State, and beyond it. The Normal Class has 70 students; Grammar Class 50; Primary Class 65—Total, 185. An increase of 60 since last year, and there are daily applicants, who cannot be admitted for want of room.

It is proposed to divide the old "Meeting Room," which is retained as a Hall, into additional Class and Study Rooms—reserving a large Room for the Library, now numbering 1,000 volumes. The Teachers consist of a Principal and two Assistants, and two others, who are taken by turn from the Normal Class, for the Primary Department, five in all.

The annual cost of sustaining the Normal School is about $3,100, and the receipts from pupils are about $1,800 per year. It is very encouraging to witness the rapid and satisfactory progress of the pupils of this School in education and deportment. It has been regularly incorporated by the State, and perpetuated through Trustees, for the education of the colored people—the property is valuable, and the corporation is free of debt.

We hope that the good results which have arisen from the instruction of the colored people by the city, will induce the State, at the ensuing session of the Legislature, to incorporate the County Schools into the general State System of Education, and a special effort will be made this winter to effect this. There is a general desire among the colored people of Maryland to be educated and have around them the comforts of a home. They continue to be faithful laborers, and the industrial interests of the State are feeling the good results of emancipation.

We cannot close this report without acknowledging the continued liberality of the Freedmen's Bureau and of our Friends of England and Ireland. There have been periods in the history of this educational effort when it would have been greatly curtailed, or perhaps closed, had it not been for English and Irish aid. The establishment of the Normal School is due to them.

RICHARD M. JANNEY, FRANCIS T. KING,
JAMES CAREY, JAMES C. THOMAS.

Baltimore, 10th mo. 13th, 1869.

Various matters of routine business claimed attention, and the whole transactions were conducted with harmony and brotherly love, as the Lord's work. Under a remarkable solemnity and with a thankful sense of the extension of Divine favor from sitting to sitting, the meeting finally adjourned on Fifth-day afternoon the 21st inst.

Meetings during the week of Baltimore Yearly Meeting.—On First-day morning, the 17th inst., the regular First-day school was held in the basement of the meeting-house. It was an occasion of peculiar interest and of Divine favor. There was hopeful indication that the deeply attentive children were properly impressed with the words of instruction and of exhortation which were given them with peculiar life and fitness.

Two meetings for worship were held in the morning, and one each in the afternoon and evening. The house was on these several occasions thronged to its full capacity with an attentive audience, and the blessed Head of the Church was graciously pleased to care for his work and to commission and qualify his servants therefor. Several Friends were drawn tc visit the State Penitentiary, where 650 prisoners were assembled for worship, and the Gospel was preached to them in the Saviour's love and with demonstrative power. An intimation having been conveyed to leading Friends that a large Methodist meeting-house would be freely placed at their disposal, and the proposition meeting the concern of a minister present with certificate, he went, accompanied by an Elder, and the meeting was held, it is believed, to the honor of truth, the large congregation being profoundly attentive.

On Second-day evening was held the annual meeting of the Southern Aid Association, and the interesting statistics of work (which have already from time to time been laid before the readers of the Review,) were listened to by a thronged audience, which included many citizens of Baltimore, who were evidently impressed by the unsectarian labors of love for the uplifting of all classes in a war-wasted district of country, where industry on the part of the white man has been despised, where agriculture has been inefficient, and education had been interrupted during the years of the rebellion. The results of the disinterested work of the Association are cheering to the patriot and the Christian, and the healthful vitality of Baltimore Yearly Meeting shows that energy is not exhausted by a proper exertion of it, and that they who watered have been watered also themselves.

Third-day evening being set apart by the Yearly Meeting for a public reading of the report of The Associated Executive Committee on Indian Affairs, and for a presentation of the whole subject of the connection of Friends with this work, a large audience listened with profound attention. There being much misapprehension in the public mind, it is believed that many erroneous impressions were removed. Francis T. King gave important explanations. Our Friend Robert W. Hodson of Western Yearly Meeting, who has been engaged in Indian work, occupied part of the time acceptably, and John B. Garrett, one of the Philadephia members of the Executive Committee, being called upon, contributed towards the objects of the meeting, being able to elucidate various points and to give testimony as an eye witness. The meeting closed with a forcible presentation by Robert W. Douglass of the peace question.

On Fourth-day afternoon, by appointment of the Yearly Meeting, those who were not occupied in committee service met in the basement room to wait upon the Lord, desiring His blessing upon the Yearly Meeting and upon the people composing it. It was a season of refreshing from His presence, and under the calming, comforting influence of Divine love His Name was felt to be as precious ointment poured forth.

The large attendance by citizens upon the meetings of Friends having removed much prejudice from some minds, and induced numerous inquiries respecting our distinctive views and the ground of them, Fourth-day evening was appropriated by the committee on general meetings to giving to them that are without a reason for the hope that is in us. The excellent letter of George Fox to the Governor of Barbadoes was impressively read, triumphantly showing his complete evangelical soundness; also various passages from standard writings of Friends. Several Friends with clearness and demonstration offered remarks upon worship and ministry, the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, the "one Baptism," and the true Supper of the Lord. The attendance upon this occasion was only limited by the capacity of the house. A gentleman from Georgia being casually present, was so impressed by the spiritual and scriptural views of Friends, that he resolved to give them further investigation, and made earnest requests for a copy of the Book of Discipline. At the close of this meeting 600 copies of the General Epistle from the last Y. Meeting in London were distributed at the door. A Peruvian Governmental official, having years ago met with a Friends' tract in South America, being in Baltimore, made inquiries for a meeting of "The People called Quakers," and was taken to one of those held on First-day, where, with a heart open to the influences of the Holy Spirit, he perceived that the truth was among them. It is an interesting coincidence and an encouragement to faithfulness, that among the visitors of this Yearly Meeting was the Friend who it was believed, in the course of his tract distribution in South America when travelling on account of his health, left the very missive which went home to this person's heart.

On Fifth-day evening a meeting for public worship was held at the request of our Friend Deborah C. Thomas, and an appointment was made for the following evening, on the concern of Thomas B. Nichols and Dr. Young, at a large Methodist house of worship kindly loaned for the occasion.

FIFTH BIENNIAL CONFERENCE of Teachers and Delegates from Friends' First-day Schools in America is to be held in Philadelphia, commencing 11th mo. 17th, at 4 o'clock P.M. The occasion is a very important one, and we trust it will be blest to many.

A PRAYING CHILD.—In the obituary list this week will be found a record of the death of the child of our dear friend Daniel Hill, a sweet instance of praise perfected out of the mouth of a babe. He was a praying child, and during the absence of his father on an extensive religious journey was daily engaged to put up his innocent petitions on his parent's behalf. On one occasion his simple words were these: "Oh, Lord Jesus Christ, up in the clouds, make father be well, and when he goes away make him come home again and see us!" Quite recently he asked his grandmother to read to him, adding, "and I will pray." She was engaged at the time, and when she was at liberty to attend to the dear child, he said: "I cannot pray now—the Spirit's off." The sentiment thus embodied, that the aid of the Holy Spirit is essential to every act of prayer, it is believed was communicated to him by the Anointing which teacheth all things essential to the Christian's life. During his illness he delighted in the little collection of Hymns for First-day Schools published in New York. How encouraging such an instance to parents to bring the little children unto Jesus, and how sweetly does it speak a lesson to those who are older: "Be ye followers of God as dear children."

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING will open on Second-day, Eleventh month 8th. Our Friend Josiah Nicholson has communicated, for the information of the readers of the Review, the following letter from the Superintendent of the Railway from Portsmouth to Weldon:

Office Seaboard and Roanoke R. R. Company,
Portsmouth, Va., Oct. 15, 1869.

JOSIAH NICHOLSON, Belvidere, N. C.

Yours of 13th inst. just received. All persons of your Society attending Yearly Meeting near Greensboro, N. C., will be taken over the road—round trip —for one fare. I saw Mr. Robinson, President Bay State line, to-day, and he instructed me to inform you that he would take those coming from the north from Baltimore and return at one fare.

Yours, &c., E. B. GHIO.

MARRIED,

In New York, on the 21st of Tenth month, 1869, DAVID S. TABER, of the firm of Augustus Taber & Brother, of New York, and son of Wm. C. Taber, of New Bedford, to ELISABETH U. WOOD, only daughter of William and Mary S. Wood.

At Friends' meeting-house, Chester, (near Westfield,) Ind., on the 8th of Ninth month, 1869, ABEL DOAN to PHEBE LINDLEY, all of Westfield Monthly Meeting.

At Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Tenth month 5th, 1869, HENRY W. SWIFT, of Washington, N. Y., to MARY G. WOOD of the former place.

DIED.

HILL.—At New Vienna, Ohio, on the 14th of 10th month, 1869, in the 4th year of his age, Charles Rowland, son of Daniel and Martha Ann Hill; members of Clear Creek Monthly Meeting.

COPELAND.—In Acworth, N. H., on the 14th of Eighth month, 1869, Winslow Copeland, in his 95th year; a member of Weare Monthly Meeting. He joined with Friends by request; was a burden-bearer in society, and useful in his generation. His simple prayer, "Be merciful to poor old Winslow," we trust was heard and answered.

CHACE.—In Fall River, Mass, on the 27th of Sixth month, 1869, Earl Chace, in his 78th year; a member of Swanzea Monthly Meeting.

RICH.—On the 21st of Ninth month, 1869, Enos, son of William and Sarah Rich, in the 41st year of his age; a member of New Salem Monthly Meeting, Ind. His relations and friends are comforted in the belief that his end was peace.

THE LONDON FRIENDS' MEETINGS AND THEIR ASSOCIATIONS.

Women's Meetings.

"The cause of religion has owed so much in its progress to the faith and zeal of pious women, that it is impossible for a description of any age or period of the church, or particular section of it, to be given without finding this powerful influence to arise into some prominence.

"It would, then, be strange if a narrative of any meetings belonging to a Society, like the Friends, where the female character has been allowed so great a share in the church arrangements, should fail in illustrating this marked feature, especially as the London meetings bear such ample traces of the influence of pious and gifted female laborers upon their history.

"Indeed it is with this that the narrative opens, for it was a woman Friend—one Isabel Buttery—who was alike the first disseminator of Friends' views in London, and the first to suffer in the cause; and though her humble endeavors were soon eclipsed by the vigorous ministry of the north country youths that succeeded, nevertheless their labors only opened up a fuller scope for that important line of service wherein their sisters in the faith became as 'succorers of many' and 'mothers in Israel.'"

The first meeting of women Friends in London appears to have been one held every two weeks for the help of the poor, "to visit the sick and to search out the necessities of the poor weak widows and aged." Gilbert Latey, in an epistle printed in his memoirs, gives some account of their origin. "He takes us back to the 'early days three or four years after the settlement of the men's meeting,' when, on one occasion, some fifteen men Friends were met in their usual fortnightly gathering in an upper room at the Bull and Mouth, there providing for the things concerning the church, when," says Latey, "our hearts were opened, and we enlightened so as to see we wanted helpmeets for carrying on the service;" and they saw clearly "that the women being added to us as helpmeets would answer, for we could no longer do without their help and assistance." So it was agreed two of their number should go off to the house of Gerrard Roberts, where they knew some ministering Friends were assembled, and open up to them this new idea. There they found George Fox with Edward Burrough, Francis Howgill and Richard Hubberthorne, who on hearing the proposal "very well approved and fatherly consented." Forthwith names were taken down of all women Friends thought suitable, embracing "some from every quarter;" and thus, as supposed, the women's Two Weeks' Meeting was formed, the special business being to look after and visit the sick poor, also the general poor of their own sex; to which was subsequently added a care over marriages, so far as for the parties intending to live together as man and wife to come and declare their intentions before them; but no record was made, that being left to the men's meeting.

Another meeting is mentioned having similar objects, but assembling every week, the origin of which is thus described:

"George Fox had been sent for, during one of his visits to London, to see a woman and child in 'Whittchappel' that were both thought to be dying; and though it was as unseasonable a hour as three o'clock in the morning when thus summoned, he immediately went, and records with thankfulness how both mother and infant recovered under his gospel ministrations. Returning from this early service of love, he had no sooner re-entered Gerrard Roberts' house, where he was staying as a guest, than one of the leading women Friends of London, Sarah Blackberry, came in about 8 o'clock to desire his attention, not to any one particular case, but to "complain of the poor and how many poor Friends were in want;" "and the Lord had showed me," proceeds G. F., "what I should do in his eternal power and wisdom; so I spake to her to bid about sixty women to meet me about the first hour in the afternoon at the sign of the Helmet, at a Friend's house (Samuel Vasses, Basinghall St.,) and they did so accordingly, such as were sensible women of the Lord's truth and fearing God. And what the Lord had opened unto me I declared unto them, concerning their having a meeting once a week, every Second-day, that they might see and inquire into the necessity of all poor Friends who were sick and weak, and were in want, or widows and fatherless, in the city and suburbs; and this brought them into the practice of the pure religion, and to visit the sick, and for the relief of the fatherless and the widow, and to see that nothing was lacking among them."

This last meeting became familiarly known as the Box Meeting, from the circumstance of a charity box being kept, into which the women Friends dropped their contributions when they assembled. It appears that both these meetings were maintained until 1790, when there was a joint meeting of "a women's Two Weeks and Box Meeting," and they agreed to meet only once a month,—the first Second-day in every month,—and to try for a more general and regular attendance.

In the monthly meetings for discipline it appears in early time to have been the practice for the women Friends to meet with the men, and share in the proceedings. This continued until about 1753, when women's monthly meetings commenced to be established in London.

FERTILITY OF THE SALT LAKE BASIN.

Dr. Prime, Editor of the N. Y. Observer, is now in California, having gone thus far in a journey around the world. His letters to the Observer are exceedingly interesting. The following description of the fertility of the Salt Lake Basin, Utah, will be read with interest, and we presume with some degree of astonishment, by our readers. Ninety-three bushels of wheat to the acre is certainly a very large yield.

"The vast mountain barrier stretching along the eastern portion of the valley is an immense fountain, streams of the purest water issuing from its sides at every point, and furnishing the means by which this once arid desert has been converted into one of the most fertile plains to be found on the face of the continent. When the Mormons entered this valley, it was like the desolate mountains over which we had passed for hundreds of miles,—a perfect waste of sand and sage bush. Where they got their idea of making it a garden, simply by turning the water upon it, I do not know; but within a little more than twenty years from their first emigration, they have extended a line of farms along the eastern shore of the lake, at least sixty miles in extent,—fams that equal in fertility the finest prairies of the East. We traversed some thirty-five miles of these cultivated fields, and every mile only increased our admiration of the results of this system of utilizing pure mountain water. The most beautiful crops of wheat formed the staple production,—beautiful not alone because they were abundant, but becausr ripened and harvested, so far as they had been gathered, without a drop of rain, the straw and the ear so bright that they shone like silver in the sun. There was nothing that struck me more forcibly in connection with the standing wheat and the stacks which had been harvested, and the straw as it had been cleaned, than this peculiar brightness. The fields of corn and sorghum were standing up more luxuriant and taller than anything we had seen east of the Mississippi, and equal to anything we had seen in Iowa. The orchards were on every farm, and although not extensive, were loaded with fruit, some of it ripening, but the most in about the same stage as at the East in the same latitude. The roadside for the greater part of the way from Uintah to Salt Lake City was a succession of apple and peach orchards; the fruit, especially the apples, of large size, and the trees literally bending to the ground with their burdens."—Journal of Chemistry.

ARABS IN AFRICA.

Anything that throws light on the prevalence of the Arabic language is interesting, as it shows the range for the circulation of those Scriptures, plates of which have been prepared at so great an expense by the American Bible Society. In this view, the following passage from the Missionary Herald is not unworthy of attention:

"There exist near the borders of Liberia, and thence an indefinite distance inland, villages and tribes of negroes who speak, read and write Arabic. Dr. Livingstone speaks of being among friendly Arabs near the Zambesi. He travels with Arabic interpreters all through Central and Southern Africa. These tribes would appear to be superior in culture and civilization to surrounding peoples. They profess the religion of Mohammed, shorn of much of its bigotry and intolerance. They are spreading this religion, by preaching and conquest, through an unknown but vast region of the interior of that mysterious continent. The way is opening for evangelizing them through the Arabic language, by means of men who should be trained for the purpose in an Arabic department of the Liberia College. Such a department does not exist, but should be created by the enlightened liberality of friends of the negro and his evangelization. It may be that a process is going on in Central Africa similar to that by which the many languages and races of the Græco-Roman empire were all merged into one, and made susceptible of evangelization through the Greek tongue."

THE LITTLE SISTERS OF THE POOR.

About the year 1840, there was started in a remote corner of Brittany, a charitable organization, known as "The Little Sisters of the Poor." Its sole capital was the savings of an old servant woman, amounting to a few hundred francs; but Providence blessed the self-sacrifice of the poor woman who founded it. It has spread throughout France and has been the means of relieving a vast amount of human misery. Latterly it has been extending itself to foreign countries, and about a month since some of the Sisters came to Philadelphia, where they opened an asylum for the indigent aged of all creeds, at No. 1631 North Fifteenth Street. Relying wholly upon the benevolence of the community, they have nothing but what may be contributed by the spontaneous offerings of those who may be moved by the simple but sublime self-devotion of the Sisters to their good work. Already they have received thirty-six poor creatures in their asylum, some of whom have beds, while others sleep on straw. Much that is rejected by the rich they turn to account for the poor, and the Sisters make daily rounds to collect the broken victuals on which they subsist themselves and their dependents. Few charities are more deserving than this, for in few is there a more earnest and intelligent effort to turn to account the material that would otherwise be wasted; and in a community like this there should be no lack of persons to contribute old garments, bedding, furniture and food with which to succor the helpless and miserable.—Public Ledger.

THE SPIRITUAL TEMPLE.

And whither came these goodly stones
'Twas Israel's pride to raise;
The glory of the former house,
The joy of ancient days;
In purity and strength erect,
In radiant splendor bright,
Sparkling with golden beams of noon,
Or silver smiles of night?

From coasts the stately cedar crowns,
Each noble slab was brought,
In Lebanon's deep quarries hewn,
And on its mountains wrought;
There rung the hammer's heavy stroke
Among the echoing rocks;
There chased the chisel's keen, sharp edge,
The rude, unshapen blocks.

Thence polished, perfected, complete,
Each fitted to its place,
For lofty coping, massive walls,
Or deep imbedded base—
They bore them o'er the waves that rolled
Their billowy swell between
The shores of Tyre's imperial pride,
And Judah's hills of green.

With gradual toil the work went on,
Through days, and months, and years,
Beneath the Summer's laughing sun,
And Winter's frozen tears.
And thus in majesty sublime
And noiseless pomp it rose—
Fit dwelling for the God of peace!
A temple of repose.

Brethren in Christ, to holier things
The simple type apply;
Our God himself a temple builds,
Eternal, and on high,
Of ransomed souls; their Zion there—
That world of light and bliss;
Their Lebanon, the place of toil,
Of previous moulding—this!

From Nature's quarries, deep and dark,
With gracious aim He hews
The stones, the spiritual stones,
It pleaseth Him to choose.
Hard, rugged, shapeless at the first,
Yet destined each to shine—
Moulded beneath His patient hand—
In purity divine.

Oh, glorious process! see the proud
Grow lowly, gentle, meek;
See floods of unaccustomed tears
Gush down the hardened cheek:
Perchance the hammer's heavy stroke
O'erthrew some idol fond;
Perchance the chisel rent in twain
Some precious, tender bond.

Behold, he prays, whose lips were sealed
In quiet scorn before,
Sighs for the closet's holy calm,
And hails the welcome door.
Behold he works for Jesus now,
Whose days went idly past;
Oh, for more mouldings of the Hand
That works a change so vast!

Ye looked on one, a well-wrought stone,
A saint of God matured.
What chisellings that heart had felt!
What chastening strokes endured!
But marked ye not that last soft touch
What perfect grace it gave,
Ere Jesus bore His servant home
Across the darksome wave?

Home to the place His grace designed
That chosen soul to fill,
In the bright temple of the saved,
Upon His holy hill.
Home to the noiselessness, the peace,
Of those sweet shrines above,
Whose stones shall never be displaced—
Set in redeeming love.

Lord, chisel, chasten, polish us,
Each blemish wash away;
Cleanse us with purifying blood;
In spotless robes array;
And thus, Thine image on us stamp,
Transport us to the shore,
Where not a stroke is ever felt,
For none is needed more.

NOTICE.

The Fifth Biennial Conference of Teachers and Delegates from Friends' First-day Schools in America will be held in Philadelphia, beginning Eleventh month 17th, 1869, at 4 o'clock P. M., for the consideration of the First-day School work and kindred subjects. All Friends interested in Scriptural Instruction are cordially invited to attend.

By order of the Executive Committee.

CHARLES TABER,
WM. G. RHOADS, Secretaries.

Friends living at a distance who propose coming to Philadelphia for the purpose of attending the Meeting of the Biennial Conference to be held on the 17th of Eleventh month next, will confer a favor if they will forward their names and Post-office address to Samuel R. Shipley, No. 111 South Fourth St., Philada., as soon as possible, in order that arrangements may be made for their accommodation.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—Advices from Europe to the 26th inst. have been received.

GREAT BRITAIN.—The Earl of Derby, Premier of the Conservative administration of 1867, died on the 23d inst. in his 71st year. In addition to his political pos tion he attained distinction as a classical scholar, having published in 1865 a translation of Homer's Iliad. As Colonial Secretary in 1833, he introduced the measure for the abolition of slavery which was ultimately passed, and which provided for complete emancipation after an "apprenticeship" of six years, and for compensation to the masters.

Prime Minister Gladstone has written a letter to the President of the Limerick Amnesty Association, on the course of the government toward the imprisoned Fenians. He says they have carefully considered all memorials which have been presented for the release of the political prisoners, and have unanimously decided that such release would be contrary to their duty as guardians of public security and peace. This letter has caused considerable discussion. The London Amnesty Association has protested against its sentiments. On the 24th, a great demonstration in favor of amnesty was made in London. Large processions, including several thousand women, formed in various parts of the city, bearing flags and banners with significant mottoes, and marched to Hyde Park, where an immense meeting was held, at which it was estimated that 50,000 persons were present. The American flag, it is stated, was hoisted and loudly cheered. Speeches were made, some of which are said to have been of an inflammatory character, and resolutions demanding amnesty for the Fenians were adopted by acclamation, after which the people quietly retired. The proceedings were orderly. Great precautions had been taken by the authorities, by assembling extra police and troops, but their intervention was not required. It had been previously reported that the government would suppress the meeting if attempted, but no such effort appears to have been made.

France.—Thirty-seven deputies to the Legislative Body adhere to the manifesto issued by the Opposition members.

A "strike," originating with the merchants' clerks, was rapidly spreading among various classes of workmen in Paris, and to some in other cities.

In view of the threatened irregular meeting of the Legislative Body on the 26th, the government collected military in Paris, although it had been announced beforehand that none of the Deputies would go to the hall on that day. On the 25th, the prefect of police issued a proclamation, informing the people that in view of the proceedings expected next day, and which might disturb the public peace, measures would be taken to insure respect for law, and the maintenance of tranquility, and requesting good citizens not to expose themselves to the consequences that might result from the enforcement of the law against mobs. It was reported that a plot of the Liberals for a rising on the 26th had been discovered, but this was denied by the Liberals. Much excitement prevailed in Paris.

Spain.—The government professed to regard the republican insurrection as almost ended, but precautions against any new outbreak were continued. It was reported that the Captain-General of Cuba had informed the home government that the Cuban and the Spanish insurgents had been in continual and active communication, and had arranged for mutual assistance and encouragement. Reinforcements to the number of 3000 men had been sent to Cuba, and more are to follow next month, the government proposing to use the forces placed at their disposal by the suppression of the insurrection at home, to act vigorously against that in Cuba. It was reported that all the republican leaders captured in arms would be shot, and some executions had already taken place. The Duke of Montpensier had interceded with the Regent for the life of the leader of the revolt at Seville.

The sessions of the Cortes had been resumed. In that of the 23d, Gen. Prim declared that if the approaching Roman Council should adopt decisions hostile in their operation to the Spanish Constitution, the government would treat them as null and void.

Serious differences of opinion on the selection of a king prevail both in the Cabinet and the Cortes, and unless a compromise can be effected, it is thought the establishment of a monarchy is hopeless. Three principal parties in the Cortes have appointed each seven deputies to hold a conference and try to come to an agreement on the subject.

Egypt.—Two international committees are soon to meet at Cairo to regulate the conditions of navigation on the Suez Canal when opened, and to consider to what extent consular jurisdiction is likely to be affected.

The French Empress arrived at Cairo on the 21st inst.

Turkey.—An education law has just been promulgated in Constantinople, making primary instruction compulsory for every inhabitant of the empire, for boys from six to eleven years of age, for girls from six to ten. District and village magistrates are to keep a register of all children of the prescribed age, and if any do not go to school, the magistrate must warn the parent or guardian of his obligations, and if the child is not sent to school within a month, and no valid reason is given for its absence, a fine is to be imposed, proportioned to the parents' means, and the authorities are to take the child to school. The exceptions allowed are, when the child has some constitutional defect; when the parents are poor and would suffer loss from the child's being sent to school; when the child is employed in agricultural labor at harvest time; when the school is more than half an hour's walk from the child's residence, or there is no school in the district, or it is too small to accommodate all the pupils; and when proof is given that the child is taught at home. The primary schools are to be either Mussulman or Christian, according to the predominant religion of the district, but the higher schools are to receive both professions indiscriminately.

Japan.—Advices via San Francisco are to the 29th ult. The Japanese Parliament has voted the surrender by the Daimios of all of their estates, retainers and revenues to the Mikado, receiving from him an honorary title instead of that of Daimino, and an allowance of one-tenth of their revenues, with relief from the support of their old retainers. Most of the Daimios had returned to their own provinces.

Enemoto, the commander of the Tycoon's fleet in the late civil war, had been sentenced to death, but it was thought his life would be spared.

Money matters were in a bad condition, and much suffering prevailed among the poor people in Yeddo who are out of employment, the necessaries of life being very dear. Without relief, it was feared that violence and bloodshed might occur.

The Duke of Edinburgh, second son of the Queen of Great Britain, and an officer of the navy, had visited Japan, and been cordially received, both by the British residents of Yokohama and by the Mikado.

Domestic.—On the morning of the 22d inst., an earthquake was felt throughout New England, especially from Boston northward, and as far east as St. John, New Brunswick. No damage is reported, but the motion was sufficient to awaken persons from sound sleep, to jar doors and windows, and shake movable articles in the houses. Some persons observed two distinct shocks, with an interval of a few seconds. In some parts of New Brunswick, chimneys are said to have been thrown down, and walls cracked. The same phenomenon was perceived in Nova Scotia.

In the case of J. M. Yerger, tried and convicted of murder by a military commission in Mississippi, in which a habeas corpus has been taken out to the U. S. Supreme Court, a decision was given in that Court on the 25th inst. so far as relates to the question of jurisdiction of that Court to issue the writ, the only point which has yet been argued. The jurisdiction of the Court was affirmed.

SUMMARY OF NEWS 175

REPORT TO THE ASSOCIATED EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF FRIENDS ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Dear Friends:—The Committee, (with the exception of Edward Earle) appointed to visit the Agents and Indians of the Central Superintendency, met at Lawrence, Kansas, on the 17th of 7th month last, and remained in that neighborhood until the evening of the 26th, when, according to arrangement among themselves, John Butler and Achilles Pugh proceeded to Topeka, from which place they started next day with an ambulance and a buggy, having engaged William Griffenstine as guide, and James Conly as driver, (accompanied by Thos. H. Stanley) for the Agencies occupied by Brinton Darlington and Lawrie Tatum, both in the Indian Territory. On arriving at the Arkansas river, at Wichita city, we met a messenger with a letter from Gen. Hazen, at Fort Harker, requesting that we should proceed by way of Round Pond Creek, take Brinton Darlington with us, and convey him, by way of the valley of the North Fork of the Canadian river, to Camp Supply, in the neighborhood of which place the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians are located, for whom he is the Agent, and desiring us to explore the aforesaid valley, to ascertain whether a more satisfactory location could be found for these Indians than they now occupy.

In accordance with the above request, we went to Round Pond Creek, or Salt Fork Agency, took the Agent therefrom, and conveyed him as directed, and arrived at Camp Supply on the evening of the 10th of Eighth month. On the morning after, we called on the officers of the Post, and found three members of the President's Unpaid Commission, Felix R. Brunot, Nathan Bishop and W. E. Dodge, who had passed through Lawrence while we were there, and reached Camp Supply by way of Forts Harker and Dodge, and on the day of our arrival had made arrangement with Medicine Arrow, chief of the Cheyennes, conditioned as follows: Medicine Arrow agrees to bring in all the Northern Cheyennes, (dog soldiers, 300 Lodges,) their Lodges, with their women and children, and locate them on the Cheyenne and Arapaho Reservation, if the Commissioners and the military would protect them there, which they agreed to do. On the 11th we visited the Cheyenne Camp, about seven miles below Camp Supply, and a little below the confluence of the Wolf and Beaver creeks, which form the North Fork of the Canadian river. We found 270 Lodges, located in the valley of the river, in a sandy and unproductive region. The children of the tribe were nearly naked, and the tribe generally had the appearance of great destitution, said to be occasioned by the removal of their traders and the long and exhausting wars with the whites and with other Indians, but scrupulously neat with what clothing they did possess. In a short conference held with them, by their Agent and John Butler, they expressed a very feeling wish for the return of some of their brethren, held as prisoners by the whites, and declined making any further promises than had been made to the President's Commission, until their brethren were restored to them. It is our opinion that the return of those prisoners will do more towards the restoration of peace and quiet on the border than any one thing that could be done. . . . . .

After this conference we partook of their hospitalities, and remained with them over night, while the Agent returned with the interpreter to the Camp.

In the morning after breakfast, we started to the Wichita and Comanche Agency, about 200 miles distant, across the Canadian and Washita rivers, passing the site of Fort Cobb, to Fort Sill, on Medicine Bluff creek, among the Wichita Mountains, near which Fort this Agency is located.

At the Wichita and Comanche Agency, we found Lawrie Tatum, at work on his location. He had about 70 acres of land enclosed, and cultivated in corn, &c. A new Agency building was in process of erection, a pretty good store-house, and things generally looking thrifty and like business. . . . If his success should equal his plans and wishes, we may reasonably expect great improvement in the situation and circumstances of the Indians under his charge. About 1,500 acres of prairie land has been broken in different parts of this Agency, in parcels of one and two hundred acres each, for model farms, and he expects to engage the services of farmers enough to plant a part of these lots in wheat this fall, and the remainder in corn next spring, and enclose them with fence, and thus practically to teach the Indians to draw their living from the ground, instead of from the chase. Arrangements were made for his absence from the Agency, and he came to to the States with us, to procure farmers and the machinery for a saw mill, which is much needed.

We understand that inch boards, and they not of the best quality, cost at Camp Sill ten dollars per 100 feet, there being no competition with the one mill near the Agency.

A flouring mill will next be wanted, if the raising of wheat should be a success, and then will be overcome the necessity for transporting in ox teams, for 400 or 500 miles from the railroad, all the corn and flour necessary for the support of men and animals in this far distant country. The precarious character of transportation, if nothing else, would justify Government in sustaining this undertaking.

To explain the above idea about transportation, we will mention one fact. In our outward progress we passed several ox trains that were reported to make about eight miles per day on an average on good roads, with supplies for the Posts and Agencies; on our return we found the same trains, laid up on the prairie, on account of the loss of all the States' cattle employed. Out of six trains, seven hundred head of cattle had died, and more were sick.

From the crossing of the Arkansas river at Wichita city, and indeed from Fort Harker and Junction City, on the Kansas Pacific Railway, to the crossing of the Cimarone or Red Fork of the Arkansas, 250 miles, these ox teams and droves of Texan cattle use the same trail, and it seems that the Texan cattle, although seemingly healthy, and used by all for beef, leave in their wake the seeds of a disease that destroys any cattle raised in the States, but leaves the Texan oxen, if any in the trains, healthy. The disease and the cause of it seems to be as little known in the Indian Territory as here, but the fact exists, and has given rise to laws in Kansas, Missouri and other Western States, prohibiting their being driven through their borders during a part of the year.

While at the Wichita and Comanche Agency we attended a Council held with the neighboring Indians by the President's Unpaid Commission, at which we were much instructed by the speeches of the Commissioners and of the Indian chiefs present. Several of the Indians expressed much satisfaction at having the Commissioners with them, and also a wish to endeavor hereafter to walk in the white man's path.

Satanta,* a Kiowa chief, made two speeches, which were said to be characteristic of the man, who is a daring and restless personage; he said "he took hold of that part of the white man's road that was represented by the breech-loading gun, but did not like the corn ration, it hurt his teeth. He said the good Indian, he that listened to the white man, got nothing; the independent Indian was rewarded."

The Commissioners answered, that the Indians would get no arms or ammunition, but that they would be protected if they came on the Reservations and remained there, but if they left them without leave they would be punished; also saying, that the buffalo crossed the Reservations twice a year—that is enough.

From our observation and conversation with the Indians throughout our journey, we are prepared to say that it is our judgment that it would be economy in Government to resume the issue of the sugar and coffee ration. It is the opinion of all the chiefs that we have conversed with, that much difficulty will be experienced in retaining the Indians on their Reservations without such issue. The Indians object decidedly to the corn ration, and wish its value furnished in flour.

On our return from Fort Sill, we, by appointment, met at Sugar Creek, in the Washita valley, some of the chiefs of the Wichitas and Caddoes, tribes somewhat advanced in civilization, who told us that they were very desirous of having schools established among them; and also spoke of the uncertainty of tenure by which they held homes in the Territory, no portion of which had been set apart for their especial use. The Reservation is assigned to the Kiowas, Comanches and Apaches, but the Wichitas, Caddoes and probably the Waccoes are not mentioned as having any rights there, and perhaps no place else, which sometimes occasions much concern among them. They greatly desire that the Government may assign them a home; and they also desire that their annuities may hereafter be paid them in money, as they are paid to the Pottowatomies and others.

We desire to acknowledge the kind and generous hospitality of the commander and officers of Fort Sill. While we were at the Wichita and Comanche Agency, our John Butler was taken sick and required the services of a physician, which were kindly given by Dr. Forwood, Post physician, and Lieut. Harmon generously tendered the use of his quarters in the Camp, for our accommodation, and we were introduced to their mess house for our meals; all of which conveniences and services were furnished us free of cost.

In closing this brief account, we desire to commemorate the goodness and mercy of our Heavenly Father, who has wonderfully preserved us from dangers both seen and unseen in our perilous journey; and to whom we are indebted both daily and hourly for undeserved benefits, continuously bestowed upon us. May the cause for which we have labored be blessed to the saving of many from temporal suffering, and to the extension of the kingdom of Christ on earth.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL CONFERENCES.

[These lines in reference to a similar occasion are copied for the Review, as appropriate to the appoaching First-day School Conference in Philadelphia.—Communicated.]

"These conferences are not a three days' religious pastime, they are a renewed consecration of ourselves and all we have to Him who purchased us with His own blood. It is a solemn thing to gather together in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to tell our Father in Heaven that we are prepared to take up our cross and follow Him fully. We hear much of the dangers that threaten the Church of God from external foes, but if my heart 'trembles for the Ark of God,' it is because her lamp of testimony burns dim, and luxury, pride and love of money have defiled her holy places.

"Will you pray that all who shall assemble with us next month may humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, and come forth in His strength a people not ashamed to confess that they are 'pilgrims and strangers on the earth,' for they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country."

BE YE PERFECT.

That is, be going on to perfection. Indulge no imperfections. "Therefore be ye perfect," it reads, which shows that it is the summing up of what goes before: "Love your enemies. Bless them that curse you. Do good to them that hate you; and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you," etc. These are among the hardest exercises of Christian perfection, and yet from the context we see it was just these our Lord had in view when He gave the precept we are considering. On a certain occasion when He was giving some like precepts to His apostles, telling them they should forgive an offending and repenting brother seven times a day, they could only exclaim, "Lord, increase our faith," as if they had said, "Master, we can follow Thee in many things, we can receive much of Thy sayings, but this is a measure of duty to which we confess our faith has not yet attained." What did Christ say to them? "If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed, you might say unto this sycamore tree, Be thou plucked up by the roots and be thou planted in the sea, and it should obey you." That is, as we may understand His words, if your faith be a living thing, growing and becoming stronger—like the vast tree unfolded from a little seed—if you believe nothing too hard to overcome which I bid you overcome, you will find things easy which now seem impossible; you will be able to forgive seven times a day; you will say to the mountain of pride which is now the impassable barrier of your unbrotherly hearts, Be thou gone, and it will obey you.

Take that precept which is the great stumbling-block of Christian practice: "Resist not evil: whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also." When we read this, how do we treat it, if perchance we seriously think of it as a precept to be obeyed? We try to see how it can be explained—that is, explained away. We are sure it cannot mean what the words literally imply. That would be unreasonable. The Gospel is made for man, not man for the Gospel. At length, by the help of some ingenious commentator, we arrive at the conclusion that after all no extraordinary or very difficult virtue is required. But it is virtue extraordinary and by no means easy to resist not evil—to prefer being struck again, rather than return the blow; not from any cowardice, from mere tameness of spirit or native impassivity, but from obedience to the Master. This is not what every Christian can do with his present measure of grace, but it is what every Christian should believe he may become able to do, honestly making the endeavor and earnestly seeking the indispensable help, if as a true-hearted disciple he sincerely desires in this great feature of resemblance to be like his Lord; if he sees the beauty of such holiness and sets his heart upon it, and especially if he regards a temper so conformed to Christ as one of the best signs of a state of grace. Let the disciple feel that he is not to slacken his diligence in practising those higher exercises of faith. Let him understand how faith worketh by love, love of his brother as well as the love of God, and he will not feel so confident of his salvation as long as he cannot "forgive his enemies, do good to them that hate him, and pray for them which despitefully use him and persecute him." The reason why we so feebly attempt any such perfection, why we are so prone to dilute our Saviour's precepts until we bring them down to our own practice, is not that we are so firmly persuaded of their impracticability, not that we are convinced they are utterly beyond us (for we are conscious that we have never made a hearty trial of them): it is rather because our desires for that kind of goodness are so feeble; because we have no hearty admiration of it, and are not quite persuaded what is Christian perfection, or, as we might prefer to say, evangelical perfection. We are zealous in an easier kind of religion. We are too content with good feelings, with pious emotions. We satisfy ourselves with sighing over our sins, without mortifying and killing them. We mourn over our deficiencies, but fall back on the consolation that we are not to be saved by our merits. We commend brotherly love; and if we know we fail in it, we remember that it is less than faith, which we are right sure we do have, although it is written, "Love is the fulfilling of the law." We are doctrinally sound on justification by faith without works; practically forgetful that works must justify faith. We lament over depravity in general, and excuse ourselves in the particular manifestations of it, satisfied with groaning over ourselves as miserable sinners. "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," we are ready enough to say with St. Paul; but can we go on and say with him, "By which I am crucified unto the world and the world unto me"? Salvation by the cross includes the life of the cross, as well as reliance on the cross. But, alas! how are they separated; nay, the latter is made a substitute for the former. Sure we need teaching in evangelical ethics as well as evangelical doctrine. Certainly St. Paul thought so in his Epistles.—The Living Church.

INSTITUTE FOR COLORED YOUTH.

The managers of the "Institute for Colored Youth" desire to lay before their friends the following statement respecting the important institution under their care.

It is believed that the usefulness of the Institute would be materially increased, and its professed object, that of preparing skilled and efficient teachers, be accomplished much more fully than now, if the following studies are added to the present course, viz:—Anatomy and the closely allied subjects, Physiology and the Laws of Hygiene, a knowledge of which is of especial importance to the colored race in this country; Natural Science as exemplified in the branches commonly called "Philosophy" and "Chemistry;" and a thorough and regular course of Normal Instruction.

The demand for good colored teachers, especially for the South, is now very great. Of the 57 students who have graduated since the opening of the Institute, 42 now are or have been engaged in teaching, and the proportion of teachers from the recent classes is much greater than this. A large number of scholars who have not completed the full course, and who have therefore not received diplomas, have also been usefully engaged in the great work of educating those of their own race. The very great importance of providing well qualified teachers, not only for the Southern States, but also to take charge of schools for colored children in all parts of our country, is so manifest as to require no comment.

The principal obstacle in the way of introducing the improvements above referred to, is the inability of the Institute with its present income to meet the increased expenditure that would be rendered necessary thereby. It has been the aim of the managers to study strict economy in the administration of the school, and they have endeavored by the consolidation of the boys and girls into mixed classes, by the employment of a large proportion of female teachers, and in other ways, to reduce the expenses within the narrowest possible limits consistent with a judicious and enlightened prosecution of the important work, but notwithstanding this care the expenses have slightly exceeded the income during each of the last two years.

Nearly all the pupils in attendance are in limited circumstances, and are really unable to contribute more than the present almost nominal payment of ten dollars annually, text books being furnished them gratuitously.

From its foundation the Institute has been the recipient of many pecuniary favors from those interested in the elevation of the colored race, and the managers see no other way to provide the means for defraying the cost of the proposed improvements but to call once more upon their friends for assistance.

The sum required will, it is believed, amount to more than one thousand dollars annually, to meet which it is proposed to solicit annual subscriptions. A collecting committee of the Board has been appointed and has already commenced its labors. We desire therefore to commend the subject to the attention of our friends who have heretofore so liberally aided us, believing that they will not refuse to furnish the assistance necessary to carry into effect the improvements so manifestly desirable.

On behalf of the managers,

SOME THOUGHTS ABOUT THE FRIENDS.

This Christian Society now stands discriminated before the public for a great work of humanity, for the faithful discharge of which they must feel deeply responsible. They and their history have now become an object of interest to the public greater than at any previous time. I would here advert to the past but to give faith and confidence for the future. I incline not to praise, for praise is dangerous even to the best of our human nature; but I would tell the truth, that Friends may be duly encouraged and the public believe in their integrity and efficiency in the great work now devolved upon them.

I would speak irrespective of the divisions that took place among them forty years since, from which we have been in the habit of dating their decline and loss of influence and usefulness, and of even forecasting the end of their mission. I weekly read all their periodicals issued in Philadelphia, and one from Glasgow, in Scotland, and am thereby kept well posted as to their doings. I have conceived fresh hopes of their future usefulness and preservation, and would impart my conviction in the hope that I may afford some encouragement to a conservation on which much of the world's welfare depends.

Those not familiar with the history of Friends have little conception of the power they have exercised as a leaven in the world's reforms. They are counted but by thousands, but have done more than millions of the average of mankind; and have done this, keeping clear of politics, by moral influences. The most active Friends, influenced and instructed by Benezet, Woolman and Dillwyn (Americans), concentrated effort by a standing committee of twelve, of whom nine were Friends, another Clarkson, and persevered for more than the third of a century from the beginning of their labors in London, until the slave trade was abolished by Parliament; and there followed in due time, as a consequence, the abolition of slavery in all the British dependencies. The Friends of England are numbered at about thirteen thousand souls.

The Friends in America had taken steps long before to bear a testimony against holding slaves, and that testimony and its good work never receded until slavery was abolished in all our northern States. Their testimony sunk deeply and spread widely into the minds of the people of the north, until the cause was taken up by more aggressive champions, and it culminated in a sacred resentment, amounting, sometimes, almost to a phrenzy.

It was represented by Abraham Lincoln, in the Presidential chair. The slaveholder in that election heard the knell of the downfall of slavery, and had the madness to precipitate the event. True Friends could take no part in the war of the rebellion, for they could not violate their profession of peace and testimony against war. But very many of their young men volunteered to uphold the government, hoping thereby the destruction of slavery, and all Friends rejoiced when they beheld that Providence had so overruled events as to bring an incalculable good out of seeming pervasive evil.

Friends, as religious bodies, both north and south, maintained their peace principles; but how different their treatment. In the severest exigencies of the war no Friend at the north suffered in person or property. For this they and the nation owe a debt of gratitude, that should never be forgotten, to Lincoln and Stanton. At the south the Friends suffered severely, both for their loyalty and their fidelity to their principles. The highest confederate officers had owed to a Friend the best part of their education, and had not the excuse of ignorance; yet in the south Friends were stripped of their property, and personally cruelly maltreated when conscripted for military service. There, as in their early history, they endured their great wrongs in the spirit and patience of the Christian martyrs.

When the slaves were freed by the progress and successful termination of the war, the concern of Friends was awakened to new and yet more active duties. The freedmen were to be cared for in homes, clothing, provision and education, and these objects have found many devoted Friends and other Christians to give to them their time and means, at risk of health and life. The friends of Friends looked upon this demonstration with great interest, as affording the evidence that there was yet the ancient life of the Society existing in all who profess the name, yet to work and devote themselves in the great field of human right and humanity, against wrong and oppression. We looked upon it as the evidence of a yet living power in these Christian bodies, giving hope and promise for their future vitality, even with greater interest than was felt for the immediate objects of relief, though that was regarded as a great and good work of humanity.

But none of us looked further in the future for them than that they would continue to do good in a quiet way and limited spheres, as they had been wont to do; to set good examples at home, and do kindly service among their neighbors; to fill some local offices as guardians of the poor, prison inspectors, or of school directors, with integrity, and without any compensation to tempt the politician; to authorize their preachers to travel in the ministry, giving freely, that they freely receive; mostly among Friends, but sometimes among other peoples in more of a missionary spirit, as we have seen them recently quietly going to Norway and Sweden, the Shetland and Orkney islands, to Palestine and India.

JUSTICE TO THE COLORED PEOPLE.

The Society of Friends having long been the faithful advocate of the colored people when in slavery, will, it is hoped, still protect their rights now that slavery has been destroyed. There is still a lingering disposition with many persons to thrust them down into a degraded position. There are certain privileges of which in a Christian community they ought not to be deprived, and cannot be without great injustice. Having been so long stripped of these privileges, it appears to be especially incumbent on us of this Society, to give them a fair chance, more particularly in relation to education and fitting them for the business and duties of life. They have been for so long a time shut out from nearly all the better class of schools, that it would seem particularly unjust to continue this wrong, on the plea that they are ignorant, when we, the community, have ourselves made them so. It is not claimed that they are better or worse than other people in their conduct, for there are good and bad in all classes, and hence the special reason why conduct, and not color, should be our standard for measuring them.

Many years ago, when the writer was quite young, he was forcibly struck by seeing a well-dressed and remarkably well-behaved young colored man kept outside of a stage-coach on the driver's seat, exposed to inclement weather, while partially intoxicated and profane men, with alcoholic breath, were allowed to occupy the partly vacant seats within. Since then, many similar cases of injustice have been witnessed — where ordinary civility and common comforts have been denied—simply because an all-wise Creator had given them a different complexion. The feeble wife of a colored clergyman was compelled to occupy the deck of a steamer on Long Island Sound, on a wintry night,—the exposure resulting in her death. Even since the commencement of the late war, the well-known Harriet Tubman, now living at Auburn, N. Y., was forcibly thrust out of a rail-car in New Jersey, and made a cripple for months,—although at that time employed by the Government under President Lincoln, and rendering important services in hospitals. The writer of these remarks is familiar with a recent case where a pious young colored woman, of excellent character and ample means to pay her expenses, was admitted into a seminary of learning which she went to attend, only on condition that she took her meals and lodging in the "wash-house," although colored domestics, occupying, however, a menial position, had been permitted free access. I mention this case to show the still lingering disposition to deny privileges and means of improvement, and to heap indignities on a greatly-wronged people. It is not single instances like this that are so hard to bear, but that continued succession of them from all sources: and it was this that extorted the remarks from a well-known colored member of our Society, and a minister in past years, that he would be willing to undergo the tortures of being flayed alive, if by this means he could be freed from the reproaches, taunts and insults which he met with on every hand.

It is to be hoped that members of the Society of Friends generally, while themselves so ready to do right by this people, may be ready also to plead with others against this remaining remnant of a cruel despotism. It may be well to ask these the question, against whom they are bringing the censure, in punishing an inoffensive people for having a colored complexion? The colored people did not give themselves this peculiarity—it was done by Him "by whom all things were created that are in Heaven and in earth." On whom therefore does the censure rest? We may well startle at the answer. It was of the afflicted and destitute that He said, "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it not to me." Yet many of the afflicted and destitute doubtless became so to some extent by their indolence and crimes; but for a colored skin, none are responsible save Him who made them. It would therefore seem especially appropriate to apply the blessing to such as had afforded relief to these, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

While we rejoice that so many are now ready to do right by these people, while many schools are opening for their relief, and the Government is admitting colored clerks and employees, there is still much disposition to thrust them out from just privileges, and it is therefore earnestly hoped that the members of our Society may avail themselves of every right opportunity for their assistance and protection. MANUFACTURE OF ICE.

BY S. J. GUMMERE, A.M.

During the past week, the citizens of Philadelphia have had an opportunity of observing a most interesting process, the manufacture of ice by artificial cold. The machine used for this purpose, and which has been in successful operation at the foundry of J. P. Morris & Co., is similar to that invented by Carré several years ago, though with some important modifications and improvements.

The agency employed to effect the requisite reduction of temperature is the sudden conversion of a liquid into the gaseous form. This change of form is necessarily attended by a great absorption of heat taken from contiguous bodies. We all have practical knowledge of the fact that evaporation is a cooling process. When any portion of the body is wet and exposed to the air, a decided sensation of cold is perceived. In general, the more rapid the evaporation, the more noticeable is the cooling effect. A well-known and beautiful experiment, which may be performed with a good air-pump even in the hottest weather of summer, is the freezing of water by its own evaporation under the exhausted receiver.

With liquids more volatile than water, as alcohol and sulphuric ether, a greater degree of cold may be obtained; but by far the most powerful refrigerating effects are derived from those substances which under all ordinary conditions exist in the gaseous form, and which only become liquid when subjected to a pressure far exceeding that of the atmosphere. Nearly half a century ago Faraday succeeded in reducing several of the gases to the liquid form by setting them free from their combinations in very strong glass tubes bent in the middle and hermetically sealed, the condensation being effected by their own pressure in the confined space, aided in some instances by the application of freezing mixtures to the outside of the tube.

By the sudden expansion of these liquified gases when relieved from pressure the most intense cold is produced, sufficient in the case of carbonic acid gas to freeze a portion of the liquid acid itself.

In the apparatus of Carré the gas employed is ammonia. The common aqua ammoniæ or spirits of hartshorn is subjected to heat, by which the gaseous ammonia is separated from the water, and passing into a strong iron vessel, it is under a pressure of about half a dozen atmospheres reduced to the liquid state. From this reservoir the ammonia passes, as it resumes the gaseous form, through a number of tubes contained in a large tank filled with brine, which is thus cooled many degrees below the freezing point of pure water. The water to be frozen is contained in large tin vessels or moulds immersed in the brine. The liberated gas, after doing its work of refrigeration, is again united to the water from which it was separated, and is thus made to pass continually through the apparatus in a constant circuit.

It is seriously claimed that the loss of material is so inconsiderable, and the consumption of fuel so small, that this manufactured ice can be brought into competition with the natural product, even in such climates as ours. The actual cost of the ice with the machine now in operation was stated to be about four dollars per ton.

At the time of my visit the machine was in full operation to the great gratification of numerous spectators. The covers being removed from several of the vessels containing the water to be frozen, we found in some the water yet entirely liquid; in others the freezing process had just commenced at the sides, while in others the whole mass was solid. These last were removed from the tank, and by the application of warm water to the outside of the vessel, the ice was liberated in beautiful crystal slabs of about three feet in length by one foot in width and three or four inches in thickness.

THE ORIGIN OF PETROLEUM.

The origin of combustible volatile and liquid mineral products, such as gas, oil, tar, asphalt, is still an open question. The presence of large beds of anthracite coal leads to the suspicion that oil was derived from the distillation of bituminous coal by volcanic action. Explosions in coal mines indicate that gases can be produced in the beds of coal without the aid of heat; and according as these gases have a vent to escape, or are under heavy pressure, can they remain volatile, or form liquids. Petroleum usually occurs in porous fossiliferous limestones, or in such sandstones as are evidently of marine origin. This has led geologists to look upon petroleum as of animal origin; and recent observations in Egypt have served to sustain this view.

There are in Egypt natural petroleum springs now in actual formation. The coast of this land consists of coral beds. The coral animal grows toward the sea, but dies out on land, leaving a porous lime-rock behind. In the cavities of this rock oil collects which is derived from the decomposition of the polyp coral, and is collected and used by the inhabitants for many purposes. Vast beds of coral would yield a proportionate supply of oil; and this is now considered by many to satisfactorily account for the oil springs and asphaltum lakes of various parts of the world. They were once coral beds of ancient seas, and the oil is of animal origin.—Journal of Applied Chemistry.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH 6, 1869.

The First-day School Conference in Philadelphia.—The Review has ever been an advocate of schools for Scriptural instruction. As six days of the week are given to schools devoted, in the main, to secular teaching, (though the day-school ought to be a place of Christian training also,) the First-day of the week by general consent is appropriated to direct religious and Scriptural instruction, and results have followed, the value of which it is quite impossible to over-estimate. In turning attention at this time to the subject, the fact lies open to view, that the First-day school has become a prominently recognized Institution in the Religious Society of Friends, organized within most of its congregations, and fostered with care by nearly every Yearly Meeting. We know not that there is more than a single exception, and within the borders of that Yearly Meeting the system flourishes and has been eminently blessed of the Lord. The developed talent, the Christian self-abnegation, the yearning and the labors for the highest good of our youth which are due to this movement within our denomination, are cheering and are truly remarkable. In the successful establishment of a First-day Normal school, Friends have taken the initiative. It is no longer a question whether we shall have First-day schools. Their statistics are spread upon the minutes of every Yearly Meeting save one, and their results are telling upon our future men and women; nay, of many who are now influential in the Church's counsels, the characters were moulded, in part, in these schools.

It becomes then an object of very high importance that Friends' First-day schools should be conducted in the best manner. To this end the teachers love to compare their experience, and they can well appropriate the prophetic words, "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another." Hence we find, during the weeks of Yearly Meetings, the houses thronged with earnest Friends whose hearts are in the work, the Yearly Meeting itself appropriating a convenient time, that the attention given to the subject may be complete; for Friends who are themselves upon the downward slope of life, know well that the children (whom the Psalmist emphatically declared to be an heritage of the Lord) are "the beauty of the present and the hope of succeeding time." It does not follow that a school will be profitable because it is held upon the First-day of the week, but the self-sacrifice involved would scarcely be incurred without a desire to do good, and if this desire be cherished in the Divine fear, with a continual prayer for the help of the Holy Spirit, good will not, we think, fail to result.

Of course Friends' First-day schools should be conscientiously conducted in accordance with the principles which characterize us as a Christian people. It is with this understanding alone that we advocate them. We have seen them thus conducted in various parts of the United States. We have seen ministers, elders and overseers meekly lending themselves to this labor of love, harmoniously joining with their fellow members of varied stages of mental and spiritual development.

Holding these views, we welcome the approaching Conference in Philadelphia. Does the question arise whether an attachment to the truth as held by Friends will be promoted? We trust that it will, and that the reality of our Christian profession will be apparent to all, its efficacy put to the proof, and the army of teachers encouraged to rally to the standard of "Primitive Christianity revived." From generation to generation the Truth is unchangeable, yet in its advocacy each successive period may have its special mission. May all be faithful to the work of their own day. Whilst we believe in our principles, let us trust one another. The object is worthy—the motives sincere—the laborers earnest. Remember, Friends, that we have "a banner to be displayed because of the Truth." Unfurl it, and let it float over the council of teachers, inscribed with no mottoes foreign to the principles of Fox, Penn, Barclay, Story, Gurney, Forster and Grellet, meanwhile remembering that, (to quote the words of our own poet,)

"The white wings of the Holy Ghost Spread, seen or unseen, o'er the heads of all."

E. K. P., the Friends and the Indians.—We copy from the North American a paper written by a prominent member of the Philadelphia bar. It contains much that will be acceptable to our readers. On one point we could wish he had spoken explicitly: the limited extent of Friends' jurisdiction over the Indians. An idea prevails with many that the whole 300,000 Indians in the United States are under the charge of our people, and under this impression we shall be misjudged and the value of peace principles under-rated, when rumors are received of "Indian outrages," though these be the result of continued outrages upon the Indians by fraudulent traders and agents who persist in the old system. It were well for the public to understand that there is only one Superintendency under the jurisdiction of our religious body, and one under that of the Society claiming the same name with us and equally attached to the principles of peace.

The essay of E. K. P. has been written under a generous and good impulse, and it is calculated to be of service.

We trust that there is in the general mind a readiness to afford to the successors of William Penn fair opportunity to test the efficacy of Gospel principles in their application to the children of the forest. We ask of our fellow-citizens their Christian sympathy in the great responsibility which has come upon us unsought—we ask of our fellow members the co-operation of their prayers and their liberality, (for our Agents have need of funds beyond those afforded by Government)—and we humbly and reverently ask of the Father and Lord of the red man and the white that He will endow our laborers with wisdom and fidelity, and with His blessing, without which their efforts must be unavailing.

Ohio Y. Meeting.—In the 4th No. of the current volume we commenced an account of this Yearly Meeting. The letters intended to complete the history have failed to arrive, which is regretted, as we are not enabled to give the life coloring of the picture, and must be limited to the mere statistical details of the printed minutes, just received. We are, however, verbally informed that the Yearly Meeting and the meetings for public worship were held to the honor of Truth, and that brotherly love and Christian fellowship prevailed, the unity of the Spirit being kept in the bond of peace.

The Representatives were all present, and a committee of Adrian Quarterly Meeting, who were bearers of a minute of that meeting, requesting incorporation with Ohio Yearly Meeting, which was now consummated: the full assent of New York Yearly Meeting being given in a postscript to the Epistle from that body. Ten ministers from other Yearly Meetings were present, (all save two with credentials,) and five other Friends (mostly Elders) accredited as companions. The London General Epistle was received with the appreciation due to that excellent and instructive document, and, as before stated, a reprint of 1300 copies was ordered. Respecting the Epistles received from the various Yearly Meetings, the following record was made:

"The reading of these acceptable communications has again brought us under a feeling of the blessed unity and fellowship with our distant brethren, in the love of the gospel, of which these precious tokens are the lively evidence."

Upon nomination by the Representatives, the Yearly Meeting united in the appointment of Jonathan Binns and Geo. K. Jenkins for Clerk and Assistant Clerk.

The consideration of the state of Society, as presented in the answers to the Queries, introduced the Yearly Meeting into a living concern for the true spiritual well-being of its several members, which was embodied in the following minute:

"While the state of Society was under consideration, as well as at other times during the deliberations of this meeting, much tender counsel and wholesome advice were extended by dear Friends, concerned for the prosperity of the church and the growth of all the members in grace, and in that knowledge of the Truth as it is in Jesus, which, through the guidance of the Holy Spirit, would lead us in the way cast up for the ransomed and redeemed of the Lord to walk in. Then would love prevail in our hearts; love to Christ our Saviour, and love unfeigned to our brethren. If our hearts are pervaded with this love, it will give us the highest motive for attending our religious meetings. There are many inferior motives that may induce such attendance, but if we hope to be benefited thereby, the one great animating power should be a deep and abiding love of Him who first loved us, and gave Himself for us, and knows our great need of His divine assistance; and who has left His gracious promise for our encouragement, that 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them.' Let us meet together in this love, under the influence of this exalted motive, sincerely waiting, and with prayerful hearts seeking for the arising of that life which comes by the power of God, and gives ability to perform acceptable worship unto Him. Then dulness and drowsiness would not be felt in our meetings. The unction would flow as from heart to heart, and refreshing from the presence of the Lord would be our portion.

"There never was a time when the Society of Friends were more loudly called upon to uphold and maintain, in its purity, the standard of spiritual worship before the surrounding world. There is much commotion among the churches, and many seem to be returning to a dependence on the 'weak and beggarly elements' for a hope of salvation. But we believe that this fundamental principle of the religion of Christ, so prominently held forth by our religious Society from its rise to the present day, is essential to the preservation of the church on the immutable foundation, to the enlargement of her borders, and to her final victory over the powers of darkness and death.

"Let each of us, then, feel and realize our responsibility in this important matter. We cannot lay it on the ministry, or any other portion of society. We all have a part of the burden to bear, a part of the work to do. And our Heavenly Father is ready to bestow help from the sanctuary and strength out of Zion to them that ask in faith, dedicating themselves to His service.

"A deep concern was felt for the religious training of the dear children, the lambs of the fold—a class which received the especial notice and blessing of our Saviour when he walked on this earth, and who are still the objects of his tender love. He desires that they should still be brought to him, that He may bless them, and carry them, as it were, in his bosom. How fervent, then, should be our endeavors to point them to Jesus the Saviour of the world; to instil in their tender hearts the living principles of his gospel, with prayer that they may take root and bring forth fruit to his praise.

"In the work of training the beloved children to love their Saviour, and grow up as plants of his right-hand planting, it was believed that First-day schools for scriptural instruction are efficient instruments. And parents and elder Friends were desired to attend those schools regularly, and give them the aid of their counsel and encouragement.

"Our Saviour declared that the Holy Scriptures were they that testify of Him. How important then that we and our children should be thoroughly acquainted with their testimony. There we find opened the Divine plan of Salvation by the blood of Christ for a lost and ruined world. And there we are assured of the gracious and inestimable gift of the Holy Spirit to every soul to profit withal, that will submit to its purifying operations and enlightening influences; whereby they will be enabled to overcome the temptations and escape the snares of the wicked one. Whether it be in the reading of the pernicious publications that so much abound, or in associating with frivolous and corrupt companions that lead in the ways of sin, or in suffering their minds to be carried away from the simplicity that accompanies a real acceptance of the principles of the gospel in the heart, into the adoption of many of the vanities and follies of an unstable world.

"Put on therefore, dear children, 'the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil.' For we hope better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, not only to yourselves, but to the world. For the fields are white unto harvest, and laborers, earnest laborers are called for, that they may go and work for the Lord.

"We feel comforted in believing that the sin of tale-bearing and detraction is much discouraged amongst us, yet it was feared that there is more of it, even among the members of the church, than we are aware of, and Friends were exhorted to guard vigilantly against this potent wile of the enemy of our souls; remembering the declaration, 'Whoso privily slandereth his neighbor, him will I cut off.' And Friends were cautioned against entertaining and circulating disreputable reports against particular individuals, communities or religious bodies, condemning them without a full knowledge of the circumstances. If a brother be overtaken in a fault, endeavor to restore such an one in the spirit of meekness. There is a freedom in Christian love which will give no offence, when we approach such an one for his good, and labor with him privately and faithfully, and whether we gain our brother or not, we shall have peace in our own souls.

"The scourge of intemperance, which is spreading its baleful influence over our fair land, carrying sorrow and desolation in its course, was feelingly alluded to; and Friends were earnestly exhorted to keep themselves clear of complicity with it in every sense, and to embrace every fair opportunity to bear our testimony against the use of all intoxicating liquors, and do what they can to stay its progress.

"It was much cause of regret that some of our dear Friends have not seen their way to follow the advices of this meeting, which have been issued from time to time, in relation to the daily reading of the Holy Scriptures in their families, under a solemn feeling of their constant adaptation to our every state, through the influences of the Holy Spirit.

"Striking instances were given of the blessed effects of a perseverance in this practice, and Friends who have not adopted it were again tenderly advised to commence, under a sense of their solemn responsibility, that they may no longer deprive themselves and their children of these opportunities for receiving the good seed into their hearts.

"In order to counteract, as far as practicable, the evil influence of corrupt books and publications, which the enemy of all righteousness is sowing broadcast over the land, Friends were advised to supply themselves with religious tracts and publications, in order to distribute them when travelling or visiting, and on other occasions where opportunities are afforded. The enemy is making busy use of the press to lay waste the heritage of God. Let Christians therefore use the same powerful instrumentality to turn back the tide of iniquity, and let their voice be heard through the land, hoping for the fulfilment of the promise: 'The Lord shall comfort Zion; he will comfort all her waste places; and he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord.'"

Deaths of Ministers and Elders were reported as follows:

Isaac Lloyd (E.) Short Creek Mo. Meeting, 3d mo. 1st, 1869, in his 75th year.

Lydia Bailey (M.) Flushing, 6th mo. 18th, 1869, in her 68th year.

Daniel Wood (M.) Alum Creek, 9th mo. 24th, 1868, in his 80th year.

Lawrence W. Butler and William Daniel were appointed members of the Meeting for Sufferings, in the place of Eli Haines and Benjamin Stanley, deceased.

Statistical reports showed a membership of 1704, and that 26 had ceased to be members, and 41 new members had been received. Two Monthly Meetings failed to report, and the members of Adrian Quarterly Meeting, now annexed, were not included; so that the actual membership of Ohio Yearly Meeting must be more than double the number here given.

Explicit direction was given to the Quarterly Meetings to give annual report of the number of their members, of families and parts of families, of receptions and disownments, and the number of Friends "who are in the daily practice of reading a portion of the Holy Scriptures with their families collected, and the number of those who do not."

"Under a weighty concern for the advancement of the cause of Christ amongst us, and for the spiritual growth of our members in that which pertains to a heavenly life," a joint committee of seventy-five Friends was appointed "to visit and render such assistance to our subordinate meetings as they may be enabled to afford, and to visit families and individual members as way may open for; and also to attend to such other religious labors as best wisdom may point out for the benefit of the church and the advancement of the cause of our holy Redeemer."

The minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings were read and their proceedings approved. The Indian question, as here presented, has already been laid before the readers of the Review.

A memorial concerning our beloved Friend Rebecca T. Updegraff was introduced by the Meeting for Sufferings and approved. The minute in the case says:—"We trust that the bright example thus impressively brought before our view may be a fresh incitement for the renewal of covenant with our God, and dedication of body, soul and spirit to His service." We hope ere long to be favored with this interesting document.

The report of the Executive Committee on the Freedmen showed satisfactory devotion to their important duties. Three schools and a night school and three First-day schools had been conducted at Jackson. The Penitentiary had been visited nearly every First-day, and the religious needs of the convicts ministered to in various ways in Christian love. The sum of $2000 was appropriated to their use in the succeeding year. The Treasurer of said committee reported the receipt from the Monthly Meetings since last year of subscriptions amounting to $824.15.

The following clause was adopted to take the place of the 5th paragraph on page 63 of the book of Discipline:

"In order that our meetings for discipline may be kept suitably select, it is advised that none but members be allowed to sit therein, except by permission of Elders or Overseers."

The following report on the subject of Peace is here given, being substantially the same as presented to the different Yearly Meetings:

"The Standing Committee on the subject of Peace report that the subject has claimed our attention, and that several meetings have been held within the limits of the Yearly Meeting, a large number of tracts distributed, and the subject presented in various ways for the consideration of the thoughtful and candid citizen. And we feel that the presentation of it has met with a response of inquiry, and in a good degree of acceptance, quite cheering and encouraging; and that as the mind is led to investigate the causes, many of them exceedingly trivial, which have given to the world the fearful accompaniments of war and its deplorable results, we are fully satisfied that the Peace movement will gain the confidence and support of every true disciple of Christ.

"We herewith submit the report of the Executive Committee, and recommend that our quota of the proposed appropriation be raised, believing that no demand is made upon our benevolence as Christians that is fraught with more vital interest to the church militant, in bringing an acceptance in its fulness of the declaration of our Lord and Saviour, that on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets. First, that 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.' And the second, that is like unto it, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' 'God is love.'

"Necessity for war is the plea; expediency the rule. All its attendant evils are admitted and lamented; a way of escape is craved. It is eminently the duty of the Christian to point it out. Light is wanted; it is his privilege to be instrumental in affording it, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, through the presentation of the truths of the Gospel of the Prince of Peace.

On behalf of the Committee.

WM. J. HARRISON, Sec. pro tem."

REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE ON PEACE.

To the Acting Committee of Ohio Yearly Meeting:

DEAR FRIENDS: In submitting our second annual report, we gratefully acknowledge the goodness and mercy of our Heavenly Father for his continued blessing to us of health and ability to work, although in an humble and quiet way, in this important part of his great harvest field. We feel indeed that in this important branch of the Master's work, the harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few. But we trust that many prayers are being put up to the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth more laborers into his harvest. Nor are these prayers in vain. The evidences of an increasing interest in the cause of Peace are almost daily coming to light both in this country and in Europe.

A recent writer in the Herald of Peace [an English periodical,] who was nearly five years in the army in the late bloody conflict in this country, says:—"I feel a debt of gratitude to the Herald of Peace I can never repay, in having shown me how very inconsistent with the Christian profession is an advocacy of any war. The world wants an interpretation of Scripture that knows no glory save that in Christ—no honor but that of serving Him; that shall know no boundaries, no countries, no peoples. We fall short of comprehending the grandeur of Christianity when we can halt at an imaginary line crossing a continent. There is something yet to be attained that shall envelop all the people of the earth in a common brotherhood under all circumstances. That is love, Christ's love."

Another man, who was a captain in the army in the late war, sent an order for tracts and documents on Peace, saying he thought the present a favorable time to circulate them.

The American Peace Society has been revived since the war, and is now actively at work, disseminating tracts and documents, and through a number of active agents, lecturing and spreading light on this great subject. And although not taking the same high ground that we do in relation to all war, is no doubt accomplishing much good. There are one or two other peace organizations in this country, and several in Europe, actively at work. The Secretary of the London Peace Society has been elected a member of Parliament in England. Several other peace men are also in the same body. A Peace League has been organized in France, which embraces eminent men in Germany and Switzerland.

All these are cheering indications, and cannot fail to encourage the Friends of Peace everywhere. It becomes Friends, who, as a religious body, have always borne a testimony against war, not to relax their efforts because others are coming up to their help, but rather to work with renewed energy and vigor. "For as much as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

The Executive Committee met in New York in Fifth month last, and reorganized by appointing Robert Lindley Murray, President, Daniel Hill, Secretary, and Murray Shipley, Treasurer.

The committee united in recommending to the different Yearly Meetings embraced in the association, to raise the sum of five thousand dollars, the present year, for the use of the committee, in the same proportion that the first ten thousand dollars was raised. This sum when divided between seven Yearly Meetings, and then subdivided between the individual members, amounts to a very small sum indeed to each one, and yet when collected, in the aggregate, it makes a sum large enough to enable the committee to do an immense amount of work.

We have had the following tracts and documents stereotyped, namely:

Scripture Testimony on Peace	12	pages.
Gurney's Essay on War	24	"
Chalmers on Peace	11	"
Universal Peace. Bogue	24	"
Sumner's Oration	100	"
Defensive War. Henry Richard, M. P.	16	"
Arbitration as a Substitute for War	4	"
War as a Judicial Redress	4	"
Four Aspects of War	4	"

Making 199 pages of plates altogether owned by the committee. It costs about one cent per every ten pages for paper, printing, folding and stitching, after we have the plates. We have had several thousand tracts published, which have not been stereotyped, and have purchased a large number adapted to our work from other associations.

Since our last report we have sent out from the office at New Vienna 618,337 pages of Peace matter. They have generally been sent by mail from two to eight hundred pages in a package, mostly on orders. But a number of parcels have been sent to ministers and other influential persons, and they have gone to all parts of the land, from Maine to California.

We know not what may be the result of this seed sowing, but we have faith that the "Lord of the seed-field will take care of his own, and the world shall yet reap what our sowers have sown."

We have been trying to secure the services of some able man as general travelling agent, to go before the institutions of learning in the country, and especially theological seminaries, where young men are preparing for the ministry, and press upon their consideration the claims of the cause of Peace; but we have not yet been able to secure the services of such a man.

We have had no recent reports from the acting committees of the different Yearly Meetings, but we learn, through other sources, that most or all of them are more or less actively engaged in the work.

If we succeed in securing a good general agent, he can probably spend at least one month within the limits of each Yearly Meeting in the Association.*

On behalf of the Committee.

8th mo. 31st, 1869. DANIEL HILL, Secretary.

P. S.—We have taken measures to supply the students at all Friends' colleges and institutions of learning with peace documents, and all the children attending our First-day schools with peace tracts especially adapted to children.

After due consideration a change was made in the time of holding the Yearly Meeting, which is set forth in the following minute:

"That the Yearly Meeting open by a meeting for worship at 10 o'clock A.M. on Fifth day preceding the first First-day in Ninth month; followed by the meeting of Ministers and Elders at 3 P.M., same day. Meeting for Sufferings at 8 o'clock, and Yearly Meeting for discipline at 10 o'clock on Sixth-day morning.

"That all business sittings of the Yearly Meeting commence at 10 o'clock A.M. and close at about 1 o'clock P.M. That at the first sitting of the Yearly Meeting a committee be appointed to propose to next sitting the names of suitable Friends for all the known committees that may be required. And that all our members may be brought into the service of the church, it is suggested that, as far as practicable, the same Friend shall only serve on one committee at the same time. That 3 o'clock P.M.

* Robert Walton Douglass, of Wilmington, Ohio, has been subsequently engaged.

of the day on which any committee is appointed, shall be the time for the first meeting of the same, which may afterwards meet on its own adjournments."

The Report upon the Boarding School says:

"The committee charged with the prosecution of the suit before the District Court, at the term holden at Steubenville, commencing on Ninth month 29th, 1868, inform that the parties to the suit met at the time appointed; and after the failure of another effort to effect an amicable adjustment of the conflicting claims, the evidence having been presented on both sides, the Judges of the District Court referred the whole case, with the evidence offered, to the Supreme Court of the State, for its adjudication and decision."

The Committee on Education reported 660 children of suitable age for school, (this, it will be understood, does not include those in the State of Michigan, who will be embraced in next year's report,) of whom 56 have attended Friends' schools, 7 in family schools, 423 at public schools. There are 22 First-day schools —number of pupils enrolled 1115, average attendance 730—members enrolled 673—adult pupils 208. There are 98 teachers—7 libraries, with 1407 volumes—4 Bible classes—5 meetings without First-day schools.

Liberal subscriptions were made to the Baltimore Southern Aid Association.

The following correspondents were appointed for the Mo. Meetings in Adrian Quarter:

For Adrian Mo. Meeting, Joseph Gibbons —Address, Adrian, Mich.

For Raisin Mo. Meeting, Peleg C. Haviland. Address, Adrian, Mich.

For Rollin Mo. Meeting, Wm. Beal, Rollin, Lenawee Co., Mich.

For Ypsilanti Mo. Meeting, Edward Gorton, Ypsilanti, Mich.

"Under an humbling sense of the favor of our Heavenly Shepherd, in that He has been pleased, in His loving kindness, during the sittings of this Yearly Meeting, to spread over us His overshadowing wing of mercy and Divine compassion, enabling us to transact the various important concerns that have come before us in condescension and brotherly love, the meeting adjourned to meet at Damascus on Fifth-day preceding the first First-day in the Ninth month next year, if the Lord permit."

THE PRACTICAL FARMER AND RURAL ADVERTISER.—We have wished for some time to call attention to this good Monthly, edited and published in this city by our friend Paschal Morris. A reason for doing so at this time is found in its enlargement by eight additional pages, making it a periodical of 24 pages four columns wide. It is well printed, liberally and usefully illustrated with engravings, and full of valuable practical matter. Did space admit, we would more frequently give extracts both from this and from the Country Gentleman, edited by our friend John J. Thomas. The farming interest is of vast importance, and the business of Agriculture ought to command a high order of intelligence. In this the welfare of our country is largely concerned. The Farmer should be a thinking, a scientific man, and a dilligent reader of Agricultural papers. When we visit our country cousins and find that they are subscribers for both the above named papers, we are not disappointed in looking for the results.

THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST. — This also is one of our valued exchanges. The nnmber for 11th month lies before us, rich in pictorial illustrations. We notice with pleasure its advocacy of timber planting for the Prairies. The need is great for buildings, fences and railways; for fuel, fruit and shade. Millions upon millions of railway-ties will be rendered necessary by the decay of those just laid, before new timber for the purpose can be grown. Tree-culture is an object which should claim the attention of western landowners.

INSTITUTE FOR COLORED YOUTH.—Attention is called to the address on behalf of this Institution. Its claim is strong to unqualified approbation and liberal support.

DIED.

REYNOLDS.—In Guilford Co., N. C., on the 2d of Tenth month, 1869, Almira, daughter of Lewis and Mary H. Reynolds, in the 23d year of her age; a consistent member of Centre Monthly Meeting. Through the mercies of a crucified Redeemer she was enabled to bear her sufferings with patient resignation, and leaves the consoling evidence to a wide circle of friends and relatives that her end was peace.

WILSON.—On the 21st of Seventh month, 1869, in the 31st year of her age, Rachel, daughter of Joseph G. and Hope Wilson; a member of Westfield Monthly Meeting, Indiana. Her personal traits were endearing to an unusual degree. Preserved in patient resignation during a protracted illness, the constant breathing of her spirit seemed to be, "Thy will be done;" and as the time of her dissolution drew near, she seemed like one girded and waiting for the coming of her Lord. A few days before her death she remarked, "I feel that my work is done—that I have nothing to do but to wait: whether I live or die all will be well."

NEWHALL.—On the 2d of Ninth month, 1869, at his residence in Lynn, Joseph P. Newhall, in his 47th year; a valued member of Salem Monthly Meeting, Mass. This dear Friend had for several years given evidence of his faith in the gospel of the Lord Jesus. His walk amongst men in all the duties of a citizen was marked by that high sense of justice and right which belongs alone to the humble Christian; and in the Society of which he was a prominent member, his solid deportment and his sound and discriminating judgment caused him to be regarded as a safe and prudent counsellor by both young and old; while in his family his tenderness, patience and gentleness, mingled with a firmness based on deep religious conviction, commanded the esteem and love of all around him. While Superintendent of the First-day School in the Meeting to which he belonged, many were the opportunities of sowing the seed of the kingdom, and in no case was he known to shrink from the full performance of his duty. He bore his sufferings—which in great mercy were not severe—with patience and Christian resignation, and looked calmly forward to the time when he would be at rest with joy and not with sorrow; and a few hours before he fell asleep, he said to a dear friend, "I am almost home." Calmly and gently he slept in Jesus. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

NOTICE.

The Fifth Biennial Conference of Teachers and Delegates from Friends' First-day Schools in America will be held in Philadelphia, beginning Eleventh month 17th, 1869, at 4 o'clock P. M., for the consideration of the First-day School work and kindred subjects. All Friends interested in Scriptural Instruction are cordially invited to attend.

By order of the Executive Committee.

CHARLES TABER, Secretaries.
WM. G. RHOADS,

Friends living at a distance who propose coming to Philadelphia for the purpose of attending the Conference, will confer a favor if they will forward their names and Post-office address to Samuel R. Shipley, No. 111 South Fourth St., Philada., as soon as possible, in order that arrangements may be made for their accommodation.

The Local Committee desire to extend a cordial invitation to all Friends who are interested to come.

Friends coming from a distance to the Conference are informed that by paying full fare east over the Pennsylvania, Philadelphia and Baltimore, Reading, Catawissa, Richmond and Danville and Richmond and York River Railroads, also the Philada. and Erie and Pittsburg, Columbus and Cincinnati Railroads, and all stations on the Panhandle route except Chicago, they can be supplied with free return passes, signed by the Secretary of the Conference R. L. Murray, No. 152 Broadway, New York, will have round trip tickets to Philadelphia, good for all members of the Conference, at four dollars each. And application has been made to the Fall River line for commutation tickets between Boston and New York. Thus travelling facilities are engaged as far south as Greensboro, N. C., and west as Chicago, Ill.

A Stated Meeting of the Female Society of Philadelphia for the Relief and Employment of the Poor will be held at the House of Industry, No. 112 North 7th St., on Seventh day, the 6th inst., at 3½ P.M.

JULIANNA RANDOLPH, Clerk.

FRIENDS' FREEDMEN'S ASSOC.—A Special Meeting of the "Friends' Freedmen's Assoc." will be held at the Arch St. Meeting-house, Philada., on Third-day, Eleventh mo. 16th, at 8 o'clock, P.M.

Friends generally and others interested in his work are invited to attend.

3t JOHN B. GARRETT, Sec'y.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WINONA, COL. CO., OHIO, 10th mo. 18, 1869.

Dear friend Wm. J. Allinson.—In the last No. of the Review, at the close of the News Summary, it is said the late storm at Eastport, &c., was predicted on scientific grounds by Lieut. Saxby, in Twelfth month last. The N. Y. Tribune said a short time since that the German scholar Falb predicted the late earthquakes on the South American coast perhaps more than a year before their occurrence, also on scientific grounds. Now this seems to be a new field. A prediction of an earthquake and a hurricane on a plausible scientific basis is something of exceeding interest.

I take the liberty of asking if thou can give us in the Review an account of the principles on which these predictions were founded. It is an application of the principles of science which would surely be new to most of us, and no doubt welcome to a large portion of that class of readers for which thou spreads a bountiful table. Let us have a plausible, intelligible explanation of this great theory.

Truly thy friend, CHAS. WILLIAMS.

[We handed the above letter to our scientific friend Samuel J. Gummere, and received the following reply.—ED.]

My dear friend W. J. Allison.—In regard to the subjects referred to in Chas. Williams' note, I would say that I do not think there is any reason to believe that either the late storm at the North or the earthquake at the South was really "predicted on scientific grounds."

A tide of somewhat unusual magnitude was indeed announced as sure to occur at a specified time, from the circumstance, easily ascertained by inspection of astronomical tables, that the various conditions of lunar position, &c., would then be such as to produce almost the greatest possible effect in elevating the waters of the ocean. A great storm did indeed occur about the time of this high tide, and it seems to have been supposed by many that the two phenomena were connected, and that the prediction included both.

Nor does it seem to me that we are justified in attaching much importance to Falb's asserted prediction of the earthquakes. If a person reasoning clearly from the known laws of Nature should be led to some hitherto undiscovered result, and should in consequence thereof predict a remarkable event as certain or as likely to occur at a definite time in the future, either the failure or the verification of the prediction would justly claim the attention of men of science. But a prediction based on what seem to be mere fanciful views of material laws and influences, needs to be very exactly fulfilled in relation to time and place and circumstance, or to be approximately fulfilled in repeated instances, before much weight can be attached to it.

In both these matters mistaken views have no doubt been pretty widely spread from vague, inaccurate and sometimes absurd statements in the public papers. As an example, I give from the "Press" of to-day the following extract referring to the very subject under consideration:

"The recent violent upheavings occurred while the moon was about half way from the earth and was seven days old, and Prof. Falb's theory has not been demonstrated."

What is meant by the moon's being "half-way from the earth" it is hard to imagine; but a more ludicrous instance of perversion of scientific statement of fact by the newspapers occurs to me as I now write. About thirty-five years ago, when magneto-electricity was a new science, Prof. Henry, now of the Smithsonian Institute, successfully repeated the experiment first performed by Faraday, of obtaining electricity from the magnet. A Virginia editor, having evidently mistaken the word magnet for another of nearly similar sound, thought himself justified in employing an euphemism in his account of the interesting fact, and consequently informed his readers that Prof. Henry had obtained an electric spark from the Horse-shoe worm.

Thy friend, S. J. G.

Muscatine, Iowa, 10th mo. 11th, 1869.—Our dear English Friends Henry Binns and Wm. Robinson have just attended the meetings at this place: having visited the meetings in Wisconsin and Minnesota belonging to Iowa Yearly Meeting, and those in Winneshiek Co., they have now gone to Springdale. They seem "determined to know nothing among us save Jesus Christ and him crucified."

Pennsylvania, 10th mo. 23d, 1869. . . . Our Redeemer, who knew all things, and in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, declared that "a house divided against itself cannot stand." I often reflect on these words of the Lord, and believe them to be true. I have been at Baltimore Yearly Meeting, where I was made glad from day to day when the hour arrived which summoned us to go up to a house which was not divided, and where the fruits of the Spirit (against which fruit there is no law) are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith.

Falmouth, (Eng.) 15th of 10th mo., 1869.

My dear friend Wm. J. Allinson.—I read with much interest thy leader in the last received Review, on the recent money panic on your side of the Atlantic. How different the gambling spirit that led to those sad results, from that of him who could say: "The half of my goods I give to the poor"—which met the especial approbation of his Lord and Master—"To day I must abide at thy house."

I understand that our dear Friend Sarah F. Smiley has been able to resume her work in Scotland, and we hope to have the pleasure of seeing her in Cornwall before the end of the winter. Thy friend, very sincerely,

THE FIRST-DAY SCHOOL TEACHER.

. . . . Go—speak to Jesus first;
Then to the child. Go, let Him speak to thee
Who taught on earth in Judah's waning days
On mountain slopes, along the pebbly beach,
And on the joyous billows of the sea.
Yes, in the closet hear His voice who spake
As never man did speak. Ask for His mind
Whose patience bore the burdens of a world.
Ask trustingly; the promise is to thee:
Thou shalt receive. Then meet the child as one
For whom the Saviour died. That ransomed soul—
God knows—it may be given thee, to lift
The little fledgeling to an angel's seat.
O! touch not heedlessly the chords that thrill
To gladness or to woe. Lay gentle hands
On things that tell the tale in other worlds.
Go—speak to Jesus—wait His answering word:
Then tell the trusting child like one who comes Transfigured from the mount of prayer. . . .

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—European dates are to the 1st inst.

Great Britain.—W. E. Gladstone has written a letter to the Council of Dublin, expressing his satisfaction and that of his colleagues at the approval given by that city to their conduct in regard to the Irish Church legislation in the last session of Parliament, and acknowledging the solemn obligation he is under to deal to the best of his ability with other subjects affecting the welfare of Ireland. With respect to the Fenians, he says it would have been more agreeable to the government to give effect to a desire for clemency founded on the most honorable motives; but he reviews the whole subject and gives reasons for denying amnesty. Sir John Gray, M. P., has assured the Council that he knew the Premier was determined to settle the land question in the same effectual manner in which he had settled that of the Church, and to abolish the exterminating policy of the landlords.

The weather in England has been unusually cool for the season, and reports of frost and ice came from various parts of the kingdom.

Ireland.—The Dublin Amnesty Association, at a recent meeting, unanimously adopted resolutions expressing regret at Gladstone's refusal to release the Fenian prisoners, and declaring their determination to continue agitation, and to form local associations throughout the country.

A public meeting at Cavan on the 30th ult. adopted resolutions condemning any Parliamentry bill for Ireland which may not provide for the finity of the land tenure.

France.—The 26th ult. passed over without any disturbance in Paris such as the government professed to apprehend, and had taken precautions to prevent. Troops had been concentrated in the city, and Gen. Bazaine had been directed to employ artillery if necessary to keep the streets clear. During the day, the Emperor passed through the principal streets in an open carriage.

The Ministers, it is said, have decided not to prosecute the papers for any recent violations of the press laws.

Spain.—Several preliminary meetings of members of the different parties in the Cortes, were held on the 29th, to discuss the question of the choice of a monarch. In that of the Progressists and Democrats, 102 voted for the Duke of Genoa, (a nephew of the King of Italy and a youth 16 years old), and 2 for the Duke of Montpensier; in that of the Unionnists, all but 2 voted against the Duke of Genoa; in the total vote, 122 were given in his favor, and 44 against him. Whether these proportions would be maintained in a formal vote in the Cortes itself is not certain. A late report is that 141 Deputies are pledged to vote for him.

The deputies for Porto Rico, who had petitioned the government to refrain from special legislation for that colony at present, have since withdrawn the request, on receiving satisfactory explanations as to the intentions of the Ministers.

The budget which has just been laid before the Cortes, shows a financial deficit for the current year of 520,000,000 reals, about $26,000,000. In the estimates for next year, an excess of receipts over expenditures is anticipated, amounting to $500,000. The poll tax is to be suppressed and civil salaries are to be reduced 20 and clerical ones 30 per cent.

Italy.—The Italian government reserves the right to reject the decisions of the Œcumenical Council, if found opposed to the laws of the country and to the spirit of the age.

Turkey.—A Paris journal asserts that a widespread conspiracy has been discovered in the Turkish province of Albania and Herzegovina, connected with a recent outbreak of insurrection at Cattaro in the Austrian province of Dalmatia. Several persons implicated have been arrested. It is reported that the governments of Austria and Turkey have agreed to act jointly in suppressing the insurrection.

The Emperor of Austria arrived at Constantinople on the 28th ult., and was received with much ceremony by the Sultan.

Egypt.—The International Commission, to decide on the question of jurisdiction in the matter of the Suez Canal, opened at Cairo on the 29th. The Egyptian Minister of Foreign Affairs was made President. The American Consul, not having received any powers from his government, was not present.

Cuba.—A decree of the Spanish Cortes establishing unrestricted liberty of religion in Cuba and Porto Rico, has been promulgated and gone into effect in those islands. The document is liberal in its terms. It declares that Spain cannot remain removed from the general movement in Europe and the world, and adds that this consideration is more powerful for the Antilles because they lie near a continent where liberty of religion is recognized by law. One clause provides that no person shall be prevented from holding office under the government by reason of his religious belief. The decree is said to have been received with satisfaction by the populace in Cuba. No important event in connection with the insurrection is reported.

Sandwich Islands.—The labor question has been creating much excitement, and numerous meetings have been held. The planters favor the importation of Chinese, while the commercial and laboring classes urge the encouragement of European immigration, and all agree that an additional supply of labor is necessary for the agricultural interests of the country.

Domestic.—The statement of the public debt for the 1st inst. shows an aggregate of $2 649,654,744.-26; amount in Treasury, in cash and bonds purchased, with accrued interest, $188,523,554.90, leaving the excess of debt over funds on hand, $2,-461,131,189.36, which is a decrease since last month of $7,363,882.75, and since Third month 1st, of $64,332,070.65.

The steamboat Stonewall, from St. Louis for New Orleans, was burned on the 27th ult., about 125 miles below the former city, and of about 250 persons on board, not more than 50 or 60 are known to have been saved. The fire caught in some hay, either from a candle carelessly handled by a deck passenger or from some one smoking, and the deck load being largely composed of that article, in a few minutes the boat was enveloped in flames. Neither boats nor life-preservers were at hand, and in attempting to run ashore, the boat grounded in five or six feet of water. Most of those saved were taken from the water by another boat.

A case was decided in the U. S. Supreme Court on the 1st inst. in which a promissory note had been given for part of the purchase money of certain land, at Montgomery, Ala., in 1864, when the authority of the national government was excluded from that district, and the only currency in use was "Confederate" treasury notes. It was claimed by the defence that the debt was to be paid in such notes, and that the creditor was not entitled to relief in U. S. Courts; and in the Court below, the case had been dismissed on that ground. The questions before the Supreme Court on appeal were: 1. Can a contract for the payment of Confederate notes, made during the rebellion, between parties in the insurgent States, be enforced in U. S. Courts? 2. Can evidence be received to prove that a promise for the payment of dollars was actually for the payment of other than lawful dollars of the United States? 3. Does the evidence on record show that this note was to be paid, by agreement, in Confederate notes? The Court decided all these in the affirmative, holding that the "Confederate" government was a government de facto, to the extent of actual supremacy, however unlawfully gained, within its military lines; that its notes must be regarded as a currency imposed on the community by irresistible force, and that contracts for payments in that currency, when not shown to have been made with intent to aid the rebellion, are without blame, and should be enforced to the extent of their just obligations. The judgment of the Circuit Court was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The Commission appointed under a joint resolution of Congress, to examine the construction, equipment, &c. of the Union and Central Pacific railroads, has reported to the Secretary of the Interior, giving, in general, a very favorable account of both roads, as, in most particulars, fulfilling the requirements of the law. Some deficiencies are pointed out, where embankments should be widened, trestle-work replaced by permanent embankments, and bridges strengthened to bear the greatest weight possible to be put upon them. The amount necessary for these and other improvements is estimated at $576,650 for the Central, and $1,586,-100 for the Union Pacific road. Both are represented as well equipped, the stock being in excess of the present and immediate future needs of their business.

EMORI NOLO: MORTUUM ME ESSE NIHIL ÆSTUMO.*

BY T. HODGKIN.

I.

One wrote of old, "The struggle of this dying
Is all I dread:
I shall not heed when men above me, sighing,
Say, 'He is dead.'"
Not in such words, oh Father of our Spirits,
Speak we again:
A fear, a hope each child of us inherits,
Making them vain.

II.

Awful the hour, and shall be through the ages,
That closeth Life;
With the worn Soul the weary Body wages
Self-torturing strife.
Till far, so far from loving eyes around them,
One journeyeth lone,
And that close wedlock that for years hath bound them
Ends with a groan.

The pale still Form, so late so dear a treasure,
Its fate we know;
The Dust, the Worm, its depths of ruin measure
Where it lies low.
But the vast doubt wherewith our souls are shaken
Outlasts the tomb!
"Where, in what regions shall the Wanderer waken, Gazing on whom?"

III.

Father! I live or die, in this confiding,
That thou art King;
That each still Star above me owns thy guiding—
Each wild bird's wing.
That Nature feels Thee, great unseen Accorder
Of all her wheels,
That tokens manifest of thy mightier order
Her strife reveals.
And that without Thee not a wave is heaving
Nor flake descends,
That all the giant Powers of her conceiving
Are thy Son's friends.

IV.

Yet, I beseech Thee, send not these to light me
Through the dark vale;
They are so strong, so passionlessly mighty,
And I so frail.
No! let me gaze, not on some sea far reaching Nor star-sprent sky,
But on a Face in which mine own, beseeching,
May read reply.
For more than Poets' song or Painters' seeing
Of fiery Hell,
Thrills me this dread of waking into Being Where no souls dwell.

V.

Such was my cry: hath not the mighty Maker
Who gave me Christ,
Hath he not granted me a sweet Awaker
For the last tryst?
Given a Son who left the peace unbroken
That reigns above,
That he might whisper God's great name unspoken,
The name of Love!

VI.

Have I not known him? Yes, and still am knowing,
And more shall know;
Have not his sweet eyes guided all my going,
Wept with my woe;
Gleamed a bright dawn-hope when the clouds of sadness
Made my soul dim,
And looked their warning when an alien gladness
Lured me from Him?

* "Dying I abhor: I care nothing about being dead." Translated and adopted by Cicero, in his Tusculan Disputations, I. 8, from Epicharmus, the Sicilian comic poet. The circumstances of Cicero's death are well known. Epicharmus died at the age of 95. Sir T Browne (Religio Medici) erroneously attributes the sentiment to Cæsar.

VII.

Lord, when I tread this valley of our dying,
Sharp cliffs between,
Where over all, one ghastly Shadow lying Fills the ravine,

E'en then, thy kingly sceptre being o'er me,
I will not fear,
Thy crook, my Shepherd, dimly seen before me,
My way shall clear.

And when the grave must yield her prey down-stricken,
When sleep is o'er,
When the strange stirs of life begin to quicken
This form once more,

Oh Son of Man, if Thee and not another
I here have known,
If I may see Thee then, our First-born Brother,
Upon thy throne,

How stern soe'er, how terrible in brightness
That dawn shall break,
I shall be satisfied with Thy dear likeness
When I awake.

LOVING WORDS FROM LIFE.

"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

Dear Christian Friends.—The importance of the above words has lately come before my mind with great power, and I have been led to inquire whether, as Christians, we sufficiently estimate their force. They are several times quoted by our Saviour as being more binding on his followers than they were under the old law. He amplifies and enlarges upon them, showing how the term "neighbor" was not to be restricted to a man's friends, but, in the true character of Divine love, was to be extended to those whom we might even consider our enemies. The apostle Paul refers to it as the very fulfilling of the whole law. Now, dear friends, let us try to ascertain what this "loving our neighbor as ourselves" really means. I am convinced that, if we could only carry it out in the spirit in which Christ intended, we, as Christians, should have a power for good in the world, which as yet we know nothing of. We are apt to forget the fullness and strictness of Christ's law, which in spirit far exceeded the old law. For whereas comments upon the old law taught only the importance of doing good to those who loved us, and were kind to us, the Saviour in his Sermon on the Mount tells us that in order to be the children of his Father we must bless them who curse us; we must do good to those who hate us; and pray for those who treat us with spite and persecution. O, friends! which of us can say that we keep this law? And yet, if we keep it not, we are not giving the true evidence that we are the children of God.

Would it not be well if we more frequently applied this test—"as thyself"—in our daily dealings with our neighbors? Which of us would say an unkind thing concerning ourselves? And yet how many unkind remarks are constantly escaping our lips in reference to others! Would we willingly say anything of ourselves which would in any measure tend to lower us in the estimation of those around? And yet do we not often make slighting and disparaging remarks about our neighbors! If we would honestly apply this test—"as thyself"—before allowing ourselves to give utterance to the rising thought, how much condemnation should we not save ourselves! How many a neighbor would be spared the sting of wounding words—words which we can never recall, however long we may live to regret them!

"As thyself." How does David, drinking into the true spirit of a future dispensation, describe the perfect man? As one who "taketh not up a reproach against his neighbor." Which of us would take up any reproach against ourselves, and go about with it, and spread it wherever we went? Not one of us—the thought is too monstrous. And yet how we catch up a reproach against another, and talk about it, and make much of it, as if it gave us pleasure instead of that real pain which it would give if we loved our neighbor as ourselves. I remember being much struck with the meaning of this passage some years ago, when a circumstance presented it to me in a light in which I had not before seen it. A Christian had got into a quarrel with one of his neighbors, and in the heat of passion had allowed himself to say many things which, as a Christian, he never ought to have said. At length God led him to see that in giving way to unkind speaking he was failing in love to his neighbor, and with the straightforward manliness which a true Christian will always exhibit, he expressed his regret that, unlike the perfect man of the Psalmist, he had "taken up a reproach against his neighbor." The practical application given to this passage came to me with great force, and has often since checked the inclination to repeat or "take up" something to another's detriment.

But let us consider Christ's law yet a little further. I have known Christians who seemed to think that if a man ceased to be classed amongst their friends they were at liberty to say all the evil they could of him without any breach of Christ's law of neighborly love in so doing. But O, dear friends, look again at the Sermon on the Mount, and say if that be Christ's teaching. Shall we say that because we no longer call a man by the name of friend, we are therefore no longer called to the exercise of love towards him? God forbid! Is not love the only redemptive power in the world; and, as the author of Ecce Deus so beautifully puts it, Does not love mean the cross, sacrifice, even death itself if need be?

Christ loved us in the full meaning of all that, and shall not we love one another? Did Christ love us and die for us because we loved him? Nay, but rather we only love him because he first loved us. O, if we had this love of God in our hearts, we should not "bite and devour" one another! If the love of self were extinguished within us, our only desire would be to win souls to Christ; and we should never expect to do that by talking against them, however much we might think they deserved our censure. Do you think this winning souls to Christ means only by preaching, or house-to-house visitation? I tell you we are winning souls every day and hour of our lives; or else we are driving souls away. Take care, my Christian friends, in deepest love I urge you to take care, that you are not unthinkingly doing this latter. Remember no amount of fault-finding, no amount of evil-speaking, however true we thought it was, EVER YET WON A SOUL TO CHRIST. But it has driven many a one away. May God save us from having the blood of such souls upon our consciences!

My dear friends, whilst we live in this present world it must needs be, alas! that offences come. But now I would earnestly say to each one—If thou hast by some device of Satan become offended by or with thy neighbor; if thou art not feeling true, earnest love for him; or if thou thinkest that he has despitefully used thee, then remember our dear Saviour's precept, and PRAY FOR HIM. Pray; pray on till thy heart is so filled with the love of God towards him, that thou art ready for any sacrifice for him; nay, it needs be, that thou wouldst give up thy very life, if that would save his soul. This Christ-like love alone is worthy the name of love; all other or lesser form of love has still self clinging to it.

If we are the true followers of Christ, our only anxiety will be to do good to others. In relation to our neighbors, the question will not be whether we can derive gratification from intercourse with them, but can we do them any good? Can we love them for God, and by the exercise of patient love and influence win them to Christ? There may be a great deal in them which is objectionable to us; but if we are Christians, we shall look beyond this and see that which they may become. This is how Christ looked on us. He saw what his love might develop within us, and has not his long-suffering and patience towards us been infinite? And shall not we, who have had so much forgiven, love much? Christ has borne with our waywardness and shortcomings, and shall not we have forbearance one with another? We know not the secret struggle, the earnest wish there may have been to do right, even when outwardly we only see the wrong. And perhaps many a time when the poor weak human heart has just been about to choose the good and trample under foot the evil inclination, our want of patience, or our hasty unkind word, has been the means of turning that struggling heart back to the evil. O, awful responsibility! How shall we account for the souls which we might have helped and yet have hindered? Think you that we shall ever regret having spoken too many kind words? ever regret having loved our neighbor too much? When the day comes that we can never speak to them again, shall we then regret the loving, kindly, helpful, sympathizing words we may have ever said to them? Will not our sorrow rather be, that we ever spoke an unkind or unloving word? When death comes, will it be a happy reflection to know that some want of love on our part has added to the sorrow even of one of the least of God's children? Has it, may be, caused sin in some tossed and struggling fellow-creature's soul?—sin which but for our unkindness had been stifled ere it saw the light! Dear Christian readers—for these words are addressed to those who profess to follow Christ—I entreat you to pause and think before you again allow yourselves in one unkind word or action towards any human being. Think what the ultimate result may be. Again, I beseech you to remember that love is the only redemptive power in the world. And if your sacrificing, self-denying, constant, patient love may but help in the salvation of one human soul, thus far are you brought into ONENESS with the Great Sacrifice. Can this perfect law of love be carried out by us? In one only way will it be possible—we must be crucified with Christ. Then, and then only, when self is dead within us, can the full resurrection of Christ within us take place; and it is only the Christ in us who can love our neighbor as ourselves. Yield up self then to die upon the cross; an agonizing death, but to be followed by a glorious resurrection. Let us never rest as Christians till with us to live is to love, more true in the spiritual life than in our natural life, where this great truth is typified.

If we feel, as I trust we many of us do, that heretofore we have come short of this perfect law of liberty, let us begin prayerfully afresh our Christian course in this respect. If we have said anything unkind, or harsh, or evil of our neighbor—let the provocation be whatever it may—let us with the noble manliness of a Godlike Christianity go to him, and express our sorrow. Let us tell him that God has shown us more of what it is to love, and that from henceforth, God helping us, we mean to love him and all mankind as Christ did. And thus going forth armed with this mighty power of love, we shall spread our Redeemer's cause more than if we could preach with the tongue of men and angels, for our daily lives will be, in deed as in word, an exhibition of His great law—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."—English Tract.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGIOUS SECTARISM, —WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE ANCIENT JEWISH SECTS.

BY FRANCIS FRITH.

There is a popular little tract entitled, "No Sect in Heaven." Now this, besides being an assertion open to question, is a subject beyond the proper province of our inquiries. Certainly, however, we cannot reasonably look for such a condition in the present state of being.

The simple and true meaning of the word "sect" is precisely that of its more complete synonym "section." The derived adjective "sectarian," in this, as in many similar instances, acquires a distinctive force and a somewhat divergent meaning. Sectarism is no more than the practical classification of religious beliefs. For, as regards modern religion, the old Latin proverb is literally true, "Quot homines tot sententiæ." Probably no two men think precisely alike upon all points, so that, literally, every thinking man constitutes a sect per se. This individuality of mind, as various and wonderful as that of physiognomy, is no matter of chance nor even of regret. It is one of those ordinances of providence which, although of the nature of an imperfection, in so far as it indicates imperfect knowledge, may yet be amongst the mysteries that "work together for good."

But practically the bulk of society does not think for itself. It is content to be instructed and led. Therefore, whenever an earnest and able man adopts a feature of religious belief which is of sufficient importance and distinctive value to asssimilate, or gather about it, a set of congenial though subordinate views and doctrines, minor differences are sunk, men associate with him and constitute a sect, whose vitality is for the most part in proportion to the importance and the power (whether for truth or error) of its leading doctrine. For instance, there is one doctrine which of itself represents our sect; its practical acceptance leads, I venture to think, to a nearer assimilation of independent minds than any other doctrine or system whatever does or can produce. The revival of this doctrine, in comparatively modern times, indicated the climax of that distinction to which we must now advert between the doctrinal and individual necessities of Christianity, and the legal and, so to speak, national character of Judaism. Looking at this feature of the Old Testament religion, we need not perhaps wonder that the Jews, with all their proneness to idolatry and disobedience, were little inclined to sectarism. Theirs was the one true faith against the world—in relation to which they constituted the sect of God-worshippers. Doubtless their enforced isolation from other nations also tended to preserve the singleness and simplicity of their religious creed. Few elements of foreign or discordant thought were introduced until after the dispersion of the nation to the Babylonish provinces. Previously, we have not, so far as I am aware, any notice of sectarism amongst them; and subsequently we know of no more than three important sects or factions, distinct from the mass of the people. The Samaritans were not Jews, excepting in so far as their numbers were augmented from time to time by discontented or outlawed Hebrews. They pursued, throughout, a time-serving policy, holding no distinctive tenets beyond such as accommodated themselves most obviously to their peculiar position. Between them and the Jews proper, as the New Testament history shows, existed a feeling of bitter and intense hatred. Neither need we consider the Christian Church as a development of Judaism. Perhaps it is more correct to regard it as a new and distinct revelation; having, possibly, less practical reference to the Jewish nation than to the Gentile world; yet there is a vast interest in the relations which the two dispensations bear to each other; and especially in the influence which Jewish customs, prejudices and modes of thought were permitted, for centuries, and probably even to the present time, to exert upon the Christian economy.

In the creed of the Sadducees, a wonderful doubt, an uncertainty of overwhelming import, rather than a belief of any sort, was the prominent dogma; nothing less than a denial of the immortality of the soul. The chief interest which we feel in this astounding profession, is the indication which it affords that until "life and immortality were brought to light by the Gospel," this unspeakably grand, consolatory, and, we may almost say, fundamental doctrine of religion was not clearly announced to man. We cannot doubt that, according to the testimony of the author of the Epistle to Hebrews, 11th chap., prophets and righteous men from the earliest times had foreshadowings, may have had individual revelations, of the doctrine; but to the Jews as a people it was not prominently revealed. The fact that they, with their teachers—the Pharisees—"confessed" it, proves nothing to the contrary; for so, and in very much the same gross and ignorant form, did the Greeks and Romans. In both cases the evidences which led to its adoption were more of the nature of mere emanations, as it were, from the Truth itself—struggling, irrepressible self-evidences, rather than distinct revelations;—Scripture proofs—(with the exception of one isolated passage in the book of Daniel) amounting at most to inferences and deductions. Thus, even our Saviour's confutation of the assertion indirectly made by the Sadducees, was no more than a pure deduction. His answer made no reference whatever to direct Scripture evidence.

It is impossible, in this and analogous instances, to regard the silence of Scripture as a mere coincidence—an unintended reticence. Rather, without questioning the wisdom of God in so long withholding this glorious truth from the world, let us rejoice with thanksgiving that He has revealed it to us. Since He withheld not His Son from death, "how shall He not, with him, freely give us all things"? The full revelation of this truth is one of the things given to the world with the Son, and for His sake. But, although the denial of a future state of existence was the prominent doctrinal peculiarity of the Sadducees, it would be superficial to regard it as the real root of the matter. We must look for the proclivities which led them to this doctrine: and in this more philosophic and general view of the subject it will be convenient to embrace the other sects, and to some extent, as a necessity, the whole Jewish people.

The zeal which was so eminently aroused and cultivated by Ezra and Nehemiah, coupled with the humiliated, and to some extent humbled and chastened, state of the nation, could not fail to establish amongst them habits, at least, of religious significance,—profession.—traditional reverence for the law of God. Without inferring that nothing more solid than this remained (for we shall soon have occasion to remark to the contrary), this at least was sure to supervene upon the lapse of a century or two. However much the spirit of religion faded, the form was safe to outlive it;—for so it always does; and hence, long before Pharisaism became a recognized profession, we can well understand how this popular development grew. There are ever two distinct causes for great but hollow profession—one has, comparatively, the merit of sincerity, being a partial recognition of the necessity of the thing assumed; a desire—an attempt—to put the appearance of a thing as an effective substitute for the thing itself. This is self-delusion, and they who practise it associate themselves intimately with the other class—the deliberately and wickedly hypocritical.

That the Pharisaism of our Lord's time partook largely of this latter element, we may certainly infer from the severe denunciations which He uttered against it. And when we consider the popularity of the sect, that, indeed, it moulded and represented the popular mind, we must needs see, in the great mass of the Jews of that period, a sorrowful picture of irreligion and depravity.

(To be concluded.)

THE STRUCTURE AND CARE OF THE EAR.

The Structure. How low down in the animal creation the sense of hearing extends, it is not possible positively to say. It seems probable, however, that some at least of the insect tribe possess it. But it is first in animals like the lobster that an ear, though of the simplest construction, can be distinctly shown to exist. By careful looking, this ear may be found at the upper part of the second pair of feelers, in the lobster or the crab, and it consists of a very small bag, filled with a watery fluid, and covered in externally by a strong membrane. On the internal surface of this bag a nerve spreads itself out, which nerve carries the effect of the motions of the fluid to the brain,—such brain as the creature has. A nerve and a little bag of water, accessible to the vibrations of the air, constitute an ear, and however complicated the ear may become in the higher animals and ourselves, as we shall see that it does, it always retains this character: it is at the bottom a bag of watery fluid and a nerve. The next step towards making the ear more perfect is one that might well seem to be the way to destroy it altogether; it is the putting stones into it; and these stones once put in are never again left out. They are present, though in the form of a very fine powder, in the innermost part of our own ears. But they are not always a fine powder; sometimes they are very large bony masses, especially in the less perfect ears, such as those of fishes. The ear-stones (Otoliths) may be easily found in a cod's head, lying a short distance behind the eye and within the skull; they are dense white bodies, often nearly an inch long, of a flattened oval form, and grooved upon their surface. Their object is to make the vibrations of the fluid contained in the bag more powerful. If we fill a bladder with water and give it a gentle tap, we may feel a tremulous motion run to and fro within it. But if we put into it a few marbles, and then tap it, these will give a much more distinct sensation. But by examining a cod's or salmon's head (which may be cooked), not only may the ear-stones be discovered, but also the ear-bag. And it will be noticed to have a very remarkable form. It is no longer, as in the lobster, a mere roundish bladder; at first sight it might almost be said to resemble a large white spider. It has a body and limbs, but the limbs are peculiar. From the central sac, which consists of two portions, there pass off three tubes, which return to the sac again, near the point from which they start. At one end each tube has an enlargement; it seems to swell out into a bulb, and here, as well as in the central sac, the nerve is distributed. Now because these tubes pass from the sac and return to it again, the sac is called the "vestibule," or common hall; and the tubes are called the semi-circular canals (though they are not exactly semi-circular): and this with another superadded part continues to be the form of the nervous portion of the ear in all animals and in ourselves. The superadded part is like a shell. It consists, like a common snail shell, of a tube winding around a central axis, and growing larger as it winds. The reason for this form we shall see hereafter. Birds and mammals and man possess it, though birds have it in a less perfect form. In them it is a curved tube something like a small boat and not spirally arranged. Because, however, it is for the most part in the form of a spiral shell, it is called "the cochlea."

The sac, the three tubes, the spiral canal, then, make up the nervous part of the ear,—vestibule, semi-circular canals, and cochlea. A wonderful structure, undoubtedly; and so the anatomists who first discovered it thought; for they called it the labyrinth. We will speak more of it by and by; for the present we will return to our codfish.

Though he, in common with the rest of his kind, hears very well, there is no external sign of his having any ear at all. The sac and its canals, with the auditory nerve expanded within them, constitute his whole organ of hearing, and they simply lie in contact with the inner surface of the skull. There is no membrane to receive vibrations from without, and pass them onwards. The reason of this is that water transmits vibrations so powerfully,—much more powerfully than air,—to solid bodies, that the bones of the fish's head suffice to convey sounds to the nerve. Except the whale, and the other water-inhabiting mammals (which have ears like their air-breathing fellows, though somewhat modified), animals which habitually live in water hear through the bones of the skull; and their ear consists only of the nerve and the membrane filled with fluid on which it is spread out. But for air-breathing animals this would not suffice. The air passes on its vibrations to the skull far too feebly to serve the purposes for which hearing is needed, and accordingly an apparatus is required for conveying the vibrations of the atmosphere, which constitute sound, to the nerve appointed to receive them. This apparatus answers to the transparent parts of the eye, which afford a free passage to the light, and it is the second or outer portion of the ear. It has many forms in various classes of animals, but all are framed upon one plan, and it will suffice if we describe it briefly as it is met with in ourselves.

The outer ear, though probably not without a certain amount of use, appears to exist in man chiefly for beauty's sake. In many animals, however, it is of great importance, being, in fact, a natural hearing-trumpet. Humboldt relates that, in South America, the troops of wild horses that traverse the country divide themselves, as regards the direction given to their ears, into three sets. Those which lead the van direct them forward, those in the centre turn them to the side, and the hindmost set them to the rear; so that the whole troop is made aware, in the acutest way, of danger threatening from any quarter.

The passage which leads inwards from the outer ear is slightly curved, and in adults is about an inch and a half in length; in children, however, it is much shallower, having a depth in the infant of scarcely half an inch. It is of oval form, and about its centre is furnished with a broadish ring of small glands which secrete the light brown semi-solid substance known as the ear-wax. At the bottom of this passage is fixed the membrane, commonly called the "drum of the ear," but not correctly; a drum being not a membrane, but a hollow space closed on one or more sides by membrane. The membrane to which the external passage leads constitutes the outer side of a cavity hollowed in the bone, which cavity is the drum of the ear, and contains several important parts. First, there is the membrane itself, a beautiful structure, made up of fine fibres, some radiating from the central part to the circumference, others arranged in concentric rings; and it is lined on the outer side by a very fine layer of skin, and on the inner by an equally fine layer of cellular membrane. It is almost transparent, and though moderately strong, is little thicker than gold-beaters' skin. Being kept gently on the stretch, it thrills to every whisper, and two small muscles keep it in the most delicate adjustment to each varying impulse with which the air comes laden. One of these muscles draws it tighter, the other loosens it, by acting upon a chain of very small bones, which pass, suspended as it were in mid-air, and swinging with every breath, across the drum, from the membrane to the nerve. This chain of bones answers two purposes: First, it receives vibrations from the membrane, and conveys them to the labyrinth; and secondly it adjusts both the membrane and the fluid which surrouuds the nerve, to the various kinds and pitches of sound by which they are affected. Besides the membrane already described, there is a second smaller membrane opposite to it; that is on the inner wall of the drum, which closes in the spiral canal before mentioned, in which one part of the nerve is spread out. The use of this second membrane is not yet fully determined. Lastly, a tube leads from the drum into the throat, called, from its discoverer Eustachius, the "Eustachian tube." The use of this tube is two-fold. First, it supplies the drum with air, and keeps the membrane exactly balanced, and free to move, with equal air-pressure on each side; and, secondly, it carries off any fluid which may be in the drum, and prevents it from being choked by its own moisture. It is not always open, however, but is opened during the act of swallowing, by a little muscle, which is attached to it just as it reaches the throat. Most persons can distinctly feel that this is the case, by gently closing the nose and swallowing; when a distinct sensation is felt in the ears. This sensation is due to a little air being drawn out of the ears through the open tube during swallowing; and it lasts for a few minutes, unless the air is again restored by swallowing with the nose unclosed, which allows for the moment a free communication between the ear and the throat. We thus see a reason for the tube being closed. If it were always open, all the sounds produced in the throat would pass directly into the drum of the ear, and totally confuse us. We should hear every breath, and live in a constant bewilderment of internal sounds. At the same time the closure being but a light contact of the walls of the tube, easily allows a slight escape of air from the drum, and thus not only facilitates and regulates the oscillations of the air before the vibrating membrane, but provides a safety-valve, to a certain extent, against the injurious influence of loud sounds.

The chief use of the Eustachian tube is to allow a free interchange of air between the ear and the throat, and this is exceedingly important; and it is very important, also, that its use in this respect should be understood. Persons who go down in diving-bells soon begin to feel a great pressure in the ears, and if the depth is great, the feeling becomes extremely painful. This arises from the fact, that in the diving-bell the pressure of the air is very much increased, in order to balance the weight of the water above; and thus it presses with great force upon the membrane of the drum, which, if the Eustachian tube has been kept closed, has only the ordinary uncompressed air on the inner side to sustain it. It is therefore forced inwards and put upon the stretch, and might be even broken. Many cases, indeed, have occurred, of injury to the ear, producing permanent deafness, from descents in diving-bells, undertaken by persons ignorant of the way in which the ear is made; though the simple precaution of frequent swallowing suffices to ward off all mischief. For if the Eustachian tube is thus opened, again and again, as the pressure of the outside air increases, the same compressed air that exists outside passes also into the inside of the drum, and the membrane is equally pressed upon from both sides by the air, and so is free from strain. The same precaution is necessary in ascending mountains that are lofty, for then there is the same effect of stretching produced upon the membrane, though in the opposite way. The outside air becoming less and less condensed as a greater height is gained, the ordinary air contained within the drum presses upon the membrane, which is thus insufficiently supported on the outside, and a similar feeling of weight and stretching is produced. The conjuror's trick of breaking a vase by a word rests on the same principle. The air is exhausted from within, and the thin, though massive-looking sides of the vase collapse by the pressure of the air outside; and just as ever so small a hole, made at the right moment in the side of the vase, would prevent the whole effect, so does swallowing, which makes a little hole, as it were, for the moment in the drum of the ear, prevent the in-pressing or out-pressing of the membrane. Mr. Tyndall, in his interesting book on Sound, tells us how he employed this precaution of swallowing, and with entire success, when, in one of his mountain excursions, the pressure on his ears became severely painful.

Deafness during colds arises very often, though not always, from a similar cause. For when, owing to swelling of the throat, the Eustachian tube cannot be opened by its muscle, and so the air in the drum is not renewed, the air that is contained in it soon diminishes, and the outer air presses the membrane in, so that it cannot vibrate as it should. This is what has been sometimes called "throat-deafness."

QUAKER COUNCIL WITH THE INDIANS.

A Grand Council of the Pottawatomies was held at St. Mary's, day before yesterday. The Council was called for the purpose of facilitating the acquaintance and cultivating friendly relations between the Indians and their new Agent, who has just been installed in office. Appropriate and happy speeches were made by the Agent and the chiefs, and a feeling of friendly good-will seemed to prevail. But all seemed deeply moved when the Agent finished the closing speech, in which he very feelingly warned his hearers of the evils of intemperance, and spoke eloquently of the necessity of a Christian education, which was heartily responded to by the Indians, who apparently were delighted at the prospect of better educational facilities, and then kneeling in their midst offered up a heartfelt, earnest prayer to the Great Spirit, for His kind protecting care.

This is decidedly a new feature in Indian Councils. It has generally been understood that Indian agents are always ready to prey, but we venture that there are not many, if any, persons now living in Kansas, who ever saw an Indian agent kneel in the midst of his charge, and ask for the blessing of Heaven to rest upon them. The Quakers have really inaugurated a new Indian policy, and we hope and trust that it may prove a beneficial and successful one.—Kansas State Record.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH 13, 1869.

In Everything Give Thanks.—A pious author of the last century wrote: "All things work together for good to them that love God; therefore every occurrence may be a subject of gratitude and thankfulness. While ye live to God, prosperity and adversity will be equally helpful to you." The apostle Paul gives (1 Thess. v. 16—18,) a string of texts, the due observance of which, would make happy Christians. "Rejoice evermore. Pray without ceasing. In everything give thanks:" adding "for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you." Surely such a revelation as this of His benevolent will ought to be read and remembered with thankfulness. We have been touched in noticing a dutiful child, who on the reception of any parental gift, however small, always responds with cheerful cordiality: "Thank thee, father." Are we thus thankful? It is the Divine intent that we should be happy through gratitude which will bear fruit in obedience, and by living in the continual exercise of prayer and praise. It is offensive when any, in a pharisaical spirit, "for a pretence make long prayers." It is acceptable, when a child of God, from the fullness of a grateful heart, says: "Thank thee, Father." We ought not to weary in an employ which is to be the happy occupation of the blessed, world without end. Knowing that we have nothing that we have not received, thankfulness should be ever recurring, "for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning us." Paul, after he had been thanking God without ceasing, exclaimed: "What thanks can we render to God again!" And he exhorts "the saints" "and the faithful" to "give thanks for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ."

The belief in a Supreme Creator includes a consciousness that we owe all to Him. Is it becoming to be constant recipients of His bounty and not to be always mindful of it? And when we know that we are loaded with benefits, ought not the incense of gratitude to ascend continually from the heart? When friends are multiplied to us,—when prosperity attends our life—it is from the Lord—thanks are due. If poverty be our portion, still our daily bread is provided—it is His gift; and let the "daily" example of the early believers be followed, who "did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God." Occasion for this tribute is found in every moment of life. What physical enjoyment could be possible to us, but for the perfect goodness and wisdom evinced in the whole physical structure of man? How the members of the body obey the directing will, and do unconscious service without jar. The Psalmist recognizes this—"I will praise thee, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made." Do we see a fellow-creature crippled or blind or deprived of any of those senses which minister to our delight? With what devout gratitude should we thank Him who gave to us and who continues to us these blessings! Are we deprived of any of these gifts? How should we bless and praise the bountiful Giver who still bestows benefactions which we cannot number?

In the changes of seasons—the vicissitudes of the weather—the government of the universe—what cause have we to give thanks for the perfect wisdom and goodness which control all things, balance relations, and cause the whole circle of facts and events to conduce to the greatest good! The blessing of rain—the blessing of drought—and of "stormy winds fulfilling His law." "His understanding is infinite," and is never exerted at random

"Or not for charitable ends."

We are not competent to add up the sum of benefits and mercies. Our minds cannot grasp or conceive the occasions for thanksgiving. "Oh, give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good!" Transcendently good, that He finds pleasure in giving good gifts to beings so finite. How full the testimony of the four and twenty elders: "Thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." His pleasure is in giving happiness, and the joy that was set before His well beloved Son was the joy of a world's salvation. He gave his life for our ransom, his Spirit for our Sanctifier—"Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift!"

George Peabody "ceased to be mortal" on the 4th inst. within 30 minutes of midnight. His death occurred in London. Before daylight next morning the daily papers of this city circulated the tidings. His age was threescore and fourteen years. The lesson of his life is a striking one. The list of his donations has astonished the people of his native land and that of his adoption. At present we refer with approval to a single point. Having great wealth, he has of late years, by acting as his own executor, done great good, saved large expense in commissions, &c., and derived much enjoyment by witnessing the result. It was too soon, at the time of our going to press, to give the details which will be desired by the public, and which the various journals will speedily furnish.

George Fox Attacked and Defended.—Our attention was invited to a long essay in the Independent defamatory of Geo. Fox. A brief editorial in the same paper, vindicating the character of the great and good man, indicates that the Editor was without the excuse of ignorance for publishing it. To belie the living is sometimes a dangerous experiment. To give currency to a libel upon the dead is not less censurable. In the Independent of the 4th inst., T. L. Cuyler, with his usual charm of style, gives what he calls "A back blow for the Quakers," and referring to the "sterling virtues" of the great Reformer, says:

"It is enough that he gave to the world Quakerism, and Quakerism has said and done ten thousand things for which we cannot feel too grateful."

In this essay are some very good things, blended of course with a few inaccuracies. We say of course—for when a theologic pen is dipped in ink to write about "the people called Quakers," inaccuracy comes about as natural as "original sin," even with writers who are habitually careful. We have a theory of our own as to the cause of this—but, n'importe, we must not complain of escaping the woe attached to those of whom all speak well. Our well-esteemed friend T. L. C. makes kindly mention of his association with Friends during a certain term of three years, and tells how the "gentle brotherhood" has "influenced all his public ministry—knocked off a few sharp corners of his Presbyterianism—intensified his love of temperance and his hatred of slavery." "I saw in them," he says, "the exceeding beauty of meekness, and often, when I sat with them under the covering of the Spirit, I felt that the still small voice might the more readily be heard while the strife of tongues was hushed." But, he says, "I could never sympathize with their over-scrupulous punctilio about the color of their clothes and the fashion of their furniture." Now, whilst our good friend was himself punctilious about adhering to his clerical sable, none of those to whom he refers were over-scrupulous about the color of their clothes, only that, like other grave, religious people, they avoided the gay and the gaudy. Nor was there any peculiarity in the fashion of their furniture. In both these respects they observed modesty and moderation. Why should he "add a perfume to the violet," or conjure up for us a new "peculiarity." We have companied with him in the houses of Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians, where we saw no furniture that would have been censured in the dwelling of the simplest Friend. He takes fresh occasion to say that he "never could agree with our Quaker brethren" in rejecting what he styles the "sacraments," and declares to be "not essential to salvation." If, as he and we think, they are "not essential," and if we can realize rich comfort and joy without them, and if (as he can hardly doubt) many place upon them an undue reliance,—(which is so much dependence withdrawn from Him upon whom we should rest it all,)—why should it trouble our friend that we remember our Saviour's last words upon the Cross, and hold that the Ceremonial which so long pointed forward to Him is finished.

He says: "In those days my Quaker neighbors did not believe in Sunday-schools." A decided mistake. We happen to know that those very neighbors had strong affection for First-day schools, and for years carried on in their Meeting-house a very efficient one,—ministers, elders, overseers and other exemplary Friends dividing the work among them; and that their compilations were adopted and extensively circulated by the American S. S. Union. This cause has however gained much more general footing in the Society since that day.

On the whole, we thank T. L. C. for his essay, and think it better for him than for us to reply to the "acid article" which called it forth. In conclusion we quote two of his sentences:

"Quakerism is feeling a new breath of Pentecost —it means to live and not die."

"While God has a work for Quakerism to do, it will live and utter its faithful testimonies."

FRIENDS' QUARTERLY EXAMINER.—The Tenth month number completes the third year of this English contemporary. We give a list of its articles:—Distinguishing Tenets, by the Editor. Emori nolo: Mortuum me esse Nihil Æstumo, T. Hodgkin. "Be patient therefore, brethren," M. E. B. Christian Politics, W. Ball. The Philosophy of Religious Sectarism, with special reference to the ancient Jewish Sects, Francis Frith. The meaning and use of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, as observed in the Primitive Church, Dr. Ash. The Evangelical Movement in Spain, John T. Betts. Ritualism: How should it be met? Dr. Hartshorne. Unity of Root, Editor. Cipriano de Valera, Henry Ecroyd. Conscience: our own and other men's, Thos. Hodgkin. Thomas Pierce, W. C. Westlake. Notes on Italy, J. T. Rice. Revision of our Authorized Version of the New Testament, Isaac Brown. Colloquial Letters, H. H. Notices of Books, &c.

MEETING ON BEHALF OF THE FREEDMEN.—A Special Meeting of the Friends' Freedmen's Association is to be held on Third-day evening next, the 16th inst., at 8 o'clock P.M., in Arch St. Meeting-house. It is hoped that a general attendance will be given. Those who have labored in this good work ought to have a full opportunity of presenting the subject to their fellow members; and none of us ought to allow our sympathies to grow cold, or to be weary in well-doing. This is an important part of the work of our day. It would be a discouraging symptom were such meetings as this to be neglected. A large portion of our fellow-beings are in utter need, and through our Friends of this Association they make an appeal to which we ought to listen with ready sympathy. For such a purpose it would have pleased William Penn, who gave the beautiful lot on Arch St., to think that his successors should assemble there: and the object is one which a long array of our departed worthies would have rejoiced to promote.

"Is it a dream that with their eyes of love
They look now on us from the bowers above?
Lay's ardent soul, and Benezet the mild,
(Steadfast in faith, yet gentle as a child,)
Meek-hearted Woolman, and that brother-band,
The sorrowing Exiles from their FATHER-LAND,
Who first of all their testimonial gave Against the oppressor—for the outcast slave?"

Attention is invited to the Freedman's Friend just issued.

MORE LABORERS NEEDED AMONG THE INDIANS.—We are informed by the Clerk of "The Associated Exec. Com. of Friends on Indian Affairs," that a physician is much needed among the Sacs and Foxes; and blacksmiths on three or more of the reservations upon which members of onr religious Society are now located as U. S. Indian agents. Information as to location, compensation, &c., may be obtained by addressing Benjamin H. Wright, Plainfield, Ind., chairman of the subcommittee on the appointment of employées. Let us hope that a willingness to be dedicated to this truly missionary work will be speedily begotten in the hearts of some of our members fitted for these services, and that they will be enabled to enter upon the labor, qualified by the spirit of our Lord to uphold His standard in purity among the heathen, and to strengthen the hands of their brethren already engaged in the same labor of love.

MARRIED,

At Spring Meeting, Indiana, on the 8th of Ninth month, 1869, TILLMAN, son of William and the late Beulah Hadley, to HANNAH, daughter of Nathan and the late Olive Hadley.

At Friends' Meeting house, Portsmouth, R. I., on the 1st of Tenth month, 1869, JACOB MOTT and SUSANNA HATHAWAY, both of Portsmouth.

[These Friends reside on a farm which has been retained in the family since it was purchased from the Aborigines, and in a house in which Geo. Fox once attended a wedding.]

DIED.

BINFORD.—On the 1st of Tenth month, 1869, in her 2d year, Eva, daughter of Aquila H. and Martha J. Binford, members of Tonganoxie Mouthly Meeting, Kansas.

ARNOLD.—At her residence in Salem, Iowa, on the 23d of Third month, 1869, Olive Arnold, aged a little over 89 years: a member of Salem Mo. Meeting.

COATE.—On the 7th of Ninth month, 1869, in the 27th year of her age, Lydia A., wife of Aldus M. Coate; a member of Legrand Monthly Meeting, Iowa. Her end was peace.

HUNT.—At her residence in New Providence, Iowa, on the 30th of Tenth month, Edith, wife of David Hunt and relict of Asa Williams, in the 63d year of her age; a member of Honey Creek Monthly Meeting. From early life she had been devoted to the principles and testimonies of Friends, and for many years had been an accepted servant of the Church as Overseer, Elder, &c.

She was an earnest and efficient friend of the oppressed Africans, and sympathized with all the afflicted. As she lived she died, peacefully, confiding in God's free salvation through Jesus Christ our only Saviour. Gone, we humbly trust, to inherit the crown. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit; that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

BATTEY.—In Hesper, Iowa, on the 31st of Eighth month, in her 67th year, Ruth, wife of Amos Battey; an esteemed member and Elder of Winnesheik Monthly Meeting. She was concerned to uphold with consistency the principles of Truth as held by our religious Society. During her illness it was her constant endeavor to keep her mind fixed trusting in God, and she was enabled in great sweetness to acknowledge that strength had been given her in trials under which she must otherwise have sunk; adding: "I have desired to be more diligent in making my calling and election sure, and that our children might be found walking in the straight and narrow way." To her husband she was ever a true helpmeet, cheerfully resigning him to the work of the Lord, and bearing, for the cause' sake, the privation of his absence.

NOTICE.

The Fifth Biennial Conference of Teachers and Delegates from Friends' First-day Schools in America will be held in Philadelphia, beginning Eleventh month 17th, 1869, at 4 o'clock P. M., for the consideration of the First-day School work and kindred subjects. All Friends interested in Scriptural Instruction are cordially invited to attend.

By order of the Executive Committee.

CHARLES TABER,
WM. G. RHOADS, Secretaries.

Friends living at a distance who propose coming to Philadelphia for the purpose of attending the Conference, will confer a favor if they will forward their names and Post-office address to Samuel R. Shipley, No. 111 South Fourth St., Phila., as soon as possible, in order that arrangements may be made for their accommodation.

The Local Committee desire to extend a cordial invitation to all Friends who are interested to come.

Friends coming from a distance to the Conference are informed that by paying full fare east over the Pennsylvania, Philadelphia and Baltimore, Reading, Catawissa, Richmond and Danville and Richmond and York River Railroads, also the Philada. and Erie and Pittsburg, Columbus and Cincinnati Railroads, and all stations on the Panhandle route except Chicago, they can be supplied with free return passes, signed by the Secretary of the Conference. R. L. Murray, No. 152 Broadway, New York, will have round trip tickets to Philadelphia, good for all members of the Conference, at four dollars each. And application has been made to the Fall River line for commutation tickets between Boston and New York. Thus travelling facilities are engaged as far south as Greensboro, N. C., and west as Chicago, Ill.

THE BIBLE AND TRACT DISTRIBUTING SOCIETY.

In the prosecution of the work of the Freedmen's Association of Friends in Philadelphia, it appeared that there was a large demand for religious reading matter, which they could not supply, and in order that the free-born colored and white population, as well as the freedmen, might be supplied, it was thought that a separate organization would be desirable. A few Friends therefore associated together about a year ago for this purpose, and the Association is now known under the above title.

The Executive Board of the Freedmen's Assoc. entrusted the work of distribution in which they had so largely been engaged to the new Association, in conjunction with their Committee, and the Bible Assoc. of Friends in America put a liberal supply of Bibles and Testaments at our disposal.

The result has, we think, fully justified us in the undertaking. While in no way interfering with any other Association, we trust that our labors have rather tended to extend the usefulness of some already existing, besides bringing into notice individuals and sections of country much needing assistance. We therefore desire now to make a brief statement of our proceedings, and appeal to Friends for contributions to aid us in continuing and extending our labors.

A number of tracts, from those of various publishing societies in this country and England, have been selected and kept on hand. Great care has been taken that these might be such as Friends could distribute. A few, mostly those especially adapted to the new condition of the freedmen, and for use in their First-day schools, have been printed.

Several desirable openings for Friends' books having presented, the book committee of the Meeting for Sufferings have, on our application, furnished a portion of them from their publications. Originally intended for work in the late slave States, we have already found our field of labor extending beyond those States, so that a considerable quantity has been called for to be distributed in and around Philadelphia and other parts of Pennsylvania, in New Jersey, Delaware, the New England and some of the Western States, embracing in all to this time 28 States.

During the year the distribution of the joint committee has been as follows:

Bibles,	1,638
Testaments,	6,337
Tracts and Leaflets,	229,343
Wall Texts,	8,307
Small Books,	30,879
Books for use in First-day Schools,	13,059
Do for Libraries,	1,999
Friends' Books,	161

Contributions may be handed to the Treasurer, Richard Cadbury, 606 Chestnut Street, or to either of the following Committee.

Marmaduke C. Cope, Charles Rhoads,
James Whitall, Elliston P. Morris,
John B. Garrett.

Philada., 10th mo., 1869.

REPORT ON FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS TO WESTERN YEARLY MEETING.

To the Yearly Meeting;

Reports have been received from the Quarterly Meeting, exhibiting the state of the concern in their limits; from these reports the usual tabular statement has been compiled, and is herewith presented to the Yearly Meeting. The reports show an increase of interest in our schools as compared with previous statistics.

In the three small meetings, in which there are no schools, the families unite with their neighbors in Union Schools; so that all our children have the opportunity of receiving instruction in the Holy Scriptures. It is believed that the thorough reading of the Bible, and the serious thoughtfulness suggested thereby, constitute one of the distinctive features of our Scripture Schools. A rich blessing attends all those who give themselves up to this work.

When our hearts are enriched by the love of God, our efforts will not be confinnd to our own Society. All openings for labor will be sought; and hence, this Nursery of the Church, with all its ennobling influences, will be established in all our localities. We were reminded that the "fields are already white unto harvest." It is cause of rejoicing that so much religious care is bestowed on the young, and still there is room. The best way to reform society is to win the children over to Christ; for the seed of evil soon gets into their hearts. The magnitude of this work calls for the labors of the Society, the parents and the Church. "They that seek me early shall find me."

The importance of Union and Mission Schools was feelingly spoken to. Thousands in these schools for the first time receive some knowledge of the Bible, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

It has been gathered from sources thought to be reliable, that of every thousand who profess a love of Jesus by conversion, 548 are under twenty (20) years of age; 337 are between 20 and 30 years; 90 are between 30 and 40; 15 between 40 and 50; 9 between 50 and 60; and only 1 over 60 years of age.

The teachers were affectionately encouraged to seek, by prayer, a qualification for the work entrusted to them. Intellectual attainments alone are not sufficient; but seasoned with grace, and sanctified by the giver of all good gifts, the teacher will be qualified to impress deeply the subject which may come before him.

The young people were encouraged to enlist in the work, not for a year, or a number of years, but for life, and labor earnestly in the good cause.

Although much is done, yet the work appears to have been just begun, so vast is the field of labor before us.

The importance of holding Normal Institutes, in which model exercises can be exhibited, was earnestly recommended. Many of our teachers who attended these, acknowledge that their interest and abilities have been increased by so doing. We were reminded that our most talkative teachers were not always our most successful ones; but the praying teacher, whose heart is filled with the love of God for the cause, and for his class, certainly has an influence that others do not. The children see and feel the influence of such teachers.

Our attention has been called to the "One Lesson System," and to the holding of weekly "Teachers' Meetings," with which the meeting fully united, and we recommend them to the attention of all our teachers and superintendents for their adoption.

The Committee on the General Conference made an interesting report. The Conference was held at Thorntown, in the Third Month, and was largely attended. Much interest was manifested in the business which came before it. It adjourned to meet at Bloomingdale, in Parke County, on the 31st of Fifth month next, at 9 o'clock A.M.

The following query was introduced into the Meeting, and was recommended to the attention of the Yearly Meeting for its adoption.

What number of our members are engaged in Union and Mission Schools?

By direction of the Meeting,

Lewis A. Estes, Clerk.

It was not until the inaugural address of President Grant appeared that a new, most important and extensive field of useful service was opened to them, and presented in such manner as to take hold of their sense of duty in such force that they dared not to reject the proffer without a trial, in an humble faith that they might avert great wrongs and sufferings. After enduring two centuries of wrong and oppression from their own government in Great Britain; after a strife with the Parliament of England of a third of a century, to arrest the horrors of the slave trade, and after more than a century of retirement from office, and abstinence from political party and controversy in America, it was indeed unexpected and surprising that the new President, and highest military chief of the nation, should call upon the peaceful Friends to come to the help of the Government, as the fittest instrument to achieve what all the military power of the nation could not accomplish without vast expenditure of money; without large cost of human life; without an opprobrium in history to be transmitted to the latest posterity. The conception was wonderful; the resolve to execute it sublime! Friends surely would say it came from God; and so I believe, it was so out of the common course of human civil government.

Good and true Friends have been appointed, and have set themselves to the work of taking a peaceful care of the western Indians. They are the official superintendents and agents of the Government; they are also the missionaries of peace, friendship, civilization and religion of the Friends. The Government has not thereby enlisted the faithful services of their appointees only, but those of all the Friends, who regard the same individuals as their representatives in the great work of humanity and civilization. In this the nation has an immense guaranty for good conduct, perfect honesty and success. The Indians, though pushed back, they and their ranging game and food, almost to the Rocky Mountains, have not lost the traditions of the treaty with Penn, and the friendly intercourse of their ancestors with the settlers of the colony of Pennsylvania, and are ready to confide in and conform to the wishes of Friends as they would not in others, except it be a few missionary Christians of tried friendship. The Indians, too, have the guaranty which they most need and desire in the appointees of the Government, since if any could so far forget his principles and character as to fall into temptation and moral dereliction, his Christian brethren would be the first to interpose and have him replaced by a better man. Than for any one of these to prove delinquent, with the eyes of the world upon him, death were better for him.

And here, again, the friends of the Friends are looking on with an interest doubly intense, first, in the hope that they may be successful in a great work of humanity, and save the reputation of the nation from a lasting historical opprobrium and stain; secondly, that Friends may prove their good mission in the world not ended, and that all human wrong and oppressions may, through the centuries to come, find them the quiet, sure and indomitable champions of human rights, which they have been through the more than two centuries of their past existence.

The public I would warn not to expect too much within a few years. To but preserve the border peace and to avert the expenses and bloodshed of war will be great achievements. We must remember that the subjects to be dealt with are not citizens who have been surrounded with Christian and civilized influences, but the wild Indians of the prairies; inherently wild in their nature by centuries of tradition, practice and habit, of living only by the chase, and the occupation of almost ceaseless war and cruelty. It will be hard to settle the hunter and warrior upon the reservations and to transform them into the farmer and artizan.

But this is what Friends will do in due time, if their subjects are capable of the transformation, so far as within the reach of human power; for the Friends who have undertaken the work are eminently practical and patient; and they have the highest incentives to succeed that men and women can feel, namely, that they may have the approbation of their brothers and sisters in religious and social association, many thousands in number looking on and desiring to approve and encourage; that they may have the approval of the President, Congress, the Indian Commissioner and the nation, and the approbation of their own consciences and of their heavenly Father.

The ordeal the Friends are going through is most serious and momentous, and deserves the profoundest care and anxious consideration of all who are represented in the missionary work now but begun; for how great may be the consequences, under the Divine guidance, for good, none living can foresee; how great the evil of failure and the discouragement and darkness to ensue, none can imagine. The great question that transcends all others is, shall Friends continue through indefinite time to be a power on earth for good, to relieve human suffering, and to bear their testimony against all injustice, and to combat by peaceful means all wrongs and oppression? Great must ever be the power of such bodies, ever living in the undoubted conviction that they are acting in the authority and moved to execute the Divine will. E. K. P.

MADAGASCAR.

Part of a letter of J. S. Sewell.

Antananarivo, 8th month, 1869.

. . . I purpose to make a few remarks on the present state of Madagascar as regards Christianity, and especially on the part which Friends have been permitted to take, and may yet take, in the extension of it here.

The experience which we have gained during the two years we have been here, enables us to speak with a good deal more confidence than we could at first. At first, everything was so new that we were in great danger of forming too hasty conclusions from what we saw. One day's experience would lead us to draw a picture far brighter than the truth; another would have a depressing effect, and lead us to doubt the reality of all the religion in the country except as regards a very few.

Antananarivo is the great centre of religious work here, and I think I may safely say that in its outward appearance, as regards religion, it will compare favorably with any town in England. There are few towns in England where the First-day is better observed, or where there is a better attendance at the places of worship; and since I came here I have not seen, to my knowledge, more than two persons drunk. There are but few people seen about the streets during the hours of public worship, and there cannot be much fewer than 10,000 people who are in the habit of attending one or other of the thirteen Protestant places of worship within the town and its suburbs, every First-day; and of these, about three or four hundred are frequently engaged in preaching either in the town or the surrounding villages; of these, about sixty or seventy go out every First-day to assist the village congregations,—most of them walking five or six or eight miles, and some of them much further. Where is the town in England, of 50,000 inhabitants, where an equal amount of apparent religious life can be shown? And looking at this picture, we are apt to suppose that everything else is in proportion. But here we find ourselves much disappointed. A low standard of integrity, truthfulness and morality is painfully apparent. A fulsome servility to the rich and the great leads to most unsuitable appointments of officers in their churches. An excessive love of money, and a painful unwillingness to part with it for the advancement of Christ's cause, is another sad feature of their character. And seeing these things, we remember, too, that the attendance of their places of worship has very greatly increased since the Government encouraged Christianity, and we are inclined to suppose that we must account for the good attendance of their churches by political or other inferior motives. The absence of drunkenness, also, does not tell for much, as the sale of intoxicating liquor is strictly prohibited by the Government—and a capital thing that it is so. We see, too, that a sort of passion for preaching seizes most of the young men who join the churches, and very inferior and improper motives are often painfully apparent. Other unsatisfactory symptoms show themselves, dwelling on which we easily become sceptical of the sincerity of a great proportion of the religious profession which we see; and here we are quite as much in danger of estimating the religious life too low, as the first impressions are likely to be too high.

My own firm conviction is, that with much that is unsatisfactory, there is a great work going on in this country, of which the Holy Spirit is the author; and that with much that is merely outside profession, there is a large amount of genuine Christianity which is decidedly on the increase. Paul's epistles to the Corinthians show a state of things in the Church of Corinth which would justly shock English Christians if such a state of things existed in England; yet we know certainly that the Lord had "much people in that city." And in judging of the state of a Christian church in England, we must take into account the hundreds of years of moral and religious training which the English nation has enjoyed, and which has raised a standard of right doing which is an unspeakable help. There has been nothing of the kind here, nor had there been at Corinth, and we cannot in any reason expect that in countries where the change has so rapidly taken place, a high standard should at once prevail; nor can we expect that Satan, who has been foiled in his attempt to crush out Christianity here by persecution, should leave untried his cruel arts to spoil in every possible way the work which he cannot stop.

As yet I have been speaking mainly of the capital; but the same remarks will apply to a great extent to about 120 villages, large and small, within a circuit of about twenty miles, only there are very few in which we see the effects of Christianity so strikingly as in the capital, whilst the unsatisfactory symptoms are more evident. There is sometimes compulsion used on the part of the authorities in their respective districts to induce attendance at the chapel, and the servile submission to the great is still more apparent. At the same time there are many most interesting little companies of Christians in these country districts.

We are often struck with the amount of what would be called legal preaching on the part of the native preachers, and any one disposed to carp would find abundant occasion to do so when listening to them. Still, there are not a few whose addresses are earnest and simple, and which are, I fully believe, attended with a blessing from above. And though many go about preaching, whose qualifications, to say the least, are of a doubtful character, I cannot but think that this desire to preach is on the whole a great blessing.

Paul rejoiced that Christ was preached, though some "preached Christ of contention," "even of envy and strife." There does not seem to be much of such preaching here; the temptation is rather to preach for the sake of gaining applause and a position in the church; but I do not see why we have not as much cause to rejoice as Paul had in this readiness to preach, when, as in this country, there are such numbers who know nothing of the first rudiments of Christianity and of its requirements.

Some will perhaps be inquiring, "With all this native work going on, what position does the missionary hold?" This is not difficult to answer. There are nine leading churches in the capital, each of which has a country district attached to it, containing from ten to thirty or more village churches each. There are at present six missionaries residing at the capital, and, bearing very much the relation of pastor to the town church, and of bishop to the country churches, they have no lack of work. And besides the oversight and assistance rendered directly to these churches, there is a large amount of other work in connection with schools, translations, writing, etc., which leaves them very little leisure.

It will require great care and wisdom on their part to prevent their respective churches being too dependent upon them. At present the missionaries are, apparently, the power that directs the whole. There is a great lack of arrangement and order in the native mind, except in connection with compulsion. The master can regulate the movements of his slaves, the officer can march his soldiers about as he pleases, but voluntary work needs a directing hand from some one more used to it than these people are. This is the place occupied by the missionaries, in addition to the large amount of religious teaching which they impart, and most essential it is in the present state of things. Yet, in the attempt thus to regulate and direct, there is great danger of losing the relation of brother and becoming the master.

But a more interesting question perhaps to most of my readers will probably be, "What part can Friends take in this work, and what have they already done?" The latter question had better be answered first. A sum of three hundred pounds or more was spent by Friends before my companions and I left England, in building and furnishing schools, which have been under the care of the London Missionary Society. The money so spent has been of great assistance to the mission, and I trust it will still prove to be so; but the first school so built, owing to the death of the school-master, has not till lately been of the service it might otherwise have been, for want of a proper teacher; and the educational part of the mission was for some time its weak point. For it is impossible for the missionaries, with the many claims upon their time and thought which their engagements with the various churches under their care impose upon them, to give much time to school teaching. Now, a well-qualified energetic teacher has come out, under the auspices of the London Missionary Society, but still two or three English teachers are as nothing to supply the educational wants of Antananarivo. There are numbers of young men that would gladly avail themselves of pretty regular school teaching if there was any European to give it them, and greatly many of them stand in need of it on the simplest subjects; and the young women are in still greater need of help than the young men.

(To be concluded.)

EVENING PRAYER.

I come to Thee to-night,
In my lone closet where no eye can see,
And dare to crave an interview with Thee,
Father of love and light.

Softly the moonbeams shine
On the still branches of the shadowy trees,
While all sweet sounds of evening on the breeze
Steal through the slumbering vine.

Thou gav'st the calm repose
That rests on all; the air, the birds, the flower,
The human spirit in its weary hour,
Now at the bright day's close.

'T is Nature's time for prayer;
The silent praises of the glorious sky,
And the earth's orisons profound and high,
To Heaven their breathings bear.

With them my soul would bend
In humble reverence at thy Holy Throne,
Trusting the merits of thy Son alone,
Thy sceptre to extend.

If I this day have striven
With thy blest Spirit, or have bowed the knee
To aught of earth in weak idolatry,
I pray to be forgiven.

If in my heart has been
An unforgiving thought, or word, or look,
Though deep the malice which I scarce could brook,
Wash me from the dark sin.

If I have turned away
From grief or suffering which I might relieve,
Careless the cup of water e'en to give,
Forgive me, Lord, I pray.

And teach me how to feel
My sinful wanderings with a deeper smart;
And more of mercy and of grace impart,
My sinfulness to heal.

Father! my soul would be
Pure as the drops of eve's unsullied dew—
And as the stars whose nightly course is true—
So would I be to Thee.

Not for myself alone
Would I these blessings of thy love implore;
But for each penitent, the wide earth o'er,
Whom Thou hast called thine own.

And for my heart's best friends,
Whose steadfast kindness o'er my painful years
Has watched, to soothe affliction's griefs and tears,
My warmest prayer ascends.

Should o'er their path decline
The light of gladness, or of hope, or health,
Be Thou their solace, and their joy, and wealth,
As they have long been mine.

And now, O Father, take
The heart I cast with humble faith on Thee,
And cleanse its depths from each impurity,
For my Redeemer's sake.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—Advices from Europe are to the 8th inst.

Great Britain.—George Peabody died in London on the 4th, in his 75th year. General sorrow for this event was expressed in the journals, and many public manifestations were made by draping buildings, &c. The Queen directed that his funeral services should be held in Westminster Abbey on the 12th, and that the remains should be deposited in the royal vault until the time for their removal to America.

Ireland.—Archbishop Cullen, the head of the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland, has issued a pastoral enjoining all members of societies similar to the Fenian organization, to abandon them, referring to the evils produced by secret societies in Spain and Italy, and saying that the members of such associations will incur the penalty of excommunication.

A number of priests returning from a land-meeting at Cavan were assaulted by persons lying in wait, and so badly beaten that one died in consequence. The assailants were supposed to be Orangemen, and the Coroner's jury had brought in a verdict of murder against seven men who were implicated.

France.—Several electoral meetings were held in Paris on the 4th, without disorder and without interference, but some were dissolved by the police. Henri Rochefort, who has for some time been publishing at Brussels a paper called the Lonterne, which strongly opposed the Emperor and his political proceedings, and the circulation of which was forbidden in France, having recently set out to return to Paris, was arrested on the frontier, but was subsequently released and provided with a safe conduct, by the Emperor's order. He has since addressed a political meeting in Paris, and has been nominated as a candidate for member of the Legislative Body from one ward of that city. Ledru Rollin, a noted republican in 1848, who has been in exile in England for several years, has accepted a nomination from another district, but without taking the oath of personal fidelity to the Emperor.

Belgium.—The concession for a telegraphic cable proposed to be laid from Ostend to some point on the Atlantic coast of the United States, between Maine and Georgia, by an American company, was signed in Paris by the Belgian Minister on the 5th inst.

Spain.—A manifesto was expected in Madrid on the 8th from the ex-Queen, announcing her abdication in favor of her son; but a telegram was received from Paris countermanding, by her order, the publication of the document.

A change had taken place in the Ministry, by the retirement of some of the members, the question of candidates for the monarchy being the cause of difference. Admiral Topete, Minister of Marine, also resigned, contrary to the wishes of the Regent and of Prim, the Prime Minister. It is now reported that the opposition to the Duke of Genoa is growing stronger. The Cortes has again adjourned.

Germany.—Quite heavy shocks of earthquak are reported to have been felt on the 1st inst throughout Germany, particularly in Darmstadt Wiesbaden, Mayence and Frankfort.

Prussia.—The budget laid before the Diet by th Ministers recommends the creation of a sinking fund to absorb one per cent. annually for the pub lic debt, with a view to its ultimate extinction; an also proposes the conversion of the present loa into 4½ per cent. rentes. If the Chamber agree t these measures, the proposal for an augmentatio of taxes will be withdrawn.

Austria.—The insurrection at Cattaro in Dal matia is reported suppressed.

The Emperor of Austria arrived at Athens on th 3d, on a visit to the King of Greece.

Turkey.—Dispatches from Constantinople, re ceived in London on the 8th, reported that owin to the combined efforts of the diplomatic corps i that city, there is a prospect of securing free navi gation of the Dardanelles for the merchant marin of all nations. The representations of foreign en voys have been favorably received by the Sultan who appears disposed to concede their demands.

It is now said that the Sultan will not attend th opening of the Suez Canal.

Africa.—A letter has been received in London dated at Zanzibar, Ninth month 9th, giving infor mation that letters from Dr. Livingstone ha reached the British consul there, on the previou day, dated Eighth month, 1868. He was in goo health, and had spent the year previous in explor ing the region lying south of Lake Tanganyika which he found to contain many small springs o inner lakes, which he regards as the true source of the Nile. As he requested that certain supplie should be dispatched to him, including almanacs fo 1869 and 1870, it is supposed that he intended re maining in the country for a long time, and he gav no indication of his proposed course, or of the poin at which he expected to emerge on his way home ward.

East Indies.—On the 27th of Tenth month a se vere earthquake occurred at Manilla, in the Philip pine Islands. All the houses were shaken, and part of the city walls fell.

South America.—Advices from Panama, of th 38th ult., say that the volcano of Puchace, in Co lombia, about twenty miles from Popayan, broke out into eruption on the 4th ult., emitting immense quantities of smoke, flame, sulphur and ashes. It was feared that the towns and villages in its vicinity must have been buried by the ashes, and many of the inhabitants destroyed. Soon after the eruption, the river Cauca was observed to rise very suddenly, bringing down great numbers of dead bodies both of men and animals. At Tacna, in Peru, a rather strong earthquake was experienced on the 7th ult., but no unusual movement is reported from any other quarter. It is stated, indeed, that on the days for which Falb predicted violent earthquakes, the whole of Peru enjoyed a singular immunity from such visitations, although for a year past one part or another of the country has been frequently subjected to them. The alarm which his predictions had excited in Peru has subsided.

Domestic.—The Board of Education in Cincinnati decided on the 1st inst., by a vote of 22 to 15, to exclude from the public schools the reading of the Bible, public prayer and the singing of hymns. An injunction was granted in the State Supreme Court, on the 2d, restraining the Board from carrying this resolution into effect.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.... 208

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING—(Concluded from page 107.)—The report of the Central Book and Tract Committee showed a very creditable activity, both in printing and distribution. The assortment of profitable reading matter thus provided is great, and the territorial range of distribution very extensive. Friends in every section are under obligation to this Committee for the provision thus made, and tract distributors may find it desirable to make purchases at Richmond.

The Committee on Indian Affairs made a satisfactory report of their care of the Shawnee Manual Labor School, and of the farm and the whole charge committed to them.

A committee appointed to have the necessary care of the several large meetings for worship during the sessions of the Yearly Meeting, reported that they were generally satisfactory "except that at one of the stands a few individuals manifested a spirit of insubordination." From various sources we learn that much evidence was known of the presence of our heavenly Father, and of His love and care for His Church.

It was resolved to continue the Christian efforts on behalf of the Freedmen, and the duty was committed to a "Missionary Board" composed of twelve men and six women, "whose duty it shall be to have control of the work, and to encourage and sustain qualified workers in laboring for the elevation and Christianization of the colored people, in whatever openings may be presented."

The following minute upon the state of Society is suggestive of themes for reflection:

Under a solemn covering of the holy Spirit, the Meeting entered upon the consideration of the state of the church by reading the queries and answers to them from the Quarterly Meetings, by which we were introduced into an earnest desire for the growth in grace and advancement in the truth of all our members, and for the extension of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ upon the earth.

"We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren." Those who have been justified by faith and sanctified by the Holy Spirit love Christ our Saviour and one another, and are distinguished as His disciples;—not servants only but friends. The mission of the church is, to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Our forefathers felt this to be their duty,—it remains to be ours. Let us labor for the extension of the knowledge of God throughout the earth; to this end may the unity of the Spirit and the bond of peace exist amongst us.

We must love not only our friends but our enemies,—"when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of His son;" we should follow His holy example and obey His instructions, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you, that ye may be children of your Father which is in heaven."

The Lord has revived His work and has especially visited this people. With this revival there has been an opening of fields abroad for us to enter into. When the Saviour pointed His disciples to the fields already white unto the harvest, they were to pray for laborers to enter into the harvest. Those who are called upon to labor in His harvest-field need renewed baptism and greater consecration to their Lord, and as they live close to His side and abide under His hand, will be prepared for His work.

We were bought with the blood of Christ, the sacrifice made on Calvary was to save and sanctify us, and may every member who has realized this, in hnmility, so walk as to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour and be kept in His love. We should commend ourselves by pureness, by knowledge, by long suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the armor of righteousness, and thus be effective in waging a warfare against the sins of the world,

The tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity, an unruly evil full of deadly poison; it can only be controlled by the Spirit of the Lord when it takes possession of our hearts. We should be exceedingly careful that by no unguarded expression we separate very friends and sow seeds of discord in the Church and in the world. "Let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak," and be especially careful how we hear. We sometimes impugn the motives of a brother and attribute his actions to wrong grounds. We love to hear about others and love to tell what we hear, sometimes claiming that it is to advance the cause of Christ that we do so. We should not judge others from reports that we hear concerning them, nor be instrumental in spreading such reports. Let us be careful not to speak lightly of others, especially before our children.

Avoid corrupt conversation. "Let your conversation be as becometh the gospel of Christ." We should restrain both ourselves and our children from the use of improper and vulgar expressions, and carefully abstain from all those popular phrases which are the offspring of an evil heart, and find utterance from the abundance thereof. "Put off filthy communications out of your mouth." Parents should be especially careful not to permit their children to mingle freely with those who may be in their employment who are not guarded in these respects, and whose example may imperceptibly lead the children into habits revolting and improper. "Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord." Purity of heart and life are enjoined by our blessed Saviour. Cultivate no impure thoughts and they will not find utterance in words. Parents should teach their children, commencing early in life, the necessity for purity, and should warn them against all that is obscene and vile; false delicacy has prevented many from discharging their duty in this respect. Children should be restrained from evil company, especially from such as they will meet with at places of public resort, and where idle persons assemble; the influence of the conversation of such upon them is very great. If Christians find themselves thrown into such company, they should be careful not to give countenance to evil conversation by the appearance of approval, but by their acts, at least, show their disapprobation of it.

We continue to feel deeply the necessity for educating our children in the principles of the Christian religion. Whilst we have no prescribed form of dress, it has ever been the desire of Friends to maintain simplicity in our habits of life, and in our dress and conversation, and a correct and careful deportment, as becomes the disciple of Christ. Parents should teach their children the necessity of conversion, and of faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and that the observance of no outward forms, or rule of conduct, will give them a claim to membership in the true Church of Christ.

We regret that so many cases of the unnecessary use of intoxicating liquors have occurred. We have so long and so earnestly borne a testimony against this evil practice that we are pained to see any appearance of an increase of it. The manufacture and use of domestic wines is believed to have a hurtful influence and tends to present a temptation to our children and to lead them into habits of intemperance. Subordinate Meetings and individual members are desired not to relax their efforts to promote the cause of temperance in the land.

The necessity for the spirit of restoring love in dealing with offenders, and of endeavoring to bring back to the fold those who have strayed from it, was brought to view. We should go out in the spirit of the Lord and seek for such, deeply impressed with the value of their souls. If we love our neighbor as ourselves, we shall speak kindly to an erring brother, and sympathy and affection will do much towards gaining him.

We should be careful to comply with our contracts and engagements, both written and verbal, and to pay our debts seasonably. We often inflict injury upon others by withholding their just dues, and bring great reproach upon the cause of truth. "They that will be rich fall into temptation." The desire for the sudden accumulation of wealth has led many into much trouble. "Be not one of them that are surety for debts," is an injunction which we would impress upon all of our members. Much suffering has resulted from a want of attention to it. The sin of lotteries and gambling, in all the forms in which they are now presented, should be carefully guarded against. Parents should know where their sons are spending their evenings, and be careful that they do not frequent those haunts of evil which abound in our cities and towns; they are frequently the entering way to many crimes. The saloon, the gambling-house, the brothels, are all a part of Satan's plan to entrap the youth. Let all parents so love their children as to make them their companions, and endeavor to make home so comfortable and attractive as to keep them from evil places.

The habit of improperly criticising the ministry and speaking slightly of the services and labors of the Lord's servants, should be avoided, especially in the presence of our children. On the contrary, let the ministers feel that they have the sympathy, support and prayers of all.

The statistical tables have interested us much. This meeting desires that all our subordinate Meetings and members may extend care and labor to gather into our fold many of those throughout our land who are not connected with any religious society, but whose sympathy and feeling is with Friends. Many of them have been cut off from our Society, for some cause, often not involving any moral evil or doctrinal unsoundness, and not being willing to connect themselves with any other denomination, are living without religious association. Let a kind invitation and Christian sympathy be extended toward them. We believe that if this was done it would not only help them, but remove an obstacle to the spread of our principles and benefit the church. The tendency of the present times is towards union with those of similar views, and may we not be deficient in doing our part towards gathering together all who held the doctrines and principles which we are called upon to bear.

We would again renew and impress the advice so often and so earnestly given that parents and heads of families would not neglect the duty of family worship. Collect your households daily, read the Bible, draw nigh unto God, and when ability is afforded, lift the voice in prayer unto Him. We believe that this course will be blessed, as it has been abundantly, and that the effect upon our dear children will be of incalculable value, and parents themselves will experience renewed strength and ability to meet the cares and responsibilities which rest upon them, and know a growth in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

We have been made to rejoice together at this time and to feel greatly encouraged. May all our dear friends thank God and take courage and enter with renewed energy and zeal into the Lord's work.

The following among other statistics are gleaned from various reports to the Yearly Meeting:

No. of members, 15,172—Males, 6820; Females, 6909.

No. of families, 2669; parts of families, 1184.

Each family is furnished with the Holy Scriptures; 1240 are in the daily practice of reading them collectively with a devotional pause; 823 do so frequently; 358 occasionally; 291 neglect this duty; 20 families not inquired of. Several Monthly Meetings did not report definitely.

No. of recorded ministers, 129.

No. of established meetings, 115.

New meetings established within the year:

A Meeting for Worship by the name of Fairview, 3½ miles north of New Vienna in Clinton Co., Ohio, within the limits of Fairfield Quarterly Meeting. A Meeting for Worship and Preparative, by the name of Beech Grove, within the limits of New Garden Monthly and Quarterly Meetings. A Monthly Meeting by the name of Deer Creek, and a Preparative by the name of East Branch, within the limits of Northern Quarterly Meeting. A Monthly Meeting by the name of Shawnee, at Shawnee, Johnson Co., Kansas. A Monthly Meeting by the name of Lawrence, at the city of Lawrence, Douglas Co., and a Meeting for Worship and a Preparative, by the name of Fairview, in Leavenworth Co., all within the limits of Kansas Quarterly Meeting.

Two ministers and ten elders deceased within the year, and 15 ministers recorded during the same period.

A satisfactory report of Earlham College was received (for a notice of which it is hoped to find space in another number) and $2000 appropriated for improvements in the buildings.

The 17th Annual Report of White's Indiana Manual Labor Institute, shows a healthful condition and satisfactory progress of the children, a religious care over them, prosperity in the farming interests, and a balance of available assets of $2301.01. The inspecting committee reported the religious and literary interests duly cared for, the accounts of the Treasurer and the character of its securities for loans in good order, and the general interests of the Institution in a prosperous condition. [This will interest the many friends of our late beloved friend Josiah White.]

An appropriation of $1000 was made for educational purposes, &c., in North Carolina.

A committee, consisting of seven men and five women Friends, was appointed "to visit subordinate meetings as way may be open, for the establishment and building up in the most holy faith of our members, and the furtherance of the work of the Lord among us." Report was made by the Committee and the Executive Committee on PEACE. [This has been set forth at large in our report of Ohio Yearly Meeting.]

The Committee on the holding of General Meetings was reappointed.

A vigorous grasp was continued of the First-day School question as a concern of the Yearly Meeting. Ninety-two schools were reported. No. of pupils enrolled, 7375; average attendance, 4729; adult pupils, 2345; no. in infant class, 874. No. of teachers and officers, 592. No. of libraries, 49; volumes, 4184. Papers distributed, 1362. As a number of schools failed to send reports, it is believed that all the above figures are too low.

Epistles were issued, addressed to all the corresponding Yearly Meetings, and one to "Friends' Foreign Mission Association," expressive of love, sympathy and encouragement for Louis and Sarah Street in Madagascar, and Elkanah and Irene Beard in India, all members of Indiana Yearly Meeting, laboring under many privations in the cause of Christ. "Under a solemn covering of the Holy Spirit, prayer arose to Him whom they are endeavoring to serve, for their preservation, and that they may be enabled to labor for His glory."

The following correspondents now appointed should be noted in the copies of the Book of Meetings:

For Deer Creek Mo. Meeting, Daniel Harris, Jonesboro, Indiana. For Centre Mo. Meeting, John Carey, Wilmington, Ohio. For Shawnee Mo. Meeting, John H. Vestal, Shawnee, Kansas.

The new Quarterly Meeting named Hesper is to be held at Spring Grove the first Seventh-day in the Sixth month, and at Springfield the first Seventh-day in the 3d, 9th and 12th months, at 11 A.M. The meeting for Ministers and Elders the day previous, at 2 P.M.

Other matters of business necessarily claimed the attention of the Yearly Meeting, which being harmoniously transacted, the adjournment was made, in unity and in much love.

MADAGASCAR.

At a critical time like the present in the history of this island, it is very important that every opportunity should be taken to enlarge and strengthen the minds of the natives by a judicious system of education, and so long as this is intimately connected with the religious movement, it cannot but be very beneficial. Here, then, is a field in which Friends have begun to work, and which is open for their occupation; but it needs not only money, but men and women qualified for their work to carry it on with any effect. . . .

My companion has found his work mainly in teaching the Bible classes connected with the various congregations chiefly in the country districts. The teaching given in these classes forms a most important part of the missionary work here. Most of the congregations, town and country, have a weekly class in connection with them. In some the attendance is very good, in others it is less so, but in them all there is no lack of interest in the teaching given, and, as far as my experience goes, it is much easier to reach the hearts and minds of the people in these free conversational meetings than in the more formal services conducted on the First-day. It is in the frequent and regular attendance of these classes that my companion has found much of his work to lie.

As to the women, little has yet been done by us, except as regards the interesting school to which S. T. Street has devoted a good deal of time and care, and which, now that Helen Gilpin has come to her assistance, will, I hope, prove still more effective. The missionaries' wives, with their families of little children, cannot do much of missionary work, but it is greatly needed among the women; and here, too, is a field in which Friends can most usefully work.

As yet my remarks have had reference exclusively to the capital and the villages immediately surrounding it; and if in this district of say one thousand square miles there is abundant work not only for the present missionaries but for several others, whether of the London Missionary Society or our own Society, what are we to say of the remaining 199,000 square miles, in which three Norwegian missionaries, and three others of the Church of England, are the only residents? It is true that in a large portion of this immense tract of country there is little or no apparent opening for the labor of European missionaries. In many places the unhealthiness of the climate, in others the barbarous character of the inhabitants, would be a serious obstacle. But I should like to draw attention to a few places where there is an open door and a loud call for help.

The first I will mention is Vonizongo, a large district of Imerina, the country of the Hovas, to the north-west of Antananarivo, and only about two days' journey from that town. Here there is a large Christian population, about thirty flourishing churches, and much that is very interesting in the character of the people. Apparently there is a greater simplicity, less servility, and in some respects a higher tone of morality than what we see at the capital. Perhaps the distance from the court may have something to do with this difference. There are, however, no schools there. Two or three times a year they receive a visit of a fortnight or so from two of the missionaries, who have barely time to visit each of the churches; and a few natives from this district visit the capital every now and then, and they cry loudly for assistance. Louis Street paid a very interesting visit to this part of the country, and his letter describing that visit has, I trust, been for the some time in possession of our friends in England. The missionaries here have urged upon the Board in London the needs of this district, and have applied for a missionary for it. I feel sure that two families of Friends residing there would find a most useful sphere of labor in the establishing and superintendence of schools. Their country borders on the Sakalava, who occupy the whole of the western side of the island, and who are yet in the grossest heathen darkness. There are some missionary spirits among the Christians of Vonizongo, who venture occasionally to preach the gospel in some of the villages of the Sakalava. Vonizongo is perhaps to be one of the doors through which light shall penetrate the darkness beyond. As far as we can learn, a large portion of this district is as healthy as Antananarivo; other parts have their seasons when fever is prevalent.

Then there is the Betsileo territory, under the control of the Hovas to a great extent, a large and populous district on the high lands south of the Imerina, and containing, it is supposed, many more inhabitants. In the Hova capital of this territory, Fianarantsoa, there are two or three churches, and there are several others in the adjacent towns. Here there is another centre for very extensive missionary work. Till within the last year or two no missionary had been to them, and the Christians residing there were almost exclusively Hovas, who had been sent there by the government. Now, Christianity seems to be spreading among the Betsileo themselves. The London Missionary Society feel the importance of the work in this district, and it has been decided by them to send out two missionaries into that field. Fianarantsoa is about eight days' journey south of the capital, and the climate is said to be quite as healthy as here. The people, too, are said quite to equal the Hovas in intelligence, and to be superior to them in some other qualities. They have in times past received many injuries from the Hovas, who were guilty of many bloody and most disgraceful acts in making the conquest of their country, and this has hitherto presented a formidable barrier to the reception of the gospel from their hands. The mild rule of the present goverument seems, however, to be removing some of the bitter feelings which had previously existed.

Since writing the above paragraph, I have had a very interesting conversation with a young man who has just returned from spending a few weeks at Fianarantsoa. The account he gives of the state of things there is very encouraging. About this time last year, when two of the missionaries visited that part of the island, there were but seven or eight churches there; now there are forty or more. Then, with the exception of one church, there were few attenders at these churches except the Hovas: now, the majority of those attending are the native Betsileo. Their capital is not equal in size to Ambohimanga, the second town in Imerina, but there are three churches there, and one has about one thousand attenders every Sabbath day. The ill feeling between Hova and Betsileo seems to be rapidly dying out under the benign influence of the Gospel of peace. But the people are crying out loudly for schools. I think my informant said that in one congregation of one hundred and fifty attenders that he met with, there was not one who was able to read. The movement among the Betsileo is altogether new. The population probably is not less than a million. There is at present a door wide open; are there none among us ready to devote themselves to the work?

Then there is a very large and very populous district about a week's journey to the north of Imerina, Antsianaka, where one native missionary from Antananarivo is stationed, but where as yet very little progress has been made. A comparatively harmless people these are, but sunk in the grossest ignorance. There are dense forests in the neighborhood, and we often meet with the natives carrying timber on their shoulders to the Government works, as their tax to the Hovas. One of the missionaries is at present spending a month in visiting this district. There are many parts where fever is prevalent during part of the year, especially in the densely-populated district on the shores of a very large lake; but for more than half the year there is little danger, and on the high ground I expect it is healthy all the year round.

Then quite to the south of the island, near Fort Dauphin, is another district on the seashore, said to be quite healthy, where there is a large population. I do not know what kind of opening there is here, but no other missionary society has ever been in the field, and several circumstances lately have called our attention to it. It is under the control of the Hovas, though not to much extent, and there is a little company of Christians in connection with the Hovas in that locality.

On the sea-coast to the north-west, is an important port, Majanga. There are a few native Christians there, composed mainly of the Hovas, sent there by the Government. It is quite in the Sakalava district. Several American vessels have found their way to it, and it is frequently visited by Arab dhowies from Zanzibar and Mozambique, who are often guilty of importing slaves. It is about a month's journey from here on foot. Here, again, is a field of labor quite away from those occupied by the London Missionary Society or any other society.

There is another large town, Mahabo, about the centre of the western coast, in the Sakalava district, where there is a small settlement of Hovas and a church; but of this place at present we know but little. It is far removed from any missionary settlement, and it seems calculated for another centre of operations.

The dialect of the Betsileo is in some respects different from that of the Hovas; but the difference is so slight that the Bible and the few books printed here are understood by those who can read, and there is a great demand for them. And this leads me to another field of labor which is very important, that is, the translation and the composition of books in the native language. We all of us feel the need there is of books very much, and we make some effort to supply the want; but with the numerous engagements which press upon us, it is very slow work indeed. This need has from the first led me to devote a large portion of time to the teaching of English, in the hope that in a few years some of those learning it would be able to afford very valuable assistance in the translation of English books. It has been very uphill work, as I have had to make my books as I go on; but I am quite encouraged with the progress already made. . . . . .

The educational department of the mission is one to which Friends can devote themselves heartily and earnestly without finding themselves involved in any proceedings which would have a tendency to make their minds uneasy; and it is one in which the door will be found wide open for disseminating the truths of the Gospel in all their simplicity. But with a well-qualified teacher, in connection with the London Missionary Society, residing at the capital, I doubt the desirableness of much increasing our staff of workers here. We are now building two large and substantial schools—one for boys and young men, the other for girls and young women. I should be very glad to see a well-qualified teacher come out, who could take constant charge of the first; and additional help in the female department is also desirable. But it is to the Betsileo and Vonizongo districts that I most long to see help afforded just now. And should we be able thus to extend our mission, and have co-workers, supported by the Friends' Foreign Mission Association, in other parts of the island, I feel sure that the station at Antananarivo will prove very helpful in many ways. It will afford ready communication with the Government in case it is required; it will form a depot for books and other materials required, as well as facilitate in many cases the forwarding needful funds. And I trust, too, that the schools established here would prove of great assistance in furnishing teachers for other parts of the island, and in educating young men sent from other parts of the island for this purpose.—Monthly Record.

DOES OBEDIENCE SAVE US?

This question occurred after reading with interest a communication (signed φ) in a late number of the Review, on "Completeness of Character." The answer, upon meditation, appeared to be clear. It is not obedience that saves thee, but Christ. But if thou art not obedient, thou art out of Christ. Simple as this is, a difference exists between it and the bare statement that we are saved by obedience; and the difference has practical importance. True, as was long ago said, "God, who has made us without us, will not save us without us." Our wills must be Christ's; we shall not be saved against our wills. But is there not disadvantage in any statement which would seem to leave it open for any to think that men can be saved of their own wills alone, or that their wills (or obedience) have in themselves saving power? In this is a danger of confounding two states or relations, quite different, under the law and gospel. One who has never sinned, or fallen short of the glory of God, is safe (not needing to be saved) in his obedience. Those who have sinned would forever continue in their sins, but that the grace of God through Christ lifts them up and gives them, with forgiveness through His atonement, new power of obedience. Thus alone can they now live; by His power, not their own. By Him they are, "except they be reprobate," made perfect; and this is the only perfection men can ever attain to. Both at the beginning and the culmination of the Christian's career it is equally true, in regard to our relation to Christ, that we are complete in Him.

CONSTANT READER.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGIOUS SECTARISM, —WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE ANCIENT JEWISH SECTS.

BY FRANCIS FRITH.

The Pharisees, whilst professing to reverence the Scriptures, actually substituted the traditions by which, as our Lord told them, they made the Scriptures of none effect. In this matter, they set the precedent which modern Judaism has even extended. They said, in effect, that the written law was not comprehensive enough, nor strict enough, to embrace all the requirements of their pretended sanctity, and so they invented forms and austerities innumerable to elude the spirit of the commandments, and at the same time to cheat by an appearance of greater minuteness and requirement.

Dr. Lightfoot says of them, that "the best of Pharisees was the worst of men;" and Lewis, that "they were but religious villains, the most insolent and implacable generation that ever any age produced." Another writer states: "It is indeed quite true that the religion of the Pharisees was, for the most part, founded on that most awful and consummate of hypocrisies which makes the profession of sanctity a veil for selfishness of heart, under which the pursuit of worldly gain, honor and influence, might be sought securely. And that while claiming to be the singular favorites of God, and to honor Him and to do Him service beyond all men, they altogether neglected the weightier matters of the law—justice, mercy and truth, and found full scope within their system for all the evil passions and propensities of their hearts—were proud, arrogant, grasping, deceitful, implacable and cruel."

However true all this may be of the bulk of the sect, there were certainly some within its pale to whom such description is not applicable, for instance, Paul and Gamaliel. Still, the Pharisee stands charged by Christ himself with deep hypocrisy and aggravated selfishness.

But whilst we see in our own time too much of that which resembles Pharisaism, we have also the other and more "respectable" element of irreligion, the comparatively *un*professing and indifferent; and so, of necessity, had the Jews. Not that impudent form of infidelity which glories in its shame, nor even that which would willingly be esteemed irreligious—such were not the Sadducees.

They, too, professed to reverence the sacred writings, but especially the books of Moses, and so much the more than the Pharisees, in that they rejected the traditions. They were glad enough of reverence and consideration for themselves if it fell in their way; but they laid their account for happiness in this life—therefore they sought and possessed riches, therefore (except politically, that they might not be overridden by their enemies, the Pharisees) they were not anxious to burden themselves with the control, or the teaching, or the bettering in any way of their fellow-men. They were the aristocracy of the nation; cold, comfortable, respectable, undemonstrative, useless men. It was impossible that their lives, ending as they professed with the grave, could have high and noble aims; it was impossible that their motives, limited as they were to the prospects of worldly gain and temporal loss, could lead them to any high standard of even moral excellence.

The sect was not numerous but select; not popular, but of great consideration and influence. Several of the high priests were Sadducees. By whatever means they obtained power they were severe in its exercise—notoriously so in the administration of the national laws; for since their creed was obviously open to the charge of encouraging vice and crime by removing the fear of punishment in an after-life, they made a point of exemplifying, by the severity of their judgments, that enough can be inflicted in this life to deter men from crime. It is noticeable, that whilst the Pharisees were the persecutors of Christ, as the subverter of the spirit of their formalities, the first persecution of the Apostles was under the high priesthood of a Sadducee, because the foundation of their preaching was the resurrection of Christ.

Now let us consider how greatly the religious apathy and unpretension which distinguished them from the Pharisees underlay their creed. How needful it seems that careless religionists should be free thinkers as were the Sadducees; how necessary to comfortable indifference not to be harassed with thoughts of a future state, or of its possible relation to "the deeds done in the body!"

Lastly, we turn to the third and smallest component portion of any people the world has yet known—the truly pious and devoted.

Certainly amongst the Jews of our Lord's time were some of this class; a few are presented in the gospels, and although they may not there be clearly associated with any sect, yet, when we have considered the testimony which several unprejudiced ancient authors have given to the characters of the Essenes, we may perhaps be inclined to conjecture that such men even as Simeon and John the Baptist may have arisen from their ranks.

A century and a half before the Christian era, the Essenes were a considerable and well-organized sect. At a distance from the capital, in some highly cultivated oasis near the shores of the Dead Sea, was their chief settlement. Here they numbered about 4,000. Amidst groves of palm trees, of which, says Pliny, "they were the companions," and the fertile fields won from the barren wilderness by their industry, they passed their lives, shunning cities lest they should be seduced by their vices.

First, hear Josephus—himself a Pharisee—"They teach the immortality of the soul, and that the rewards of the righteous are to be earnestly striven for. They enter not the courts of sacrifice, considering that they have purer (i. e. spiritual) offerings to make." "It deserves our admiration," he goes on to say, "how much they exceed all men who accustom themselves to virtue, and this in righteousness; indeed to such a degree as has never appeared amongst any other men."

Again, Philo says, "The leading principle of the sect is, that God can only be worshipped in spirit and in truth, by inward virtue, not by outward observances. Virtue, say they, consists in pure and disinterested love of God and of our neighbors. They reject sacrifices and all ceremonial rites, not only those that are enjoined by tradition, but also those commanded by Moses in the written law. Oaths and asseverations are strictly prohibited by them." War and slavery are also said to have been forbidden. They practised extreme frugality and simplicity of life, and carried out a complete system of community of goods. Upon this general stock any member might draw as he pleased, for benevolent uses.

There was, as might be expected, an ascetic offshoot from this sect—the Therapeutic—whose haunts were chiefly in the deserts around Alexandria. They were thorough recluses, devoted to mortification of the body and to religious meditation and study.

But as regards the orthodox sect of the Essenes, they were certainly the "Friends," not the monastics, as they have been called, of the Jewish nation. One scarcely sees how, with the light they possessed, men could be expected to form more correct views, or lead more holy lives.

In conclusion, I trust that I have succeeded in identifying the three prominent sects of the ancient Jews as embodiments of those great phases of religious development which have obtained in various degrees in all lands and at all times. It ought not to be without a practical lesson that we have noted — 1st, The hollow profession of the self-serving and self-righteous Pharisees; then, the worldly-minded indifference of the sceptical Sadducees; and lastly, the genuine piety and self-denying lives of the obscure yet illustrious Essenes.—Friends' Quarterly Examiner.

P. S.—It does not enter into the scope of this essay to give a detailed historical account of the Jewish sects. For such information see the articles, "Sadducee," "Pharisee," and "Essenes," in Dr. William Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible."

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH 20, 1869.

IDOLS IN THE HEART.—That the danger of idolatry, in a Scriptural sense of the word, is not confined to theoretic unbelievers, is evident from the injunction with which John closed one of his epistles: "Keep yourselves from idols." Six centuries B. C., certain men, not worshippers of Baal, but "Elders of Israel," took their seats with religious seeming, making, we doubt not, a goodly show. The Divine Word, however, warned Ezekiel respecting them. "These men have set up their idols in their heart"—and this was the message given to him:

"Say unto them—Thus saith the Lord God: 'Every man of the house of Israel that setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumbling-block of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to the prophet; I the Lord will answer him that cometh accordingly to the multitude of his idols, that I may take the house of Israel in their own heart." Again, to the same prophet the Lord declared against the man "that separateth himself from me, and setteth up his idols in his heart."

It is clear that we may become idolators even in carrying out our notions of religious truth, by giving unwarrantable prominence to a favorite dogma, by sectarian one-sidedness—by suffering partisan zeal to absorb the mind, bias the judgment and wean from the pure love of Truth and docile yielding to the Spirit's leadings. It is thus that schisms find admittance in the body, and those who make an idol of a party, advocate it through its involvements in wrong, and

> "Once entered upon crooked ways,
> The early truth which was their proper praise
> Doth not still walk beside them."

Hosea, predicting Israel's return unto the Lord, puts into the mouth of the sincere and complete convert the words: "What have I to do any more with idols?" And elsewhere the Holy Spirit says: "From all your idols will I cleanse you."

Of all idols, SELF is perhaps the most attractive and deceptive—deceptive to the victim though transparent to observers. The antidote is Christian humility—a heart-adoption of the motto,

"We are nothing—Christ is all."

For this idol, as of old for Diana, silver shrines are made. Sometimes it is enshrined in an urn, and takes the semblance of affection for departed friends and that grief which is held to be sacred and inviolate. Yet in such case the fine thought of Dr. Young is lost sight of:

"They mourn the dead, who live as they desire."

That sorrow is selfishness which shuts one up from the duties and labors of love for which the mourner is competent. When the whole conversation turns upon the exalted virtues of the deceased, it is, alas, too often apparent that the extreme of sorrow is a tribute to self, as having been closely associated with such merit. Whereas the truly child-like and well-instructed Christian will "wash and anoint," will say in sweet submissiveness (not in apathy,) "Thy will be done," and employ the leisure which bereavement has furnished, in soothing the sadness and ministering to the necessities of others. Excessive and unreasonable sorrow is forgetfulness of continued mercies which call for cheerful thanksgiving—is repining and replying against God who has only taken what he gave, and in doing this has exercised goodness and perfection of wisdom.

When the shadow of a great bereavement is upon us, it becomes us to sit in it with solemnity, thinking much of the departed, that we may profit by the lesson of their lives, pondering upon their Redeemer, who is more than willing to be our Saviour also. "He that is joined unto the Lord," said Paul, "is one Spirit"—and it is only by union in Him that we can be partakers of the Divine nature and have union with those spirits made perfect with whom we once walked lovingly "on this side death." "Don't cherish your sorrows"—says an anonymous writer—"when God breaks our idols in pieces, it is not for us to put the broken bits together again." So long as the obstrnctive idol SELF

"passes as a cloud between The mental eye of Faith and things unseen," we do not look steadfastly at things eternal—we do not appreciate the beauty of holiness—we do not see Him who is "chief among ten thousand and altogether lovely"—we do not so "look on the things of others," as to "bear one-another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

North Carolina.—As the present number of the Review must go to press earlier than usual, owing to a suspension of work in the printing office, we cannot give the transactions of North Carolina Yearly Meeting. The attendance is large of Friends from a distance, general interest having been felt in this body, which during our national conflict was painfully isolated, thongh never estranged from their brethren. The distant members of this Yearly Meeting have to make no small effort and sacrifice in going up to what is experienced by them to be a solemn feast. A correspondent informs of a dear friend in delicate health who by medical advice took passage in a steamer. The boat in its progress was pierced by a log, the pumps proved insufficient to vent the water which filled the cabins and extinguished the fires, and the danger was imminent. Through signal mercy the captain was enabled to run the boat upon the mud, and whilst waiting in hope of relief (which after long delay was sent to them,) the opportunity was embraced of a solemn meeting with the crew and passengers, the voice of thansgiving and prayer being heard, as also that of gentle pleading from an ambassador for Christ.

As on former occasions, the Boarding-School could not shelter the whole multitude, and many provided for themselves in wagons and tents.

On Seventh-day, the 6th inst., the Meeting of Ministers and Elders held at Deep River its opening sitting, which continued in session for five hours, and was a time of solemnity, in which the Head of the Church condescended to own the assembly with His gracious presence and favor. The credentials were read of seventeen ministers from abroad, viz.: From New England Y. M., Thos. B. Nichols, Alfred H. Jones, Phebe R. Gifford. From Ohio Y. M., Edward C. Young, Jesse T. Hartley. From Indiana Y. M., Rachel Binford, Mordecai Hiatt, John M. Pidgeon, Wm. P. Gallemore, Nathan Macy, Benj. Hockett, Robert Walter Douglas, Andrew P. Evans. From Western Y. M., Margaret Newsom, Ruth Ann Stanton, Ruth Clarke. From New York Y. M., Rebecca Collins. (Two of these Friends were detained from the first sittings.) Stafford Allen, an elder from London, was present. One of our correspondents says: "During the answering of the queries, much pertinent counsel was given, and a lively concern spreading over the meeting in regard to the state of Society, it was concluded to issue an epistle of advice to the subordinate meetings." To prepare an essay of such document a committee was separated.

On First-day morning a large company assembled in and around the venerable old meeting-house at New Garden, including many freedmen and freedwomen, who by deep attention showed their appreciation of the efforts which Friends have made for their intellectual, moral and spiritual well-being. One letter says:

"Lively testimonials to the Truth, and earnest appeals to all present to come at once to the Saviour of sinners, were made. Solemnity spread over the large concourse while supplication was offered to the Throne of Grace for the conversion of sinners, and for Divine help in time of need."

The meeting-house being insufficient for the multitude, about 400 persons assembled in the forest, where extempore seats had been provided: and the audience was attentive, but the snow-squall and cold wind in their faces made it difficult for the ministers to speak. The afternoon meeting was addressed with much earnestness, and an outpouring of affectionate zeal for the conversion of sinners, a number of ministers participating, and it is trusted that it was a season of awakening.

A large meeting was held on First-day morning at Deep River, and the crowd being too great for the house, a number drew together in the school-room. Both meetings were satisfactory and edifying. In the evening, good meetings, marked by very earnest exhortation, were held in the boys' and the girls' school-rooms at New Garden.

The details of the Yearly Meeting, which opened next day, must be deferred till next week. The First-day School Conference held on the 10th inst., was large, and filled the ancient Meeting-house. The general report gave a very favorable exhibit, and verbal reports being called for, were made from the several Monthly Meetings. A correspondent writes:

"One could not but be convinced that gathered here there was a mighty power far the moral renovation of the State."

Delegates were appointed to the Philadelphia Conference.

Claims for Sympathy.—It is difficult, perhaps impossible, for those who have not travelled in the South, to conceive the numerous cases of great hardship, each peculiar in character, which attended the late war, and which would furnish the material for a thrilling history of persecution and of the cruelties which are recklessly committed by persons not originally unamiable. Macauley describes "a man who, having been blessed by nature with a bland disposition, gradually brings himself to inflict misery upon his fellow creatures with indifference, with satisfaction, and at length with a hideous rapture." One of our correspondents was told by Jeremiah A. Grinnell, at New Garden, of the case of a woman in East Tennessee. Her husband was in the Union army, and the rebel soldiers surrounding her dwelling, she was ordered to take all her goods out of the house. They fired it, then burned her goods —then shot her son (a lad of 16,) through the head. She was sadly broken in health when her husband returned, wounded, to the afflicted remnant of his family. In the course of time he, his wife and children joined the Society of Friends. He was a man of unusual industry, and soon became thriving: but the utter failure of his crops renders him unable to send his children to school. A good one is near, under the care of Friends, but the price of tuition is needed to meet expenses, and there are others equally requiring aid. In the same neighborhood, a girl who frequented the Friends' First-day school, became, in a Methodist revival, the subject of deep religious concern, but could not be persuaded to go up to "the bench." She "desired to be still." The minister perceived that her spiritual need was such as to render the care and Christian sympathy of Friends congenial, and he informed them. She has been received into membership on the ground of religious convincement. She also needs education, which can be obtained at the rate of one dollar per month. If any reader feels drawn to contribute money for the schooling of children needing aid at Friends' schools in Tennessee, the Editor or the Publisher of Friends' Review will rejoice to receive funds for the purpose, which will be faithfully applied under the stewardship of judicious Friends.

THE FREEDMAN'S FRIEND.—The 21st No. of this important and interesting paper lies before us. It is issued gratuitously, and it is eminently proper and commendable for the Executive Board thus to report to contributors what application has been made of their liberality. It shows a business-like conscientiousness which warrants an extension of the confidence heretofore reposed in them. Bills incurred since the issue of the paper on our table "have reduced the treasury to emptiness." A circular, signed by the President and countersigned by the Chairman of the Instruction Committee, says:

"With the obligation to sustain over sixty teachers for nearly eight months, at an average cost of about $1600 per month, our confidence in the future is severely tested; but we have faith that the generous interest of Friends will be manifested as heretofore, and will sustain our hands."

It cannot be, we think, that this appeal will be received with apathy. Direct appropriations have been made for the benefit of the freed-people by several Yearly Meetings. In Philadelphia, the sympathy, we trust, is not weaker, nor the liberality more stinted. We do not doubt that, without waiting to be assessed, Friends will levy upon their own pockets.

MARRIED,

At Friends' meeting, Poplar Run, Ind., on the 23d of Ninth month, 1869, ABRAHAM SYMONDS to MARY ELIZABETH, daughter of Eli and the late Rachel Townsend.

At New York, on the 4th of Eleventh mo., 1869, WILLIAM R. THURSTON, JR., to MARIA H., daughter of Alden Sampson.

Under the auspices of Plainfield Monthly Meeting, Ind., on the 7th of Ninth month, 1869, BENJAMIN A. MORRIS, of Washington Co., to SUSAN S. WRIGHT, daughter of B. H. and S. A. Wright.

DIED.

MEKEEL.—Near Peekskill, N. Y., on the 7th of Eighth month, 1869, Jacob Mekeel, aged nearly 82 years; for many years an elder of Amawalk Monthly Meeting.

HORTON.—At West Newton, Ind., on the 31st of Tenth month, 1869, in the 12th year of his age, Christopher Columbus Horton, son of David and Sally Horton; members of Fairfield Mo. Meeting. Although so young, he was enabled through Divine grace to read his title clear to a mansion in the realms of eternal blessedness.

MORGAN.—On the 14th of Tenth month, 1869, after intense suffering for six weeks from a paralytic stroke, at his residence in Warren Counnty, Iowa, William H. Morgan, in the 77th year of his age; a beloved member and Elder of South River Monthly Meeting. In early life he was made sensible of the visitations of Divine Grace, and gave heed thereto, as he testified a few days before his death, that he "had loved his Saviour ever since he was a little boy." Possessing a sound and discriminating judgment, and entirely devoted to his Master's service, he became qualified early for usefulness in the Church militant, and was enabled to discharge the duties of his station in encouraging the faltering, as well as guarding against innovations upon our principles and testimonies, and was known as a peace-maker among the brethren. At the breaking out of the rebellion he was living in Jefferson County, Tenn., where he had been an Elder in the Church for nearly twoscore years. But believing the time had come when he should leave the land of slavery and seek a home in the free North-West, he and family, in the fall of 1861, started for the North, leaving his personal effects, which were soon seized by the rebel Government, and confiscated, as "property of an alien enemy," and sold at public auction,—even to the family Bible, which was bought by a rebel slaveholder, and sent to him two years afterwards, as a token of personal respect.

By the loss of his property he was deprived of the many comforts of this life, with which he had been blessed; yet, while suffering intense pain of body, but not of mind, he called his family around his bed, a few days before his death, and desired that a message be sent to the man who was instrumental in having his effects confiscated, stating that he forgave him and wished to meet him in Heaven.

Often during his sickness he would express to his family and others that his suffering was only in the body—that his mind was easy and all would be well with him, when the Master saw meet to clip the slender thread of life, which he was only patiently waiting for; that he had all faith in the atoning efficacy of the blood of Jesus Christ.

A short time before he breathed his last, with a beaming countenence, he said he saw his three deceased children—calling them by name, two daughters and a son—in Heaven, and that he would soon be with them; with the request that the eleven children still living and his dear companion might meet him there.

His Christian counsel and fatherly care will long be remembered by the large circle of friends who knew him.

LEWIS.—On the 15th of Ninth month, 1869, near Friends' Station, Tenn., Rebecca, wife of John B. Lewis, in her 46th year; a worthy member of Lost Creek Monthly Meeting. This dear Friend, although deprived for several years of the privilege of attending our meetings, manifested a great desire for the prosperity of the Redeemer's kingdom on the earth, and often had to mourn on account of the many breaches in the walls of Zion, fearing that theae was too much of an inclination to depart from that deep spiritual religion, and humble dependence and sole reliance on King Emanuel, which so eminently distinguished our predecessors.

COFFIN.—Near Westfield, Hamilton Co., Ind., on the morning of the 4th of Tenth month, 1869, Jonathan Coffin, in his 38th year; a member of Plainfield Monthly Meeting, Ind. During a severe and painful illness of a little over four weeks his mouth was frequently opened in prayer and praise, and he was very earnest in his exhortations to those around him to put their trust in the Lord. He was a diligent reader of the Holy Scriptures, and had not for a number of years, when at home, retired to rest without inviting the family around him and reading a portion thereof. He was regular in the attendance of meetings, and spoke frequently when thus atsembled, to the edification of his friends. He was an earnest worker in the First-day Scripture schools.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BELVIDERE, N. C., 11th mo. 9th.—Way did not open for me to attend our Yearly Meeting, now in session. I have been thinking to-day, the great day of the feast, as it usually is, how great the blessing which the Church receives through these annual gatherings—especially those members who can be present. And even those who cannot be are comforted, encouraged and refreshed, when their Friends return, bringing back the spoil and dividing it with them. And when I can read such an account of a Yearly Meeting as the Review of 10th mo. 30th gave, of that in Baltimore, it does seem to be the next thing to being there. I hope none of thy readers will tire of such a use of its pages. The practical exhibition of a proper attention to the great purposes of a Church organization, is well worthy of a faithful record, to stimulate the present generation to a greater devotion to those purposes, and as an example to those who shall come after.

[The same correspondent tells of some dear Friends (one of them quite ill) who started for N. Carolina Y. M.]

The steamer upon which they attempted to descend the Chowan River encountered an obstruction about midnight, in a dense fog; they soon discovered the rapid entrance of water, which the pumps failed to equal; and about one o'clock the captain turned for the shore, and drove the boat with all the power of the engines upon the soft shoal—her bow within one hundred feet of the shore, and in six feet water. The fires would soon have been put out. They waited until the next P. M., when a steamer from Windsor, with a large number of colored people who had started for Liberia, coming up the river, took the passengers on board and conveyed them to Franklin, to which point the other boat was bound. * * * * * *

In the afternoon, E —— [the invalid Friend,] requested the officers, passengers and crew to collect for a religious opportunity, and just as the meeting closed the steamer from Windsor was seen coming up the river.

STRUCTURE AND CARE OF THE EAR.

The two little muscles that stretch and relax the membrane of the drum represent a horizontal section of the ear. Each of them passes through a little pulley of bone, and that which relaxes the membrane is shut up in bone altogether except its tendon. One moves the bone that is attached to the membrane, drawing it inwards when it contracts; the other moves the bone which touches the fluid that surrounds the nerve, drawing it outwards, and letting the membrane fall back again. It will be noticed that the membrane is not placed straight at the bottom of the passage, but slants inwards, and is besides drawn a little inwards at the centre, through being attached to a small rod of bone, about a third of an inch long, which keeps it in its position. This little rod is part of the movable chain of bones, and upon it the muscle which stretches the membrane acts. The membrane is held slightly on the stretch by a small firm band which passes with the tendon of this muscle across the drum. Thus it is kept in tune for ordinary sounds, without needing a constant action of the muscle.

We may now leave the outer part of the ear designed for conducting sound to the nerve, and turn again, for a minute, to the labyrinth in which the nerve comes out to meet the sound. The central sac or vestibule, and three canals with their expansions, we have already described. Besides the fine powder these parts contain, which is seen under the microscope to consist of little oval crystals scattered among the minute fibres of the nerve, they are provided, also, in some cases, with a number of delicate hairs, by means of which the motions of the small crystals are no doubt rendered still more sensible. All these parts are hollowed in the solid bone —the hardest bone in the body; it is called by anatomists the rock-bone.* The delicate membrane in which the nerve is expanded lies in smooth rocky channels, floating in a limpid fluid, which at once surrounds and fills it. A thin wall of bone separates it from the drum, and in this wall the chain of small bones that passes across the drum ends. The chain terminates in a little oval plate moving lightly to and fro like a minute piston in a very shallow cylinder. If this little piston will not move (which again may be a result of "colds"), there is another cause of deafness.

One word we must still devote to the second part of the labyrinth—the shell-like spiral canal (or cochlea). This, too, is hollowed in the bone, and its very form tells the story of its use. For as the canal, from being exceedingly minute, becomes larger and larger, it gives space for the arrangement of a series of little vibratile chords or fibres, of gradually increasing length (such as the wires of a piano-forte may roughly represent). These little fibres respond, each of them, to a certain pitch of sound, and are connected each with its own nervous twig. And as in the two turns and a half which the cochlea makes, there are many thousands of these vibratile fibres, ample provision is made for all the immense variety of notes and modulations which our ears are called on to receive. By means of the sac and the canals we are made conscious of mere noises, such as the tick of a watch or the rumbling of a wagon; by means of the cochlea we appreciate music and understand the voice.*

Thus, according to the number of the fibres in the cochlea, and the pitch to which, we may say, they are tuned, will be the number and the pitch of the different sounds which we can distinguish; and this differs in different persons, especially in respect to the higher notes. There are many persons who hear well enough, yet who never heard the high shrill note of the cricket. And when a sound is made to rise gradually higher and higher, different persons cease to hear it at different times.

This is but a poor and partial account of a wonderful organ, of which those who know most have still very much indeed to learn. There is much in it to excite our wonder; but, above all, we cannot but stand in amazement before the question, How is it that the motion of the air, the vibration of the membrane, the trembling of the fluid, should impress us with the feeling of a sound; should hold us rapt as music does, or thrill us with ecstacy in the tones of a voice we love? That is the great mystery of all the senses. We cannot penetrate it yet; but we can feel, and ought to feel, how wonderful it makes the world. That which seems mere motion in the ear, and in the nerve, turns into joy or sorrow in the soul, it is the source and instrument of aspiration, the vehicle of prayer. If it is all this to us, what must it be to God, who made it, and knows it perfectly?

All the structures that have been described are means used to bring sound from the outer air to our brains, in order that we may hear. Every condition is fulfilled; every step fully prepared for. Nothing is slurred over, nothing omitted, or half done. And it is so all through the world. There is no slovenliness in Nature's work; no grasping at quick ends and grudging of the means; for every result the full equivalent is given. This is God's choice; the mode He takes of working. And he who tries or wishes to do otherwise, to take short cuts, or get results without full work performed, thinks himself wiser than his Maker.

Causes of Injury and Deafness which may be avoided.—There are several things very commonly done which are extremely injurious to the ear, and ought to be carefully avoided. Those who have followed the previous description will easily understand the reason.

And first, children's ears ought never to be boxed. We have seen that the passage of the ear is closed by a thin membrane, especially adapted to be influenced by every impulse of the ear, and with nothing but the air to support it internally. What, then, can be more likely to injure this membrane than a sudden and forcible compression of the air in front of it? If any one designed to break or overstretch the membrane, he could scarcely devise a more effective means than to bring the hand suddenly and forcibly down upon the passage of the ear, thus driving the air violently before it, with no possibility for its escape but by the membrane giving way. And far too often it does give way, especially if, from any previous disease, it has been weakened. Many children are made deaf by boxes on the ear in this way. Nor is this the only way: if there is one thing which does the nerve of hearing more harm than almost any other, it is a sudden jar or shock. Children and grown persons alike may be entirely deafened by falls or heavy blows upon the head. And boxing the ears produces a similar effect, though more slowly, and in less degree. It tends to dull the sensibility of the nerve, even if it does not hurt the membrane. I knew a pitiful case, once, of a poor youth who died from a terrible disease of the ear. He had had a discharge from it since he was a child. Of course his hearing had been dull; and what had happened was that his father had often boxed his ear for inattention! Most likely that boxing on the ear, diseased as it was, had much to do with his dying. And this brings me to the second point. Children should never be blamed for being inattentive, until it has been found out whether they are not a little deaf. This is easily done by placing them at a few yard's distance, and trying whether they can understand what is said to them in a rather low tone of voice. Each ear should be tried, while the other is stopped by the finger. I do not say that children are never guilty of inattention during any part of the day, even for which they do not receive a few minutes, so impregnates the but I do say, that nothing with this fetid air, that it blamed and a brisk walk in the open air to get they really." We advise every one, then, immediately in a workshop or store, never to eat their meals there, at any rate, without first going out into the open air, and walking or running off the foul air in the lungs and supplying them with fresh.

* This is the view of the cochlea which Helmholtz has done so much to render probable. It is supported not only by the minute anatomy of the organ, but by many curious peculiarities of hearing. There are persons living who can carry on conversation without much difficulty, but who cannot hear sounds of a high pitch, not even a railway whistle, and others who can hear a watch tick well, but can scarcely hear music or spoken words.

In all schools nearly, whether public or private, both teachers and scholars are a great portion of the time breathing an impure atmosphere. Many female teachers suffer from some trouble of the throat, and the scholars come home in the afternoon, as many a parent knows, with headache, and oftentimes nausea at the stomach, the legitimate consequences of breathing the fetid atmosphere of the school and class-rooms. Here, too, the practice prevails of allowing the pupils to eat their lunches at twelve o'clock, just after coming from the class-rooms, where they have been closeted for two or three hours, breathing contaminated atmosphere.

Some years since, we were in the habit of visiting one of the large public schools of this city, and pointed out this mistake to the lady-principal, who was an exceedingly intelligent woman, and she promised to adopt the suggestion, to send her pupils to the play-yard for ten minutes after they came from the class-room, and then call them in to eat their lunch. A week or so, subsequently, we visited the school again, and both teacher and scholars expressed themselves delighted with the change, and found themselves feeling much better for it, and they assured us that they should never return to their old ways.

We should never lose sight of the fact, that a continuous breathing of bad air often lays the foundation for obscure disease, which eventually robs life of all its joys and makes it a failure.—Hall's Journal of Health.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—European advices to the 14th inst. have been received.

Great Britain.—The British government has given directions for a war vessel to be prepared to convey the remains of George Peabody to the United States. The funeral ceremonies took place on the 12th, and were attended by a large concourse, including a representative of the Queen, and many persons of rank. The deceased, a few days before his death, added £150,000 to the fund previously formed by him for benevolent purposes.

Ireland.—Considerable excitement still prevails on the subject of the imprisoned Fenians. The Amnesty Committee asks Irishmen to abstain from the use of tobacco until the prisoners shall be released, in order to reduce the revenue, and at the same time accumulate a fund for continuing the amnesty agitation.

France.—The steamship Periere, which arrived at Brest on the 8th, made the passage from New York in 8 days, 11 hours and 35 minutes, the speediest voyage on record being equivalent to 7 days, 21 hours and 35 minutes from New York to Queenstown.

Ledru Rollin has refused to return to Paris, but has not withdrawn as a candidate for the Legislative Body, although a deputation of Parisian electors has visited London to offer the nomination to Louis Blanc, who has accepted it.

Spain.—One of the Republican Deputies recently arrested has been unconditionally released, and it is reported that the government contemplates releasing all political prisoners not accused of criminal acts.

Italy.—King Victor Emanuel has recently been so ill that at one time he was reported dying, but at the latest advices the physicians had declared him out of danger.

Germany.—The House of Deputies of Saxony has unanimously resolved that the government should endeavor to procure the abolition of capital punishment throughout North Germany.

South America.—Advices received in Lisbon from the seat of war in Paraguay, are, as usual, contradictory. The Allies, it was declared, considered the war ended, and were taking measures to increase the power of the provisional government, and to complete the tranquillizing of the country; while the Paraguayans asserted that the forces of Lopez had been increased by 10,000 men since assuming his position at St. Estanislaus, and that the Allies were unable to follow up their success, from lack of provisions, munitions and means of transportation. The Allies reported that Lopez had executed a number of his own men on suspicion of conspiracy against him.

Domestic.—Several men who have held conspicuous positions, either military or civil, have passed away within a short time. Ex-President Franklin Pierce died on the 8th ult.; Commodore Chas. Stewart on the 6th inst.; in his 92d year; Robt. J. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury under President Polk, on the 11th, at the age of 68; Gen. John E. Wool on the 10th, aged 80 years; and on the 12th, Amos Kendall, Postmaster General from 1835 to 1846, during the administrations of President Jackson and Van Buren.

The two divisions of the Presbyterian denomination in this country, known as the Old and New Schools, have been for some time engaged in efforts for re-union. Last Spring, the General Assemblies of the two bodies agreed upon a basis of union, which was to be submitted to the constituent Presbyteries of both. More than two-thirds of these having voted in favor of it, (in the New School, all, in the Old School, 128 out of 144,) the adjourned Assemblies met in Pittsburg, on the 10th inst., received the report of the joint committee on union, and both adopted a resolution declaring the basis approved by the Presbyteries to be of binding force. Both Assemblies were formally dissolved on the 12th, the General Assembly of the re-united body to be held in the Fifth month next in Philadelphia. A joint meeting was then held, for religious exercises and speeches, at which a resolution was adopted, proposing that the church raise a special thank-offering of $5,000,000 for general benevolent and religious purposes.

On the 5th inst. the corner-stone of a new building for the Normal School for colored students at Hampton, Va., was laid. The school has been in operation for two years in a temporary wooden building, and has about 100 pupils. A farm is attached, on which the students labor some hours daily, studying the remainder of the time.

SUMMARY OF NEWS..... 224

THE FIFTH BIENNIAL CONFERENCE OF TEACHERS AND DELEGATES OF FRIENDS' FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS IN THE UNITED STATES met and organized in Friends' Meeting-house on Twelfth St., Philada., on Fourth-day afternoon, 17th inst. A large number of delegates were present, all the Yearly Meetings in America except Canada being represented, the floor of the large building being closely packed, with a serious, attentive company of Friends, and many in the Youths' galleries. A precious solemnity was an evidence of that covering of the Divine Spirit which we accept as a crown to such gatherings and regard as a diadem of beauty. It was truly a worshipping assembly, and it may here be stated that each sitting of the Conference was opened by reading a portion of Holy Scripture, followed by a devotional pause, during which the voice of prayer, praise and exhortation was heard as the Holy Spirit gave utterance.

JOEL BEAN, of Iowa, presided with dignity and discretion until, at a subsequent meeting, a permanent organization was made by appointing Henry T. Wood, of New Bedford, President, Wm. G. Rhoads of Philada., and W. Sidney Tomlinson of North Carolina, Secretaries, and Wm. H. S. Wood, Treasurer. Joel Bean, upon taking the chair, said:

"I will not invite thought upon myself by dwelling upon my reluctance to take this place to-day; but I do desire to say that I am deeply impressed with the interest and importance of this occasion—the coming together in this city from the East and the West, from the North and the South, of so many earnest laborers in the work of Scriptural instruction, a work so generally acknowledged to be the work of the Church,—the Lord's work.

"And that which especially impresses me is the fact that so many hearts have wrestled, so many prayers have gone up (and I doubt not the feeling pervades this meeting in coming together) that the Lord may be known among us, to preside and direct in what we do and to crown it with His blessing, so that the few days spent here may prove indeed the uniting of hearts and the upholding of the Cause which we love, and of the glory of God.

"The service each day will commence with the reading of a portion of Scripture. The 90th Psalm has been selected for the reading this morning."

The theme first laid before the Conference by the Executive Committee was

"THE AIMS AND OBJECTS OF FIRST-DAY SCHOOL TEACHING."

Wm. C. Longstreth opened the discussion by reading the following paper, which had been prepared for the purpose by two women Friends.

The necessity of clear, simple Gospel Teaching.

Surely every teacher would wish to teach acceptably in God's sight. If we could but find a teacher sent from God, and taught of God, how gladly would we listen to such an one.

When Nicodemus came to Jesus by night, he came with the acknowledgment, "we know that thou art a teacher come from God." Let us see how Jesus taught him. There was no arguing from law to gospel,—no pointing from human character to divine,—the teaching was such as went at once to his soul's needs:—"Verily, verily I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."—"Marvel not that I said unto thee, ye must be born again." The outspoken thought of his mind was,

"How can these things be?" And the answer of the Lord Jesus showed him of how little account was all his knowledge as "Master in Israel" when he knew not "these things." Then, with clear, simple language, which a child could understand, Jesus showed him the type which he had known so well, fulfilled in the antitype:—"As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life." And Jesus set before him the "gospel"—the "glad tidings" of a Father's love, and a Redeemer's power:—"For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life. For God sent not His son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world, through Him, might be saved."

But Jesus did not stop here. With unmistakable clearness, and faithful love, He set before him the necessity of an immediate choice, the condemnation "already" resting on those without faith:—"He that believeth on Him is not condemned,—but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he has not believed in the name of the only begotten son of God." What could we have as a stronger proof of "the necessity of clear, simple gospel teaching" than these words of the Lord Jesus?

Not for one act of His life alone, but for all, could Jesus say:—"I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you. If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

At last, when Christ sent forth His disciples, what charge did He give them?—To teach morality?—To feed intellectually?—To turn all eyes to Palestine?—No. The charge was plain and clear, stopping short at none of these. The field was wide:—"Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."—"Go ye, and teach all nations;" and the marginal reading is—"Make disciples, or Christians, of all nations."

If morality had been all that Christ wanted, could they not have taught that under the law? If intellectual instruction had been all that God demanded, would He have "hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes?"

It may be objected by some one, "Nicodemus might truly call Jesus a Teacher come from God: but I can make no such claim!"

Here is a point of most serious importance. In a certain sense, every one who undertakes gospel teaching should be a teacher come from God. That is, he should attempt to teach only what he has seen with his eyes, and what his hands have handled of the Word of Life. No rules need be laid down as to the mode of teaching. That may be according to the bent of the teacher's mind. But, if he has a heart filled with the love of Jesus, warm from communion with Him,—if he is impelled by the Holy Spirit with a yearning desire to win souls to that Saviour whom he has found,—his teaching will be "gospel teaching," whatever the day's lesson may be, and however poorly, he may think he teaches it; for he cannot fail to infuse into it the glad tidings of the "mercy of God in Christ Jesus our Lord." His power will be in proportion to his earnestness.

On the other hand, if the teacher be one who has himself no experimental knowledge of the gospel, he cannot be expected to convey it to others. If he has no sense of the sinfulness of sin, how can he make it felt? If he has not found pardon and peace at Calvary, with what effect can he point others to the cross? If he does not experience Jesus to be his Saviour from the power of present temptation, how can he so present Him? If he has not been baptized by the Spirit into the body of Christ,—adopted into the household of faith,—how can he dwell upon the peace of this adoption, or show the joy of that filial cry of recognition, "Abba, Father"

His teaching may be very learned, but it will not be that "clear and simple gospel teaching" which is calculated to reach the heart. He may do much for the discipline or intellectual training of his class, but little or nothing for their spiritual welfare.

It cannot be claimed that such elaborate intellectual preparation is necessary for those who teach in mission schools; but the preparation of the heart is quite as needful. There should be the same consecration to the work, the same prayerful solicitude for the souls of the scholars. In neither case should it be the aim to teach cold theological dogmas: but in both, the precious doctrines of the gospel should be presented vividly and clearly.

Many Christian teachers can testify with what avidity and simplicity of faith even little children have received that great doctrine of "Substitution," which should lie at the foundation of all Scripture teaching, because it is the ground of our reconciliation to God, and our peace in Christ.

"He was wounded for our transgressions;"

"He was bruised for our iniquities;"

"With His stripes we are healed."

"Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree."

"For He hath made Him to be sin for us, (who knew no sin), that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him."

There is a quick instinct in a child's heart, which is moved easily to a grateful love for one who has suffered in its stead, and borne the penalty due to its sins. A teacher who earnestly feels the reality of this doctrine, can scarcely fail so to present it as to awaken this sense of gratitude. And if his prayers for the children keep pace with his teaching, there is great hope of his winning souls to Christ.

And this should be the aim of all our work! We pick up a child in the street, and bring him into the school. We do not know that he is going to live a month. Which is most important, that he learn by rote all the books of the Bible, the year in which Moses lived, and the names of Jacob's twelve sons, or the glad tidings of a Saviour's love, and the necessity of sins forgiven?

We think that if the child should die, the teacher who had used every effort to win his soul to Jesus, would have more heartfelt peace than one who might have given most perseveringly the routine of formal instruction.

There may be teachers here who feel discouraged at the standard thus set before them, and are saying to themselves, "If all this be true, I am not fit to teach!" Dear young friends, then make haste to become fit! If all your teaching hitherto but bring you to this point, that your eyes are opened to the necessity of possessing for yourselves that which you confess to be needful for the souls of those under your care, it has not been altogether in vain, so far as you are concerned.

But let the past go! The future lies before you. More certainly, the present is yours! Be entreated now to set yourself earnestly to the work of knowing experimentally those blessed truths which you feel that you have failed to teach! If you will give yourselves unreservedly to the Lord, and rest not till you have tasted the joys of His salvation, then will He bestow upon you the power of His spirit, and you shall teach transgressors His ways, and sinners shall be converted unto Him.

The standard cannot be kept too high. The true "Gospel Teacher" feels himself called and consecrated to the work. He bears each member of his class upon his heart in frequent prayer, and pleads with them individually. If he have liberty to select the subject of his lesson, he asks God for it from week to week; and when it comes to him upon his knees, he feels sure it will be blessed. Then, bending every energy of his mind to his task conscientiously and prayerfully, he searches the Scriptures, to gather their testimony, in type and antitype, in prophecy and fulfilment, in precept and example.

Thus collating and comparing, he finds the Bible its own best commentary; and his heart is stirred and his mind enlarged, as he catches glimpses of deeper truth evolved in his search, and sees them all leading him to Jesus of Nazareth, as the centre of its teachings.

His interests become so absorbed in the subject before him, that even his general reading is made subservient to it.

When he has accumulated all in his power that bears upon it, he selects the details most suitable for his class, arranging them clearly, that each head may be brought out forcibly and impressively. He seeks the most telling illustrations, for he knows that by these a truth is often most vividly brought before the mind. He slights no part of his work. After all is as complete as he can make it, (and none can feel more keenly than himself that it is imperfectly done,) he takes the lesson and lays it in prayer before the Lord. He prays that if there be error in its teaching, he may be enlightened to see and correct it. He prays that the unction and power of the Holy Ghost may accompany it. He prays that the hearts of his scholars may be opened to receive it: that it may be blessed to them, and be as seed sown for Eternity.

On Sixth-day afternoon the discussion turned upon "THE NEED IN THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS OF FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS." Although a deviation from chronological order in the history of the Conference, we conclude to furnish at this time the following address, with which, at the request of the Executive Committee, the subject was opened by Prof. Chase, of Haverford College.

THOS. CHASE said:—From age to age, the Almighty Father entrusts a generation of children and youth to the care and training of their elders, so that the accumulated wisdom and experience of all past time are handed down, a rich inheritance, to those who are soon to fill the various posts and incur the manifold responsibilities of society. Thus art and science, the rich and useful products of human invention, the maxims of government and business, and the rules of all departments of human activity, established by repeated trial and long use, are perpetuated and transmitted; but most valuable, by common confession, of all our inheritances, most sacred of the trusts committed to our hands for the benefit of our successors, are the priceless treasures of religious truth, contained in the Bible, and illustrated in the history of the church, particularly in the lives and writings of good men and women in all generations, and the many precious fruits of their prayers and struggles, which the Lord intended as seed for the future, as well as for their own convenient bread. If we make careful provision to teach our children human science, shall we refuse to take measures to instruct them in those precious truths, a knowledge of which is both requisite to the right use and truest happiness of the present life, and of inestimable value as conducing to the securing of an inheritance among the blessed, in an unending life to come? No!

"Our lips shall tell them to our sons,
And they again to theirs;
And generations yet unborn
Shall tell them to their heirs."

This duty is so plain that there can hardly be any who bear the Christian name, who do not admit that it is binding upon them in some form. We can hardly differ widely in regard to the end in view; whatever dispute there be must be chiefly in regard to the legitimacy and the efficacy of different means proposed for the attainment of the end.

There is, in the minds of some Friends, who have not seen their way clear to engage in the First-day school work, an apprehension which deserves great respect, but yet which is, it appears to me, altogether unfounded; viz., that such instruction tends in some degree to endanger or to lower our testimony to the precious doctrine of the immediate teaching of the Holy Spirit in the heart. So far from this being necessarily the case, I believe that one of the best results of First-day schools, properly conducted, is to bring out this truth more fully, and make it more widely adopted and prized.

It is no part of the Gospel doctrine, nor is it asserted as such by any Friends, that the Holy Spirit is our only source of enlightenment and instruction in spiritual things. Friends have, from the beginning, acknowledged, with other Christians, that the Holy Scriptures were given forth by inspiration of God, that they are "able to make men wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus," and that they are, indeed, "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." We all believe that the Scriptures came from that same Spirit of whom they testify, and without whose aid they cannot be understood; we all admit that they are a test by which the doctrine of any man claiming to have received a revelation may be tried. We all unite in taking measures to distribute them at home and abroad, and in recommending their frequent reading in the family and in private. And are we not all grateful to our Heavenly Father, that he has not confined himself to one mode in providing for our spiritual instruction, but has furnished both outward and inward means? Or can we deny that the very possession of writings which we own as inspired by the Holy Ghost, addressed to us and to all mankind, and containing a statement of God's will regarding us, of itself imposes upon us the solemn duty of carefully studying them, and of seeking to know their full import, ready to accept and profit by every lesson for us they contain? So long as we give them exactly their due place, not forgetting the priceless gift which we have of an inward Teacher, is there any one who thinks it possible for us to grow too familiar with them? Profitable as they are in so many ways, can our children too early become acquainted with their contents—especially as neither childhood nor youth is exempt from the liability of death? Will it harm them to have their minds stored with texts, which, if not fully appreciated at first, will often, in some critical moment in after life, rise unbidden in the mind—or, rather should we say, will be called up by the power of God's Holy Spirit, to warn, to check, to rebuke, or to console, to comfort, and to guide?

In the whole history of religious doctrines, I know nothing more admirable than the success with which the founders of the Society of Friends, under the direction of their Heavenly Guide, steered between the rocks and the whirlpools of error on the right hand and on the left, and presented to the world a round, full statement of gospel truth, without any partialness, one-sidedness, or extravagance. In their views of the Holy Scriptures, they were free alike from superstitious Bibliolatry and from rationalistic undervaluing of the records of Divine inspiration. Even when deprecating the extravagant views of those who looked upon the Bible as the only guide which the Creator has vouchsafed to man, they always recognized its infallibility and its inestimable worth. Never a true Friend, from that day to this, who would not admit that the highest and best knowledge which it is permitted us to gain by the use of our human faculties, aided by the Divine blessing, is the knowledge of the truths contained in this book: never one who would not own that while we possess in common with all men that Light which enlighteneth every man who cometh into the world, a knowledge of the Scriptures conduces to the removal of that darkness, in which, if the light shine, the darkness comprehendeth it not: never one who would not acknowledge that it is of much advantage, every way, that to us have been committed the written oracles of God.

And now if this book is, by our common confession, a priceless treasure, shall we not seek, by every means, to get for ourselves and our children the full benefit of its possession? Written in human language, preserved (under the Divine blessing) by human art, addressed to the human understanding, yet with the promise of help from the Holy Spirit for those who seek the words of wisdom in its pages, it constantly appeals to us, weak as we feel and unworthy, to come and be instructed, and when we have learned ourselves, to impart its lessons to those around us. Like everything else in human language, it contains sentences whose meaning is not at once apparent to the young and the ignorant; it has allusions which it requires some knowledge of history, or antiquities, or geography, or natural science, to comprehend in their exact force and application; and in various points there is room for explanation on the part of a teacher to the young or the uninstructed in regard to the signification of the outward text. If we are capable of giving such instruction, have we any right to withhold it? We do not think so highly of the Bible as to suppose that the mere outward knowledge of its meaning alone can save any soul: but does any Christian think so meanly of the Bible as not to deem it worth while to take pains to give his children, and to diffuse in the whole community, the most accurate knowledge possible of its invaluable teachings?

That in Biblical instruction there is nothing inconsistent with the views of Friends,—that its introduction is no innovation, rashly copied from the practices of other portions of the Church Universal—we may infer from the practice of the most careful and consistent Friends, in all the Yearly Meetings in the world, in their boarding schools or other institutions for secular instruction. In the excellent Boarding School at West-Town—to give a single example—there are regular Bible lessons, recitations in Barclay's Catechism, and frequent reading of religious books. Now, I would ask, what provision is made for familiarizing with the Bible, and imparting religious instruction to those boys and girls, young men and young women, who are not enjoying the advantages of attending a Friends' school? If religious instruction at stated times is proper in a boarding school, is it any the less proper in the neighborhood of one's home, and in the intervals of the ordinary business of life? There can be but one answer to this question. The instruction which it is right for me to give to a hundred children at school, it is right for me to give to ten children whom I can gather together from their homes in my neighborhood: a First-day school attached to any particular meeting is as legitimate as a Bible class or a class in Barclay's Catechism at West-Town.

There is but one escape possible from this conclusion, and that is connected with what I regard as the most plausible of the objections which I have ever heard urged by Friends against First-day schools; namely, that the right place for religious instruction is in the family. I believe, however, that wherever, as in the city of Philadelphia, there is a select Day school, attended by Friends' children, it is customary to have recitations in Scripture in them. But I wish to admit, at the outset, that this objection against First-day schools has very great weight, provided it be true that such schools stand in the way of family instruction. We might reason upon the question à priori, but I prefer to appeal directly to facts. What is the fact? Is it the case, where there are no First-day schools in the Society of Friends, that the children of its members receive at home careful instruction in the Bible and in the principles of the Christian religion? Do the young people, in such cases, grow up well informed in the essential doctrines of Christianity, and in the views of their own Society, with the grounds for them, and their proofs from Holy Writ? Or are they, on the contrary, rather more ignorant, on an average, of the beliefs of their Society, and even of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, than the young people in the same social station in any other denomination of Christians? I admit honorable exceptions, doubtless many of which are to be found in this very city. But in the country, where there is still more need for systematic instruction than here, where the meetings for worship are often held in silence almost from one year's end to another, and where there is danger that that Inward Light, whose power and glory we cannot too much extol, will shine in some darkness so far as the aid of outward light is concerned,—in the country, and in the city too,—I appeal to those of you who know,—are not many young Friends growing up in much ignorance of the things which concern their eternal peace; spending their First-day afternoons in idleness or even in frivolity; unable to give a reason for the hope that is in them, if so be there is a hope,—I appeal to those of you who know, is there not a loud call sounding in our ears to go and help these precious souls? Is it not the case in many excellent households—perhaps by some perversion of a great and precious truth—that pious fathers and mothers, forbearing to speak to their children of sacred things without some extraordinary and overmastering compulsion, never speak to them on such subjects at all: never even clearly direct them to the instructions of the Inward Teacher, or inform them how they may best seek to hear and to recognize His voice? I am inclined to think that the relations of First-day schools to family instruction will be found to be about the same in the Society of Friends that they have been found to be in other denominations. Doubtless many here present have read with interest the proceedings of the "Third National S. S. Convention of the United States," held at Trenton in the spring of the present year. Among the papers read, there was one by H. Clay Trumbull, on the "Relation of the Sunday School Work to Home Instruction," in which he says:

"The early fathers of N. England did not rely upon the family exclusively for the godly training of children. The Bible and the Catechism were to be taught in the common school, and the parish minister was to publicly catechise the young" on the first day of the week. But, "gradually, religious teaching was dropped from the common school, the pastors generally ceased to catechise in public; and by-and-by the family was left to do all the work of instructing the children in religious things. A sad lapse followed. . . . At the opening of the present century, infidelity prevailed widely, and the standard of morals was low, even in the best portions of the land. Household religion was but little known. Only in exceptional cases was the Bible or the Catechism faithfully taught in the home circle. The sweep of the Unitarian heresy over a part of New England indicates how few of the professed Christians had been in youth grounded in Bible truth. . . With the revival, from about 1810 until 1825, through the Sunday school, of the church teaching of children, household religion was revived, and it has made steady progress to the present time. As to present habits of Christian families with their children, I claim," the Secretary continues, "to be entitled to speak with some positiveness. For now more than ten years I have visited from family to family, being, in all, in thousands of homes, in twenty of our States, and this with members of various Christian bodies, as well as with those who are irreligious. Out of these opportunities of observation, I say unhesitatingly, that while there are still far too many professedly Christian parents who neglect their children, there is vastly more of household religion now than history gives any reason for believing to have existed half a century or a century ago. Indeed, the brightest picture I have ever seen painted of the ideal Christian household of olden time, by no means equals what I often find in the homes of modern Sunday-school workers. . . When the character of the religious teaching given in the family is considered, the advance is yet more marked and gratifying." Dr. Chalmers also is quoted as saying, nearly half a century ago, that the question in Scotland had become, "not whether the rising generation shall be trained to Christianity in [Sunday] schools, or trained to it under the roof of their fathers, but whether they shall be trained to it in [such] schools, or not trained to it at all."

This testimony is the result of large observation among our fellow Christians. There has been, I think, sufficient induction of facts to establish a law. I do not know of anything in the peculiar views of Friends which should make the law here established less applicable to them than to others—viz., that the institution of First-day schools, so far from being hostile to family instruction, tends directly to make family instruction more general and more efficient.

But further: even were the disposition of heads of families always sufficiently in favor of religious instruction at home, there would still be a field for First-day school work to supplement family teaching. And here I come to a point directly connected with an important and fundamental principle of our religious Society. From attentive observation, I am most firmly persuaded that He who, when He ascended up on high, gave gifts unto men, has given unto some—yes, unto many—men and women, young men and young women, amongst us, the special gift of teaching, fitting them for this First-day school work; so that if they were to confine their exercise of this gift to their own family circles, they would deprive other children of an advantage which it is their right to receive, and rob their Lord and Master of that full usury of their talent which it is His right to claim. Yes! the word of the Lord has come to many amongst us—many whom we are privileged to meet with to-day—saying to them in tones of unmistakable clearness, "Gather the children together, and teach them of my ways"—and He that called to the work, giveth from season to season ability to perform it aright. Many a father and mother, while not unwilling to do what they can themselves, would feel it a privilege to be able to send their children to be taught by persons so peculiarly endowed for this work. Sometimes the best efforts of parents fail to excite the interest of their children in sacred things, while the teacher at the First-day school is at once successful. And (we need not blink the fact—we all know it from our own observation)—there are not a few families in our own fold, as well as among other nominal Christians, whose heads have no experimental knowledge of vital religion; who are, to be sure, respectable and upright, and entertain a general respect for sacred things, but are still unconverted men and women; yet these very persons, while they feel that it would be mockery for them to speak of Jesus to their little ones, are often sincerely glad to send them to a class in a First-day school, where a pious and rightly-concerned teacher may be enabled to point their steps to the path of life. And even those who are very faithful and very successful in the religious training of their children—I trust there are many such amongst us—often find a decided benefit in the deepening of good impressions, and the heightening of religious interest, resulting from their children's attendance at such schools. With all classes of parents, those who are earnest and skilful in teaching,—those whose will is not wanting, but whose power seems small,—and those who are indifferent and unfit for the sacred work, the First-day school holds an important if not an absolutely necessary place, to supplement what is already good, or to furnish what would otherwise be altogether wanting.

But although the case in favor of First-day schools appears to be strong and plain, those Friends who are not convinced of this utility always fall back upon the argument, "The children have a Teacher already,—an infallible Guide, in the Spirit of Christ within." Now, I believe that First-day school instruction may be so conducted as not to obscure this doctrine, but to bring it out into clear light, and, what is particularly important, give it practical application: to answer the doubts of the young disciple, and teach him how to recognize the voice of the Good Shepherd. Again, we cannot escape the responsibilities involved in the possession of an outward source of instruction, also, in the Holy Bible. What need I do more, than simply to call attention to the very impressive lesson by which the Providence of God has taught, or should have taught the Society of Friends that an exclusive reliance upon this inward teaching, regardless of the aid given us in the Scriptures, and even in the exposition of Scripture doctrine by sound and rightly qualified men and women—that this exclusive reliance endangers the cause of Christian truth, and is a fruitful source of heresy and schism. Some forty years ago, the Society of Friends in this country was rent in twain, in a fearful convulsion, dividing upon the fundamental principles of the Gospel of Christ, yet both divisions holding fast this doctrine of the immediate teaching of the Holy Ghost. And to this day, in the two bodies, men equally honest, claiming to be guided and instructed by the Holy Spirit, teach doctrines diametrically dissonant. And what is our warrant for sitting in judgment upon the views of men whose intentions are, doubtless, as pure as our own? That we are not taught by the Spirit in the same way as they claim to be taught, may rightly satisfy us, but we cannot expect it to satisfy them, or even a third party judging between us. It is to the outward record that we appeal for the soundness of our own inward impressions, and the unsoundness of those which differ from them. To that outward text—by which our early fathers avowed their willingness to be tried—in all cases of controversy we resort. Well, Friends, if fifty years ago First-day schools had existed among us, of the same efficiency, and conducted in accordance with the same sound principles, as those which are flourishing in almost all parts of our Society to-day—can we doubt that much greater unity of sentiment would have prevailed—and that, if divisions were not averted altogether, yet a much smaller number would have joined in the secession. I trust that the passion and the prejudice which attended that convulsion have in good measure passed away—that its asperities and bitterness have been assuaged—but, Friends, it cannot be but that our Heavenly Father meant to teach us by it some signal lesson—and I believe that a part of this lesson is that we should provide faithfully for the right education of the young.

There are other objections which I hear and read with gratitude as warnings of dangers against which we ought to be on our guard, but, I must say, with all deference for the judgment of wise and good men with entire conviction of their insufficiency, as precluding the way for First-day school labor. We hear of rash hands handling sacred things, of unanointed lips speaking on holy themes. That were indeed a grievous evil—but if our dear friends will but come to this Conference, or attend the teachers' meetings in every place, and see and hear with what deep consecration, with what earnest prayer, with what travail of spirit, this labor is in most instances entered into, I believe their fears on this score would be greatly allayed. We hear of unsound doctrine that may be foisted upon us. My friend, if thou fearest that the children are not taught the words of Eternal life, it is thy dtuy to go to the school thyself and proclaim them there. But inform thyself of the facts of the case: I doubt not thou wilt generally find the truths of the Gospel taught clearly, and taught alone. Thou art afraid, again, that this work is done in man's wisdom. Come to this Conference—visit the schools presided over by these earnest teachers—thou wilt find that it is done in good measure in the Lord's fear and power. Or thou sayest that the business of instruction lies wholly with the ministry—forgetting that as our Lord gave of old, so he giveth to-day,—if I may translate literally, and with a little expansion, but not beyond the plain sense,—some to serve as missionaries, and some as preachers, or forth-speakers, with full unction of the inspeaking Word—and some as heralds of the glad tidings, and some as shepherds, for the tender lambs as well as for the sheep—and some as simply teachers: and that we see and know that He commissions men and women, young men and maidens, for this very First-day school work. I am glad to quote, at this point, from the Memorial of a very dear and valued minister of this Yearly Meeting—now gone to her rest—a passage which I think is in every way instructive for us now and here:

"She frequently expressed a concern that where individuals gave evidence of having passed through the necessary preparation and received gifts from the Head of the Church, their youth should not prevent those gifts from being rightly brought into service for the edification of the body, and their own advancement in spiritual strength and knowledge. At one time she remarked, 'I think there is a dispensation approaching, in which there will be a greater outpouring of the Spirit than there is now, comparable to that spoken of by the prophet, "Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy;" and other gifts, not only that of prophecy, shall be dispensed. I want you not to be dismayed, or too much discouraged.'"

Then let the Church recognize these gifts. Let it adopt both the First-day school work, and the mission-school work, itself—let it give them its sanction and its sympathy—and whatever dangers attend them,—and I wish to admit that there are dangers,—whatever imperfections would, otherwise, be manifest, the church can help to avoid and amend. We know that the work is the Lord's work—it is not strange if we are sometimes a little impatient at criticisms upon the manner in which it is conducted, from men who do not lift a finger to it themselves. The First-day school needs the sympathy and co-operation of the church—partly that it may be kept in the right track. Let there be a similar care maintained in the church for the soundness of the Teachers as there is for the soundness of the Preachers.

Another reason why the Church should recognize and adopt this work, is, that First-day schools are needed—sorely needed—for the indoctrination of the children in those special views and principles which distinguish our branch of the Christian Church. Spiritual worship—spiritual gifts—the teaching and the guidance of the Holy Spirit—the right qualification of the ministry—the unlawfulness of war and of oaths—a high standard of Christian morals—ought not our children to be thoroughly taught the truth on all these points: and what provision is made for systematic instruction on them, except in First-day schools, and perhaps a few schools of secular learning?

Without such instruction, what views will your children have? In many cases, I fear, no views—or wrong views—or views got at haphazard, from stepping into a church and hearing a sermon, or picking up a tract, or from the conversation of a friend, with perhaps less perfect views of Christian doctrine than we, but more earnestness in maintaining and spreading what he believes to be truth.

The Christian nurture of the young,—the nurture and admonition of the Lord,—winning them to practical holiness,—is another important function of First-day schools. I can only allude to it.

I am no advocate for intellectual, heady instruction. Enough, and too much, of windy commentaries, of subtle refining upon dogmas, of hair-splitting and quibbling. We want teachers whose spiritual insight and illumination is such that they feel the full meaning of our Saviour's declaration, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life."

Oh, for an earnest, living church, where there is room for the old and the young,—where the zeal of the one and the wisdom of the other harmoniously mingle and combine, where all gifts are recognized, all gifts employed—where, the love of Christ constraining, His Spirit instructs and guides,—where His pure and perfect gospel is owned in all things, His glory alone is sought, His Truth prevails, His joy and peace are multiplied! Shall not such be the Church of the future? Oh, shall we not make our Church such, in the present?

My friends, sometimes, as I muse upon the future of our beloved Society in this land, two opposite visions rise up before me: both but visions. One is of an aged oak—tall and majestic—a monarch of the woods. Manfully has it braved the storms of more than two hundred winters—thousands of weary souls have been refreshed beneath it—the poor and afflicted, of every clime and of every race, have been always made welcome beneath its sheltering arms: yet, as you look closely, you see decay too plainly written upon its mutilated branches, and in its sere and scanty foliage; and the passer-by, as he gazes at it, can only say, "It was a goodly tree." I see its aged trunk still carefully guarded, and looked up to with reverence, by a few faithful watchmen: yet, it puts forth no new leaves or blossoms,—and, strange to say, if it sends up any new shoots from its still vigorous root, they are carefully cut down, as intruders on the sacred soil—for the chief function of its gardeners is to prune and lop off.

I look once more—and, instead of the dying tree, I see a vigorous sylvan patriarch, green in old age, putting on the vigor and freshness of youth, while maintaining the strength and stability of mature years. The storm does not shake it, the drought does not blight it, for its roots are fixed deeply in the Rock of Ages, and fed by the perennial waters of life.. . . . As of old, the red man and the black man flee under it for refuge—the ignorant, the afflicted, the sin-stricken, are taught and comforted, and children delight to gather beneath its shade—every rustle of its leaves speakes of pardon for the sinner and of peace for the believing—from its branches the breath of the Spirit, that bloweth where it listeth, evokes æolian music, and, among them, all the sweet-voiced birds of heaven pour forth their songs.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH 27, 1869.

The Conference of last week.—An unusual space in the Review will be devoted, perhaps for several weeks, to the proceedings and interests of the First-Day School Conference. The necessity of so large a devotement of our columns will not at first be apparent to those readers who have not mingled in this solemn feast of fat things, particularly as the report given can convey but a faint impression of the interest and value of the Conference, and of the continuance, through condescending mercy, in the various sittings, of the anointing Presence of the blessed Saviour by His Spirit. The necessary pages are freely yielded, under a feeling that it is due from us, in thankfulness for the mercy of our God, to set up stones of memorial. It has not been possible to obtain from the stenographer, before our going to press, the material necessary to give in the present number so much of the deliberations as will be reasonably expected.

The closing sitting was held on Seventh-day, the 20th inst., when the power and comfort of the Holy Ghost were experienced to the admiration of many, who, as they reverently bowed under the Pentecostal visitation, were prepared to say: "THE LORD HATH DONE GREAT THINGS FOR US, WHEREOF WE ARE GLAD." At this sitting the following letter was received from a dear sister, a member of the Northern Monthly Meeting of this city:

"Seventh-day morning.—My heart has been deeply moved within the past few days, and my spirit has burned within me; and from time to time my feelings have struggled for utterance. Much that I would have said has been well said by others; and I thank God and take fresh courage in finding my heart beating in unison with the great heart of our Society, as manifested here by its representatives and delegates in this Conference.

It has been my privilege to breathe the free air of the prairie. It has been my privilege to mingle with the earnest, whole-souled, dignified laborers of the West; and oh! how tenderly was the weakling dealt with there. My soul now craves the glorious liberty of a child of God. It does seem as though my soul has been unnecessarily long in struggling; but, earnest-hearted and beloved friends, lift up your hearts once more in a mighty cry for such, that perfect love may cast out fear, and the blessing must come.

Oh! that the slavish fear of man might be cast out, and that one and all of us might dare to do what we believe to be required at our hands. Let the past go. Let us spend no time in unavailing regrets, only let us flee to the refuge, Christ Jesus our Lord; giving ourselves entirely into his hands; accepting his free salvation, and submitting to be guided by him in all things, willing and obedient. I have longed to see this glorious day in Philadelphia; I see it and am glad. God speed the mission work; level mountains, fill up valleys. But we know that Thou wilt prosper and art prospering the work of Thy own hand; even now it is praising Thee. Bless the pure-hearted ones who have met here on this occasion, with their families, and in their respective circles; and if it please Thee, restore in safety the travellers to their homes, and bless them. And oh! if it please Thee, grant that they may leave behind them a blessing on dear Philadelphia."

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING opened its business session on Second day, the 8th inst. The representatives, fifty-two in number, all present, except three. The credentials were read of a large number of ministers and other Friends religiously drawn to attend. The epistles of corresponding Yearly Meetings were read, to the strengthening and encouragement of the body. That from Ireland adverted to the gratifying increase of First-day schools and Bible classes in their own limits; also to the acceptable presence of several American Friends on their way to foreign countries. To these epistles responses were addressed in Christian love. Of the London General Epistle 2000 copies were printed. A communication was received from a society of colored persons near Salem, N. C., desiring to be incorporated with our religious Society. A committee was separated to visit them, which was done to satisfaction. In several respects they had adopted the views of Friends. They have neither place of worship nor facilities for education. Much sympathy was felt for them, and the subject was continued under the care of a committee, who, at their discretion, were authorized to refer their cases to the nearest Mo. Meeting, extending, meanwhile, relief to their necessities.

The consideration of the future location and competent accommodation of the Yearly Meeting, referred from last year, upon mature and harmonious deliberation resulted in a decision to build a larger meeting-house at New Garden. The consideration of the state of Society, as brought into view by the answers to the Queries, elicited lively and pertinent counsel upon the several duties and testimonies for the truth therein embodied. The regular reading of the Holy Scriptures before the collected family was enforced, and the solemn duty and high privilege of true, availing prayer, without which there can be no devoted Christian life.

A careful and much needed revision of the Discipline was conducted in Christian condescension and love, with a desire to know and to be guided by the mind of the Spirit. The completed code is, as we are led by several correspondents to believe, a judicious one.

The Educational statistics, both as regards our own children, (at the boarding and the local schools,) and also the colored people, were satisfactory, and Friends were encouraged to pursue this vitally important work with renewed energy, not forgetting, in the intellectual training, the great and proper object of the Church's concern, "the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

Brief reference was made in our last number to the meeting on the evening of the 10th inst. in reference to the First-day School interests. We return to the subject to present the interesting statistics. There are 49 First-day schools under the charge of Friends of this Yearly Meeting, with 348 teachers and 3784 pupils, of whom it is gratifying to state that 1299 are Friends, whilst it is equally satisfactory that the balance, 1485 pupils not of our fold, partake of the benefit, this being the only literary or religious training that is accessible to a large proportion of them. Independent of the schools above referred to, there are 35 First-day schools for colored people controlled by North Carolina Friends, and including 1781 pupils. Our Friends of this Yearly Meeting also sustain 24 colored day schools.

During the week, interesting meetings were held on behalf of the important subjects of Peace and the care of the Indian tribes, and one to give information on the subject of Agriculture, in which direction Friends of N. Carolina are, with Christian patriotism, doing much for the well-being of the community at large. The subject of the care of the freed-people was entered upon with renewed energy, and an Executive Committee appointed by the Yearly Meeting. A large meeting of the Bible and Tract Society was an occasion of much interest. Several meetings for Divine worship were held in the life, and a very grateful acknowledgment is due for the loving presence and overshadowing wing of ancient goodness. The gathering was much larger than had been known for many years, it being estimated that there were upon the grounds not less than three thousand persons; and Friends parted for their respective homes under a reverential feeling of gratitude for the preserving care and heavenly guidance graciously vouchsafed, and in deep tenderness and unfeigned love for the brethren.

The Small Fruit Instructor. Purdy & Johnston, Palmyra, N. Y. Pp. 34. Price 10 cts.—The title to this little book sets forth its object. The commendation of our friend J. J. Thomas (see Adv.) is a guarantee for its soundness of instruction. The increased attention to the culture of grapes, blackberries, strawberries and other small fruits in yards and in fields, renders such a manual desirable. The Small Fruit Recorder, a monthly of eight pages by the same editors, comes periodically with instructive freshness, and is also an advertising medium to fruit growers. The department of "Questions and Answers" is useful. More attention is due to the production, by those who have very small parcels of land, of the delicious small fruits, which require little space. What citizen with a very contracted yard need deny his family a supply of luscious grapes. The late Henry M. Zollikoffer of this city trained grape vines to a height of three or four stories, and gathered an abundant crop from above his roof.

Copies of this number may be purchased at the office. Single copies 5 cts. Fifty copies for $2.00.

BALES.—In Washington Co., Iowa, on the 28th of Tenth month, 1869, Mary A., daughter of Charity Bales, aged 25 years. She left the comforting evidence that all was well.

HADLEY.—Near Monrovia, Ind., on the 6th of Tenth month, 1869, of apoplexy of the lungs, Sarah Jane, wife of Daniel C. Hadley, in the 32d year of her age; a member of West Union Monthly Meeting. About two years ago she was awakened to a lively concern for her own and others' eternal interest. When the summons came, she felt her condition, and, with the utmost pleadings for mercy, exclaimed, "A Saviour, or I die; a Redeemer, or I perish forever." From the expressions of resignation in the few moments allotted her, her friends are consoled in the belief that a Saviour was near at hand, and that she died in the triumphs of a living faith.

THE FRIENDS AND THE FREEDMEN.

The Freedmen's Relief Association of Orthodox Friends held a special meeting last evening in the Meeting-House at Fourth and Arch streets. Owing to the inclemency of the weather, the attendance was not so large as on many similar occasions in the past. The venerable Samuel Hilles, a philanthropist of Wilmington, Del., presided.

John B. Garrett, Secretary of the Association, said that the present month closed the sixth year of the Association's existence, during which time a quarter of a million of dollars had passed through the Treasury, and been expended in the education, secular and religious, of the colored people of the South, and in their physical relief. The present work of the Association was in great measure limited to conducting schools, and these entirely in the States of Virginia and North Carolina. The expense of these is about $1,600 a month, for which the Association is under engagement till the first of next July—the close of the current school year. Additional means will be required for physical relief and purchase of Bibles and other religious reading, which the Association distributes freely and to a great extent. The entire need for the current year was stated at not less than 12,000 to 15,000 dollars, which Friends were urged to contribute.

Alfred H. Jones, Superintendent of the Association's schools in North Carolina, was introduced, and for about three-quarters of an hour enlisted the attention of his audience in a statement of the present condition of his charge. About forty-five schools, under care of upwards of sixty teachers, and with between three and four thousand children on the enrolment, are in successful operation. Experience shows that the largest attendance is during the winter and early spring, after the season of cotton picking is over, and before planting. The eagerness and ability of colored people to learn were dwelt upon. But that which drew the heartiest sympathies of the audience was the recital of the impoverished condition of the people, owing to the long-continued drought of last summer in those States. Corn, which last year sold at 85a100 cents per bushel, is now worth, at Danville, Va., $1 50a1 60—and a large part of the population have no means with which to buy. The winter has set in early, and with unusual severity, and great suffering is expected to result. The speaker appealed earnestly for the means to relieve it. The self-sacrifice of the teachers of the freedmen was proven by their unwillingness, even when urged by the committee in this city, who sent them out, to enjoy the luxury of a sleeping-car hence to Washington on their way to their work, preferring to save the money for the relief of the people to whom they go. And this after a rapid journey from the remotest parts of New England. Such are true missionaries, and demand the support of communities like ours, blessed in basket and in store.

Allen Jay, Superintendent of Friends' schools (white) in North Carolina, confirmed the statements of A. H. Jones as to the condition of the people in that State.

Francis T. King, of Baltimore, spoke of the religious character of the work of the Association, and the need to prosecute it vigorously under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. He also alluded to the especial importance of the work in North Carolina, in view of the poor credit of the State and consequent inability to command funds to establish and conduct State schools. The region of country in which the Association schools are mainly located was before the war a slave-breeding district, and now needs just such lessons of virtue as are being given by the teachers.

The meeting closed about half-past nine.—Evening Bulletin.

"ENTERING INTO THE CLOUD."

In the midst of the wonderful scene of the transfiguration, while the disciples were amazed and content with the vision of the glory of Jesus and his saintly visitors, "suddenly a cloud overshadowed them, and they feared as they entered into the cloud." There was nothing they need fear thus in the presence of Christ; and, besides, the cloud shut them out from sensual objects only that they might hear more distinctly and be more fully impressed by the solemn voice of the Father himself, calling, "This is my beloved Son, hear him." It is often so now with those of us who call ourselves Christ's disciples. We fear to enter the cloud that is ready for us on our brightest days. All high and holy joys are about us, and fill us with content. Congenial friendships, elevation of soul, the glorified Jesus before us, make us ready to "build tabernacles" in our mount, where we may just look, admire, and enjoy. But the cloud comes; and we tremble and shrink away from it, shutting our eyes in needless terrors, and hardly heeding the Father's loving message, "This is my beloved Son, close by you, with you through all darkness and change. He will come and touch you, saying, 'Arise, be not afraid.' Hear him; walk with him." Thrice blessed shall we be, if, when we open our eyes, we see "no man, but Jesus only."

It is good in God to give us an occasional glimpse of heavenly glory, to fill our mount with bright visions; but our daily life-work and walk are in the world below. We may, indeed, tread that path alone, stripped of our former dear delights; but with Jesus always with us, "Jesus only," we shall not regret having "entered into the cloud."—Christian Banner.

STRUCTURE AND CARE OF THE EAR.

It should be remembered, that constantly covering up the ear is adapted to injure it. On the whole, men, in whom the ear is habitually exposed, suffer, if anything, less from ear-disease than women, in whom it is so often covered. Nor can the "hat" be held an unsafe head-dress in this respect for the latter sex. But it is important that there should not be frequent changes, especially in cold weather, from a head-dress which covers to one which exposes the ear. It is better that the air should always have free access to it; but if this has not been the case, the summer should be chosen to make the change.

All sorts of substances are sometimes put into the ear by children, who do it to themselves or to each other in ignorant play. If every parent and teacher warned his children against doing this, it would not be a useless precaution. When the accident happens, the chief danger is that of undue haste and violence. Such bodies should be removed by syringing with warm water alone, and no attempt should be made to lay hold of them or move them in any other way. It is enough to reflect, again, that the passage of the ear is closed by a delicate membrane, to show the reason for this rule. When no severe pain follows, no alarm need be felt. It is important that the substance should be removed as speedily as is quite safe, but there need never be impatience; nor should disappointment be felt if syringing needs to be repeated on many days before it effects its end. It will almost invariably succeed at last in the hands of a medical man, and is most effective if the ear is turned downwards and syringed from below.

Now and then an insect gets into the ear and causes great pain; the way to get rid of it is to pour oil into the ear. This suffocates the insect.

There is another danger arising from boyish sports. Snowballs sometimes strike the ear, and the snow remaining in it sets up inflammation. This danger is increased by a practice which should be inadmissible, of mixing small stones with the snow, which thus effect a lodgment in the ear.

Among the causes of injury to the ear must unfortunately be reckoned bathing. Not that this most healthful and important pleasure need therefore be in the least discouraged; but it should be wisely regulated. Staying too long in the water certainly tends to produce deafness as well as other evils; and it is a practice against which young persons of both sexes should be carefully on their guard. But independently of this, swimming and floating are attended with a certain danger from the difficulty of preventing the entrance of water into the ear in those positions. Now no cold fluid should ever enter the ear; cold water is always more or less irritating, and if used for syringing rapidly, produces extreme giddiness. In the case of warm water its entrance into the ear is less objectionable, but even this is not free from disadvantage. Often the water lodges in the ears and produces an uncomfortable sensation till it is removed; this should always be taken as a sign of danger. That the risk to hearing from unwise bathing is not a fancy, is proved by the fact, well known to lovers of dogs, that those animals, if in the habit of jumping or being thrown into the water, so that their heads are covered, frequently become deaf. A knowledge of the danger is a sufficient guard. To be safe it is only necessary to keep the water from entering the ear. If this cannot be accomplished otherwise, the head may be covered. It should be added, however, that wet hair, whether from bathing or washing, may be a cause of deafness if it be suffered to dry by itself. Whenever wetted, the hair should be wiped till it is fairly dry. Nor ought the practice of moistening the hair with water to make it curl, to pass without remonstrance. To leave wet hair about the ears is to run great risk of injuring them. In the washing of children, too, care should be taken that all the little folds of the outer ear are carefully dried, and gently, with a soft towel.

Improper Methods of Cleansing the Ear.—But I come now to what is probably the most frequent way in which the ear is impaired: that is, by the attempt to clean them. It ought to be understood that the passage of the ear does not require cleansing by us. Nature undertakes that task, and in the healthy state fulfils it perfectly. Her means for cleansing the ear is the wax. Perhaps the reader has never wondered what becomes of the ear-wax. I will tell him. It dries up into thin, fine scales, and these peel off one by one from the surface of the passage, and fall out imperceptibly, leaving behind them a perfectly clean, smooth surface. In health the passage of the ear is never dirty; but if we attempt to clean it, we infallibly make it so. Here—by a strange lack of justice, as it would seem, which, however, has no doubt a deep justice at the bottom—the best people, those who love cleanliness, suffer most, and good and careful nurses do a mischief negligent ones avoid. Washing the ear out with soap and water is bad; it keeps the wax moist when it ought to become dry and scaly, increases its quantity unduly, and makes it absorb the dust with which the air always abounds. But the most hurtful thing is introducing the corner of the towel screwed up, and twisting it round. This does more harm to ears than all other mistakes together. It drives down the wax upon the membrane much more than it gets it out. Let any one who doubts this make a tube like the passage, especially with the curves which it possesses; let him put a thin membrane at one end, smear its inner surface with a substance like the ear-wax, and then try to get it out so by a towel! But this plan does much more mischief than merely pressing down the wax. It irritates the passage, and makes it cast off small flakes of skin, which dry up, and become extremely hard, and these also are pressed down upon the membrane. Often it is not only deafness which ensues, but pain and inflammation, and then matter is formed which the hard mass prevents from escaping, and the membrane becomes diseased, and worse may follow. The ear should never be cleaned out with the screwed-up corner of a towel. Washing should extend only to the outer surface, as far as the finger can reach.

Ear-picks, again, are bad. If there is any desire to use them, it shows that the ear is unhealthy; and it wants soothing, not picking. And there is another danger from introducing any solid thing into the ear. The hand may get a push, and it may go too far. Many is the membrance that has thus been broken by a bodkin. Sportsmen sometimes have their membrane pierced by turning suddenly while getting through a hedge; and it even happens that a boy at school may put a pen close to another's ear, in play, and call to him to make him turn his head, and the pen pierces the membrane. Very loud sounds may cause deafness, too. Artillerymen, and also eager sportsmen, and very zealous volunteers, incur a danger from this cause. It is well to stop the ears when exposed to loud sounds, if possible; also to avoid belfries when the bells are about to ring. A man who was once shut up in one became stone deaf before the peal was done. The sound of guns is more injurious to those who are in a confined space with them, and also if the mouth be open. Injury from loud sounds, also, is much more likely to occur if they are unexpected; for if they are anticipated, the membrane is prepared for them, without our knowledge, by its muscles. At certain points on the Rhine, it is, or was, the custom of the captain of the steamboat to fire a small cannon, to exhibit the echo. When this has been done without due warning, it has proved more than once a cause of lasting deafness. Sometimes these loud sounds rupture the membrane; sometimes they deaden the nerve; the former is the least evil.

It is a bad practice, also, to put cotton-wool soaked in laudanum or chloroform into the ear for the relief of toothache. It may be sometimes effectual, for the nervous connection between the teeth and the ear is very close. But the ear is far too delicate and valuable an organ to be used as a medium for the application of strong remedies for disorders of other and less important parts; and laudanum, and more especially chloroform, are powerful irritants. The teeth should be looked after in and for themselves, and if toothache spreads to the ear, that is the more reason for taking them thoroughly in hand; for prolonged pain in the head, arising from the teeth, may itself injure the hearing. When a child's ear becomes painful, as it so often does, everything should be done to soothe it, and all strong, irritating applications should be avoided. Pieces of hot fig or onion should not be put in; but warm flannels should be applied, with poppy fomentation if the pain does not soon subside. How much children suffer from their ears, unpitied because unknown, it would probably wring the hearts of those who love them, suddenly to discover. It is often very hard, even for medical men, to ascertain that the cause of a young child's distress is seated in the ear, and frequently a sudden discharge from it with a cessation of pain, first reveals the secret of a mysterious attack which has really been an inflammation of the drum. The watchfulness of a parent, however, would probably suffice to detect the cause of suffering if directed to this point, as well as to others. If children cry habitually when their ears are washed, that should not be neglected; there is, most likely, some cause of pain. Many membranes are destroyed from discharges which take place during "teething." Whenever there is a discharge of matter from the ear, it would be right to pour in warm water night and morning, and so at least to try to keep it clean. But into the treatment of diseases of the ear it would not be suitable to enter here.—Good Health.

THE MAMMOTH CAVE.

BY CHARLES WILLIAMS.

During my recent tour to the neighborhood of Louisville at the time of the great eclipse, I took occasion to explore some portions of the surrounding country; not so much above ground, not among the sunny hills and shady hollows, the green pastures and luxuriant forests, but among the rocks, and dens, and caves of the earth, where silence reigns supreme, and darkness, thick and gross and tangible, is broken only by the feeble glimmer of the visitor's torch, as he ventures now and then, to tread the lonely archways of these subterranean temples.

No portion of our country can boast of as many or as great curiosities of this class, as the region within a hundred miles of Lonisville. The greatest of these,—the greatest where all are great,—is the Mammoth Cave; the name of which is on every tongue that speaks of the wonderful freaks of Nature with an intelligent appreciation:—the ideal of which dwells in no mind, that has not witnessed the solemn grandeur of its wonderful chambers, and its dark and silent scenes of wild, unearthly beauty.

It is beyond my power,—it is perhaps beyond the power of any,—to convey to others a full and just idea of this great and wonderful cavern. Many have tried, and have failed in an honest effort; many have sought to supply the deficiency of descriptive power by a swelling and pompous array of words, without sufficiently definite ideas or connected trains of thought; and many again have indulged in vague and unmeaning expressions of wonder and astonishment — wondering themselves at what they saw and wished to convey to their readers,—but unluckily failing to give them any definite ground-work on which to build a superstructure of corresponding admiration.

Under these circumstances it may appear presumptuous in me, to take up the parable on which others have so signally failed, and indeed I do not expect success without a hearty co-operation on the part of those who see proper to follow me; for a vivid conception and a just appreciation of any unfamiliar object, depend quite as much on the warmth of fancy in the reader, as on the power of language in the writer. I will therefore endeavor to give a plain and simple outline of the chief features of the cave, and to build up a frame-work upon which an imagination of reasonable warmth can, at least, hang the separate pictures it may trace, and thus combine them in one united whole, that shall bear more or less resemblance to the great original.

I shall not, however, task the patience of the reader, by describing all its minutiæ of ornament, all its windings and turnings, all its angles and long, monotonous passages, which the visitor finds in plentiful profusion; but shall endeavor to give a general idea of these, where sufficiently important to demand attention; and then ask him to accompany me to its more impresssive scenes, to its features of grandeur, and glory, and beauty, and to places where terror will thrill the sensitive nerve, and a solemn awe descend upon the mind, as if in the presence of the great Architect and Ruler of these vast temples of darkness and solitude. For the present we will confine ourselves to the "short route," making a journey, including all the windings and doublings, of somewhere in the neighborhood of eight miles, and embracing some of the most impressive and beautiful scenes in the cave;—but not however, the River; that grandest and most awe-inspiring feature which has yet been discovered on any line of subterranean travel. The long route must be reserved for a subsequent article.

Mammoth Cave—most unkindly treated in the selection of so uncouth a name—is situated in Edmondson County, Kentucky, ninety-five miles from Louisville, and about midway, and almost in an exact line, between that place and Nashville. It is easy of access; the railroad connecting these two cities, passes through Glasgow Junction and Cave City, respectively eight and nine miles distant, and daily lines of stages run from both stations to the cave. It opens in one of the hollows that break up from the southern shore of Green River, about a quarter of a mile from the stream, and a few hundred feet above its level, though far below the general surface of the country. It is in a rough, wild, semi-mountainous region, where the soil is light, and the attractions to the farmer and the mechanic are few and powerless. Three white families, and eight families of freedmen, comprise the entire population within one mile of the mouth of the cave—certainly not a very heavy census for a circle of two miles in diameter. Extending the circle to four miles in diameter, you enclose the habitations of eight families of whites, and a few more of colored.

A hotel of rather primitive appearance, consisting of alternate log cabins and board shanties, stretching around three sides of a spacious court, where the grass sod is thickly shaded with ornamental trees, planted by the hand of Nature, stands on the high grounds about a quarter of a mile from the entrance. It has, however, an outside shell in front, that gives it a seeming elevation above the Order of Architecture to which it properly belongs. From the tavern, a path leads across the gardens and down the steep hillside, to the opening of the cave.

We will endeavor to obtain a more graphic idea of its rather singular features, by supposing ourselves approaching it from below. Just opposite the mouth of the cave, the waters of the Green river divide and enclose a beautiful little island in their embrace, covered with tangled herbage and smail undergrowth of the forest. The shores of the main land are wild and wooded, rough and broken, but not rocky. A valley opens up between the hills, having gentle slopes as we leave the river, but becoming gradually steeper and narrower as we proceed, till it contracts to a rugged hollow, with rocks here and there projecting from the hill-sides, and paving the footpath in the bottom. Then the hollow becomes less steep, while the hill on the right falls away in a more gentle slope, and that on the left shoots up in a steeper and more romantic bluff.

But now as the face of this bluff comes more fully into view, we see just before us a leaf of rock projecting out from the cliff horizontally across the hollow, and joining the hill on the opposite side. Rising a little higher, we see under this rather singular ledge that all is darkness and gloom; it rests on vacancy. We stand on the brink of a hole perhaps 20 feet deep, while the leaf of rock before us is ten feet above our level. To a person standing on the brink of this ledge, it would appear as a hole about 30 feet deep and 30 feet square; while the cavern under him, of nearly equal size, would of course be invisible. A winding stairway of loose flat stones has been laid in the sloping bank, down which we pass to the cave itself, which runs back under that rocky ledge, without any diminution in size, till it is lost in the shades of absolute blackness.

As we enter in the afternoon of a hot summer's day, the temperature is delightfully cool, always 59° in the depths of the cavern, and varying but little at the entrance. Having stood a moment to collect our thoughts, and indulge those emotions that will arise, when we find ourselves for the first time in the presence of any of Nature's master-pieces, we—an intimate friend and myself—joined the company which had collected to make the short route. Every morning during the season, a party starts on the long route at nine o'clock, while the "short parties" enter at half-past nine, and at two in the afternoon.

Our party to-day was excessively large. The city dandy and the belle of fashion; the sturdy farmer and his comely bride; the pompous professional gentleman and his bustling lady; the graceful and the active and the awkward and uncouth; all actuated by more or less of a spirit of admiration of Nature's works, met together on terms of equality for the time being, to walk hand in hand, as it were, through those vast subterranean halls, where Nature reveals her operations under circumstances entirely new; presenting nothing in common with the more familiar features of the world of life, of light and sound, to which we are accustomed in the chemistry and physics of the day. Each gentleman is presented with a small tin lamp, holding half a pint of lard oil, suspended by four wires about eight inches long to a ring by which it is carried, and furnished with a metallic screen to protect the hand from the heat.

As we take up our line of march in single file, our guide—the celebrated MATT, known throughout the civilized world, a man about fifty years of age, slightly stained with the hot tide that flows through the veins of Afric's sons, and, prior to the day of LINCOLN, held under the galling chains of slavery, by the oppressive laws of our land—cautions us to hold our lamps close before us, and to hasten through a doorway just in front, where a strong current of air was sweeping out, and would otherwise extinguish the lights. Observing his caution, we hurry through the passage, and find ourselves in the more spacious cave beyond—where of course the draft is less perceptible—with full half our lamps "trimmed and burning.' We could not furnish oil to those whose lamps had "gone out," but fortunately they were all full, and oil was carried "in their vessels with their lamps" by the prudent guides. It costs nothing to light a neighbor's taper at our flame, however puny it may be, and we were soon standing out distinct, in bold relief, in the strong glare of more than thirty lamps.

"THIS MAN RECEIVETH SINNERS AND EATETH WITH THEM."

LUKE XV. 2.

"This man receiveth sinners,"—hear it, ye sons of earth!
The peasant of the valley, or men of noble birth;
An old time Jewish story, and yet, tis ever new,
"This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them," too.

And who this benefactor? Who hath such courtesy?
Not thus do earthly princes greet sin and poverty;
Only the titled and the rich may pass their palace gate;
Hunger and cold are for the poor, and feasting for the great.

This man is called "Christ Jesus,"—a prophet, prince, and priest,—
The same whose star to Bethlehem led wise men of the East;
He owneth many mansions,—the feast is full in view;
"This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them," too.

He is a friend unchanging; He ever is the same;
His door is standing open; you've but to speak His name;
He sees your filth and tatters, but His fountain running o'er,
Will give a health and purity you never knew before.

Then, in garments of His own, He arrays you for the feast,
And from His bounty well supplies the greatest and the least;
Ho, watchman on the walls! proclaim to Gentile and to Jew,
"This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them," too.

You need no toilsome journey, for He meets you by the way;
He watches for each traveller while yet 'tis called to-day;
Run quickly, you are welcome!—no money need you bring;
He is a well-beloved Son, his Father is a King.

"This man receiveth sinners,"—He will their surety be;
He giveth endless blessedness to cure life's misery;
The infant of the manger! the temple's holy child!
The wonder-working Nazarene, gracious and undefiled!

The stricken one of Calvary, our Master and our Lord!
Oh! cast away each doubt and fear, and take Him at His word.
Say, will ye come and sup with Him, and prove the message true:
"This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them," too.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—Advices from Europe are to the 22d inst.

Great Britain.—Violent gales have prevailed around the coast, and numerous shipwrecks are reported.

Ireland.—A Fenian demonstration was made at Waterford on the 17th, by a torchlight procession, in which nearly 5000 persons took part. No disturbance occurred, and the police did not interfere.

France.—The manifesto of the Opposition members of the Legislative Body has been published, signed by 28 deputies. They say that the demand by the people of the right to govern themselves means an inevitable transformation, the necessity for which is each day found to be more imperative. The Opposition intend to use peaceful means to that end, unless an attempt is made to silence them by force. They pronounce against the preliminary oath required of the members, and also against the military laws, declaring that the country should be armed merely for self defence. The manifesto indicates some reforms on which the Opposition will insist. One of the signers has since written a letter stating that the document is only the minimum programme of the policy of the party, whose labors will not cease until on the ruins of personal government they establish the republic.

The supplementary elections for members of the Legislative Body from Paris commenced on the 21st, and ended on the 22d. They were rendered necessary by four of the members first elected having been chosen also from other districts, and having preferred to take their seats for those districts. No disturbances occurred. In three districts, Rochefort, Cremieux and Arago, all strongly Opposition candidates, were elected. In a fourth, no candidate had a decisive majority, and a new election will be required. Ledru Rollin withdrew as a candidate, before the election.

The Bishop of Orleans has published a letter addressed to the clergy of his diocese, deprecating the idea that the present is a favorable opportunity for claiming the infallibility of the Pope, and blaming certain journals for inconsiderate haste in discussing such a delicate question in advance of the deliberations of the general Council. It is said that the Pope himself does not wish the question broached in the Council, if it is likely to induce discussion and elicit much opposition.

Spain.—The nomination of the Duke of Genoa to the throne is said to be now supported by 161 Deputies. The Cortes consists of 360 Deputies, of whom the monarchical party constitute a majority, but they are not unanimous in favor of any one candidate. The King of Italy is reported to have declared that his nephew should not accept the crown, unless tendered by a vote of two-thirds of the Cortes. The Duke, a lad of 16, is now at school in England.

A Constitution for the island of Porto Rico has been submitted to the Cortes. It declares Porto Rico a province of Spain, permits public meetings in the presence of the authorities, but prohibits the discussion sf slavery. Many reforms are granted. Some days before the introduction of this constitution, one of the Deputies from the island, inquiring the intentions of the government, advised the abolition of slavery, with indemnity to masters, when the Minister for the Colonies replied that the question would soon be solved, and in a way to cause the least injury; and he subsequently declared himself favorable to the course proposed by the Deputy.

The republican minority in the Cortes, on the 19th inst., presented a protest declaring that there was no truth in the report that they were engaged in conspiracy with the Cuban revolutionists.

Italy.—An amnesty has been granted to political offenders, extending to all who participated in the riots which recently prevailed in some parts of the country, in opposition to a new tax imposed on grist-mills.

Prussia.—The government announces its intention of reforming the press laws.

Suez Canal.—The Emperor of Austria, the Empress of the French, the Prince of Prussia, a son of the King of Italy, and representatives of many other nations and smaller tribes, attended the ceremonies of the opening of the canal. The Sultan was not present. The festivities commenced on the 15th, at Port Said, the terminus on the Mediterranean, where the Viceroy of Egypt received the Emperor of Austria with great ceremony. On the 16th, among other events, both a Christian and a Mohammedan place of worship were dedicated, priests and ministers of all creeds being invited to be present on both occasions. The next day religious ceremonies were performed by a priest in the suite of the French Empress, and a fleet of about 45 vessels passed through the first part of the canal, to Ismailia, where four steamers from Suez met them. The voyage was continued on the succeeding days, and on the 21st the whole fleet reached Suez, without any difficulty except what their number caused. Some were crowded upon the banks at various points, but were not injured, and some collisions occurred without serious damage. Between Suez and Ismailia, the shallowest part is almost 20 feet deep; several places are less than 25 feet deep, but these it is intended to deepen. A steamer drawing 15 feet, it is said, can pass through in 15 hours. It was intended to erect at Suez a statue of Waghorn, an Englishman who is stated to have first suggested the construction of the canal, and at Port Said one of DeLesseps, the French engineer and director of the work; with the latter ceremony, the inaugural festivities would terminate.

Pacific Ocean.—Accounts have been received of a destructive earthquake in the Philippine Islands. The sea rose very high, and the loss of property was very great. Eight persons were killed and many injured at Manilla. Earthquakes and related phenomena have also been experienced in the Sandwich Islands, and the volcano of Mauna Loa has apparently been in eruption.

Domestic.—The Legislature of Alabama has ratified the 15th Constitutional amendment, the Senate unanimously, the House by a vote of 69 to 16. That of Tennessee has rejected it, by a large majority in both Houses.

REPORT OF CONFERENCE OF TEACHERS AND DELEGATES OF FRIENDS' FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS.

The first subject still under consideration: "THE AIMS AND OBJECTS OF FIRST-DAY SCHOOL TEACHING."

JAMES C. THOMAS, after referring to the meeting together in this place of many from the East, West, North and South who had been separated for years,—the Lord's workmen, each in the service which it had pleased Him to assign them in this cause,—proceeded to say:—"And as we have looked into each other's eyes, and felt the influence of each other's spirits, we have been enabled to rejoice in one another, and, above all, to rejoice in the blessed Master who has, during these long years, been with his poor and dependent children; has kept them by the way; has ministered to them Himself; has made their hearts to burn within them, whilst He has talked with them by the way. And now that we are here together again,—to consult together again, to feel the influence of each other's spirits again, to take one another by the hand, and to wish each other God-speed in all the work which the Lord may have laid upon us as individuals,—I have rejoiced and desired that He might bless us from time to time with His own Presence, and with His Holy Spirit flowing from heart to heart, as together we consider those great and glorious truths of salvation which are so precious to our own souls; and as we are warmed up with a desire to carry them to others, that they too may come to know how sweet a thing it is to love the Lord Jesus Christ, how precious a service is His service, and how rich the reward which He vouchsafes!

ELI JONES.—It has been in my heart to say, Friends, let none of us be of a fearful mind, but rather of a confiding heart, trusting in the Lord. In every age of the world the Lord has been the refuge and the strength of His people. None have trusted in Him in vain; none have accepted Him as their Leader and been foiled in battle. We are feeble—we are as nothing; but He is all-powerful—infinite in goodness. And it is comforting to remember that He is the good Shepherd of the sheep, that He knoweth every sheep of His flock and every lamb of His fold, and that He is disposed to bless them and to do them good. Then let us, Friends, put on strength in the Name of the Lord and say: "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." Let Him be our Leader, our Counsellor,—let Him be our great salvation,—and the work shall prosper in our hands: He will bless both the work and the workers.

FRANCIS T. KING and HENRY DICKENSON spoke encouragingly. The latter, referring to the paper which had been read, [see first page of last No.,] felt that it meets the question exactly—that the objects and aims of First-day schools are no less than those therein described. He thought the qualification for the work well portrayed. We must aim high, and aim truly—and our object must correspond with our aim.

BENJAMIN FRANKLAND thought that, no matter what we undertake, it is well for us to have a definite aim and purpose. He thought, generally speaking, in worldly matters we have little difficulty in ascertaining our aim and purpose of action. In my own dealings with business men, said he, I find out, indirectly, in a little intercourse, what kind of business the man is engaged in. It generally talks from him in his conversation, in his attitude, in his manner of proceeding with his business, and through a variety of circumstances. And I believe that human experience will attest that in proportion as the aim of an individual is clear and definite, so is he more or less likely to attain his purpose and make his work perfect and complete. It seems to me, he continued, that in the labor of Scriptural instruction in which we are engaged, it is well to ask ourselves—What is the aim of this work—what do we propose to accomplish by it—the end we have in view? He thought that in thus questioning there is no need for us to become discouraged because we see that the ultimate aim is a matter into which our own souls will have to go and be developed in it, as well as the hearts or souls of those whom we may be permitted to instruct in these blessed truths. He deemed it eminently essential that an aim and an end to our labor be held in view, in order that we may, step by step, as we receive power and assistance from on high, see that the work is prospering in our hands, and that it is likely to accomplish what was designed. But as he understood it, the object of Scriptural instruction—of instruction in First-day schools—is to make wise unto salvation. And while he saw, as the great end of all this instruction, the final redemption of every one of these precious souls, and while as a First-day school teacher he hoped by-and-by, on the shining plains of light, to see the little ones gathered there, praising the Redeemer, and casting their crowns at His feet,—while this is the aim, he recognized the book that is put into his hands, the blessed teachings of the Holy Scriptures that contain this wisdom that makes wise unto salvation, and he asked himself the question, Why did not my Father in heaven, when He designed to instruct the world in this blessed revelation, send some marvellous display of His divine power that would compel you and me to believe in these truths? Why was it that from age to age the Divine Spirit prompted holy men to record the words of this book? Why has it been placed in our hands as the text-book of instruction? He understood the reason to be that our dear Father in heaven connected the blessed truths of redemption with human experience. He saw all these streams flowing down through these ages—these streams of human experience flowing from every direction—and yet he saw them flowing directly to the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ. So far as he tried to teach those scholars the history of that Bible, the records of those nations which are named, or the biography of those holy men who have preceded us in the great battle-field of faith—while he tried (whether in teaching geography, chronology, history, or whatever else) to direct those scholars as best he knew how from that stream of human experience to that redemption purchased by the blessed Saviour upon the cross, he believed that in this way—in looking from this standpoint—we can show them that every one of these streams of knowledge is the very means by which we appreciate in its completeness and fulness that wonderful redemption that is the end of the labor in which we are engaged. We want a complete work, that comprehends the end of the labor, yet commences at the beginning, seeks to lay a foundation, and to connect all these experiences with the heart, the circumstances and the life of the scholar whom we endeavor to lead into these paths of knowledge. He thought those engaged in this labor would bear him out in the assertion that there is no circumstance of human life, no instinct of the human heart, no condition of being, that will not find its representative in the great Scriptural truths conveyed to us in that Bible; and that the Holy Spirit enables us, as we come humbly, as children, (teachable spirits ourselves,) to the Saviour, to convey or teach those truths to others, &c.

Charles R. Tucker, in pursuing an inquiry into the needful qualification and action of the teacher, asked,—Can he impart to others what he does not possess? Verily he thought not. He must through prayer become acquainted with and a disciple of the Saviour, to whom he would lead his class,—and must submit to that Saviour's teachings.

Charles Taber thought there is no necessity of taking a lower view than this—that the object of this work is the fulfillment of prophecy. He referred to the prophecy that the time shall come when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea, and when there shall be no necessity to say, Know the Lord, for all shall know Him. He knew very well that it is written, "the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men," but that grace has not been accepted by all. And it is the object of First-day school men, as he received it, that those who have accepted this precious grace of God, should know it in its fulness and hand it to others, that they too may receive and may be blessed.

James B. Congdon gave his endorsement to the written address. He questioned the spending of so much time in First-day schools upon the biographical and geographical parts of Scripture, apprehending that there might be great show of Scriptural teaching, with very little inculcation of the spirit of the Scriptures. He wished more directness in teaching the great principles of the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. After instructive remarks he expressed his conviction that we should be more alive to the great thought that our object in teaching the young is to bring them into harmony with the Divine mind, and that upon that harmony depends their peace and progress here, and their everlasting well-being.

Murray Shipley called attention to the theme under discussion as being both the aim and the object of the First-day schools. In the essay several times referred to, and in all the remarks that had been made, the minds of Friends were evidently tending in one direction—the need, primarily, of teaching the Lord Jesus Christ to the scholars. He had visited the First-day schools of different denominations, and would say concerning those of Friends, that the distinctive feature was thoroughness. He took a retrospect of the time when the whole instruction was in the geography, history and morality of the Bible, which was felt to be about as far as we ought to go. That far any one could go; we could point scholars to the Holy Spirit that should lead them into paths of uprightness, and if they obeyed its teachings, into paths of spiritual life. But, he said, the Lord breathed upon His people, and was pleased to make the First-day school an active working body. Then came a reaction. He told of a Friend who with tears remarked to him, years ago, "I am not going to teach the maps or geography any longer; I am going to teach the Lord Jesus Christ to children." Now, said he, if we do not have that as the primary aim of all our teaching, we may as well shut up our doors—the sooner the better. Other objects associated with this one are inferior to it. I think that by means of geography we can teach the Lord Jesus Christ more earnestly. I think that when the scholar learns just exactly where Bethlehem is on the map, the predominant thought in the mind of the teacher should be to point that scholar not simply to Bethlehem, but to Bethlehem's King. The speaker alluded to his being in his boyhood, in attending First-day schools, required to learn long passages of Scripture, and he did not approve of the omission of this. He referred touchingly to the many engaged in labors of love and desirous of walking in the paths of God's will, who cannot say: I know I am a Christian. He expressed great desire for what he thought lacking among great numbers of Friends—an open and public confession of the Lord Jesus, by means of which they might be enabled to feel the promised strength—for if we believe with our hearts and confess with our mouths we shall be saved. He referred to the Sower, sowing seed. It is the truths of the Scriptures we are to sow—the messages of salvation to every soul. He dwelt also on the duty of watering the seed with prayers, (the secret of success,) thus causing it to take root and fructify more rapidly.

Samuel Boyce briefly stated the object and aim of these schools to be,—to teach the young and tender mind the way of salvation through a crucified Saviour. He rejoiced in the interest and feeling of the present occasion, in the evidence of the fulfilment of the prophecy, "There shall be a handful of corn in the earth:—on the top of the mountains the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon." He rejoiced in the dissemination of the Scriptures and the blessing attendant thereon, instancing Spain, Africa, &c. He deduced encouragement from the signs of the times, comparing the present moral standing of the world, for instance, in the Courts of Europe, with fifty or an hundred years ago, as supporting the conclusion that the blessed knowledge of the Lord is spreading and increasing in the earth. He entered into the history of First-day schools among Friends; and he considered the question of their utility and propriety as decided—settled. He referred to the establishment by our dear aged Friend Nathan Hunt of a First-day school within North Carolina Yearly Meeting in 1820 or '22,—one in Nantucket about 1830, and one in Lynn about 1832. The above is but a brief abstract of his remarks.

Caroline Ladd made remarks much in consonance with some previous expressions; saying, in conclusion, that if we cannot, from the fulness of a heart beating with the consciousness of sins forgiven, come before our class and speak of a Saviour's love, we have no time to lose. But she would not that we should be discouraged—rather that we should remember the blessed promise that no more would our Heavenly Father refuse to give us the Holy Spirit than would a parent give a stone for bread.

John Henry Douglass impressively enforced the sentiments of several previous speakers, and spoke words of earnest exhortation,—making, among others, this definite point: that in whatever sphere or department we may be placed in connection with Scriptural instruction, we should never stop short until the objects of our interest are attained—until the end is accomplished. Though our objects of care may live under our instruction until fourscore or more years old, yet we are to feel that each is still worthy of our consideration, inasmuch as Christ died for each, and that we are placed here to labor continuously in the cause of our blessed Redeemer, &c.

Isaac Shearman gave utterance to a message of tender encouragement to those who may not as yet be able to point their scholars to the Lamb. There is One who is able to give us that power—not able only but ready and willing—able to supply all our needs, willing to give us more abundantly of His Holy Spirit than we have power to ask. He concluded with impressive exhortation to teachers.

James C. Thomas followed in unison with the last speaker. He believed that our blessed Master never gives a greater blessing to any one of us than when He excites in us a greater interest in the souls that are around us. It is not only a blessing to the souls in whose behalf He sends that interest, but it is a blessing to ourselves; it is the training school in which it pleases our Master to train us. By teaching others we ourselves are taught—and in watering we are watered. He appealed to the experience of many teachers who are now prepared to take the strongest and the highest grounds, that when they once began in simplicity and sincerity they themselves had to be taught by their classes, &c.

William H. Ladd alluded to the responsibility of every individual member who has come hither. We believe that every child of God through Christ our Saviour, is a King and a Priest unto God to offer up spiritual sacrifices. He encouraged the female teachers to remember that the good of this Conference depends on the right one speaking at the right time.

In the evening session, Henry T. Wood, on taking his place as President of the Conference, said:

"I believe it was understood in the Executive Committee that an important qualification for the position of Chairman of this Conference was the feeling of a lack of qualification for the position. And I think there are very few that could have brought to the place a stronger feeling in that respect than could I. And while I would not take up the time of this large meeting by any further allusion to myself, I wish to say so much as this: that I did feel I had very strong claims upon the meeting for their sympathy and their support. With that, I will try to do the best I can." He then announced that opportunity might be given for a few further brief remarks upon the subject of the previous discussion.

F. T. King encouraged the President to confine the speakers to the subject directly before the meeting; and wished Friends in speaking to condense their remarks.

John B. Garrett desired that we might not pass wholly from the subject, under the impression that schools of Scriptural instruction had for their sole object the conversion of unbelievers. When we reflect that the New Testament, in enumerating the varied gifts conferred by the great Head of the Church, upon its members, specifies that of the Evangelist and that of the Teacher side by side with each other, and with the gift of prophecy, we must recognize that they are distinct gifts. And oftentimes when the work of the evangelist has, under the blessing of the Lord, perfected itself, there still remains the work of the teacher to be performed. I presume we will be united in the conviction that very many are converted when they have but very little Scriptural knowledge; that they come to a sudden knowledge of Jesus Christ, and that there yet remains towards all such, a great mission for First-day Schools. It is so within our own Society, and it is so without our Society. He referred to the converting of unbelievers as the leading work—the ultimate object as that of bringing souls to Christ; but there is an additional work which goes to make the perfect character, and which we must all hope to achieve.

George R. Buffum pointed young teachers to the Source from which every needful qualification may come, and illustrated his words of encouragement by the benefit he experienced fifteen years ago, in conducting a Friends' school in Maine; entering on the work prayerfully, and experiencing a blessing himself.

Eli Jones.—The end of Scriptural instruction is the conversion of souls, the saving of souls taught, and of the souls of those who teach. After speaking of the great and primary view, he presented the auxiliary view, to incite a love for the reading and study of the Holy Scriptures. The aims of the teachers should be various, and the ground occupied broad. [His remarks upon the history, geography, and biography of the Bible lands will, it is trusted, be more fully reported by others.] It would not do to take up one point, and say we will teach that and nothing more. We must enter the broad ground, and carry along with us all the aims that are worthy to be kept in view.

Robert Lindley Murray made interesting and instructive remarks, somewhat anecdotal, illustrative of the necessity of keeping ever in view the definite aims and objects.

James Wood spoke upon the more ready reception of Christian instruction in childhood—in youth. The time to impress the seal upon the wax is while it is soft. Dr. Spencer, who labored in Brooklyn, out of 1000 conversions, found that 548 had occurred under twenty years of age, 337 between twenty and thirty, 86 between thirty and forty, (how they drop off!) 15 between forty and fifty, 3 between fifty and sixty, 1 between sixty and seventy—thereafter,—none. What better argument could we use for the First-day school work, if a majority were converted to Christ while yet in their minority.

Daniel Hill, agreeing with former speakers, dwelt at length upon the great work yet to be performed in instructing those who had been converted. He expressed many important thoughts.

After remarks from Edward Earle and John S. Hilles, Charles Taber, by request, gave satisfactory evidence respecting the school at New Bedford, and of its usefulness even upon older members of the meeting, and those who have not been directly connected with the school or class.

Asa S. Wing.—We have set our mark high; do we expect to hit that mark? He believed that if we have our eye singly upon that mark in Christ, we shall attain to all we seek after. He supposed the case of some little scholar asking, "Teacher, are you saved?" How can we tell that which we do not know, or impart that which we have not received? If we cannot answer such a question affirmatively, let us give ourselves up to Christ now, and then I believe God will enable us for His sake to hit the mark we aim at.

Henry Hartshorne.—There is one thing better than to convert a soul, and that is, to convert two or many souls. The object then is, the instruction of those who are themselves to become teachers after conversion. In the accomplishment of this object, next to the aid of the Holy Spirit, there is nothing worth so much as having a thorough acquaintance with the Bible, &c.

After remarks by Thomas W. Ladd, Hannah E. Bean, in response to a question respecting the First-day school with which she was connected in Iowa, said that in her own beloved meeting, where they loved to gather in the fear of the Lord, the Truth has had a large place among us through this instrumentality. She made touching allusion to the honored Elder, gray-haired in wisdom and experience, —listened to with rapt attention—and that he often testified that he felt, when gathered there with the children, that the Lord was with them. She spoke of the adult class steadily growing in interest; no class more richly blessed. The aim high—Oh! how full the treasury!—If we daily follow the great Teacher's guidance, we shall find every flower, every land, every town in the Bible will be used by Him, and given to us to hand out to others; and that every lesson which He gives will draw us nearer to Himself.

Mary W. Thomas. It is very important that we should have a personal experience of what we teach; also, that believers should be edified, and brought to know the completeness of the great salvation that is provided for us. Very important that in our First-day schools our young people should be thoroughly instructed in our own principles. Differing as they do in some very important features from the principles of all other religious societies, it seems to be owing to our young people that they should be thoroughly acquainted with their entire consistency with the Scriptures—should know that we do receive all our views thence—so that they should not be forced to apologize for their views, but be able to give a Scriptural reason for the grounds of our belief.

Several other speakers very instructively occupied the meeting; but we have given as much space as can be afforded to this first theme.

The President announced the second topic for discussion—The Necessity for and Right Conduct of Teachers' Meetings.

Robert Lindley Murray said that during the latter part of the life of that great statesman Daniel Webster, a gentleman put to him the question, "What is the greatest thought that ever occupied your mind?" You may imagine the expression of face and tone of voice as he said: "The greatest thought that ever occupied my mind was my individual accountability to God." R. L. M. believed that if we all realized this individual accountability, when a Friend is asked to take charge of a First-day school, there would not be so many to say, "Oh, I dare not take the responsibility;" as if it relieved one of the responsibility to shirk the discharge of what may be presented as a duty. Instead of that, why should we not, with all our weakness and sense of unworthiness, endeavor to do the best we can, looking to the Lord for help? And so, too, with our teachers. If we realize this accountability, we shall feel it to be our duty to avail ourselves of every means which our Heavenly Father places within our reach, to enable us efficiently to do our whole work for Him. Among those means the speaker ranked as foremost the Teachers' Meeting. Wherever you see a live, earnest teachers' meeting sustained, you will find an earnest, live and successful school. And as a usual thing, wherever you see a teacher determined at all times to attend a teachers' meeting, there you will find an earnest and devoted worker. In refutation of the plea of want of interest and lack of time, he urged the duty to our class, to our superintendent, to our fellow teachers, to the school at large. If each teacher, however earnest and zealous, were circumscribed to a mere attendance on one's particular class, that school would be like what we might picture the United States had the Rebellion been successful—each State to itself and no bond of union. Assuming then the great practical importance of these schools, he proceeded to consider very practically how they might best be conducted. There are schools that are able to sustain a monthly meeting with reference to the business of the school, and also a weekly meeting for the study and preparation of the lesson. As a general rule, he thought, most teachers would be unwilling to devote two evenings in one week to their teachers' meeting, and as they fail of their objects unless fully attended, he favored the disposal through the weekly of the business of the monthly meetings. In a case of say twenty teachers coming together every week, the Superintendent will have before him the record of the attendance of every class. As these meetings should be, to some extent, very social and easy, the teachers would be or should become very well acquainted with each other. The Superintendent having his book before him, after examination says: "Well, John Jones, I see one of thy boys has been absent from school two weeks? Canst thou tell what is the matter?" John Jones perhaps narrates what an interesting visit he had in quest of the absentee—the domestic affliction—sick mother—and how he had been able to minister to their comfort. In all this the other teachers will be interested. If, however, John Jones could not account for the absence of the child, the probability is that he will not soon place himself in that position again, but would see the scholar before another teachers' meeting. Then again, Mary Jones has a class of—we will say a dozen little boys. Perhaps she will complain that she has had great difficulty in controlling them. This supposed case brought to his mind a young woman who had a class of thirteen scholars, and being asked as to the order of her class, and what she was going to do to attain better order—"Oh," said she, "I have tried almost every thing and see no improvement; but now I have laid it before my Heavenly Father in prayer, and I want you, my fellow teachers, to unite with me in asking Him to help me so to control the minds of those children that they will be more tractable, and that I may be a blessing to them." From week to week she reported decided improvement, and in four weeks six of those unruly boys were really converted to God. Thus, he said, fifteen or twenty minutes might pass in conversation, eliciting the efforts and experience of the several teachers for the edification of each other. Then assuming that a general lesson for the whole school is adopted, (for he thought no school having tried it would adopt any other plan,) the teachers would of course have thoroughly prepared their lesson at home, and have come to examine it together. Then as to the manner of proceeding, it might take the form of a lecture—or, better, of a Bible class. The Superintendent might ask—"James Smith, what dost thou consider the definite aim in reference to that particular lesson?" James Smith would state his views—and so with the rest of the teachers. Thus we get the views upon that point of all the teachers; and here consists the advantage over a Bible class. He showed how the practical information thus acquired would enable to teach the lesson more fully—and the power and importance of illustration. If A. has an illustration that meets the case, he does not lose by contributing his knowledge to the others. If each teacher contributes in this way, each will have a fund to draw upon. But he feared the teachers' meeting would fall very far short did it stop here—and would it stop here in a company of earnest Christian workers? He believed that the latter fifteen or twenty minutes of the hour would be well employed in a period of worship, when we may draw near to God, asking His blessing upon our work and upon the lesson we are about to teach. And these opportunities will prove to be blessed seasons of communion with Him and with one another.

Isaac Shearman.—In all rightly-conducted and successful religious societies, it has been found quite necessary that those most deeply interested should often assemble in a prayerful mind, seeking for guidance and strength, and thus assembling, it has been promised that the Spirit of the Lord should be with and bless them. Nor is the work of Scriptural schools an exception, but rather of all others the most in need of such assembling, especially now since long experience has taught that one lesson for a whole school, and that of itself but a part of a series, is the best plan for a lesson. For now each teacher, by free intercourse with the others and interchange of thought, is enabled much better to understand all the varied points. The interest, too, is greatly increased by seeing others engaged in the perusal of the same lesson, diligently inquiring for more wisdom on the subject. But, above all, such meetings afford the best opportunity for all to join in asking for blessings on their work, but on this I need not dwell, believing that all present are aware of this great necessity.

Thus, having considered the importance of teachers' meetings, let us consider the subject of how best to conduct them.

First of all, ought we not to remember that the work engaged in is one of a "high and holy calling," a commission for which is no less direct from our Heavenly Father than is that of the ministry.

Surely then we ought to assemble as in His presence, "looking unto Jesus," who is the Author and Finisher of our faith, for that strength, support and guidance, which alone cometh from the Giver of all good gifts, with humility of heart in earnest petition that in His love and mercy He might own and bless us, giving unto us that wisdom and power that will enable us to so impart His Scriptural truths, that the hearts of our scholars may be reached, that others, too, may "come taste and see what good things the Lord has in store for them that love Him." He has bid us thus ask for wisdom and strength, saying, "As ye believe so shall it be done unto you."

Let every teacher come thus "hungering and thirsting" to Him "who giveth liberally and upbraideth not" for that knowledge and measure of His Holy Spirit that will enable them to do His whole will concerning the labor called for at their hands, and surely they will be fed.

Secondly. Let the teachers come to the class after diligent and careful study of the lesson, each having exhausted all the wisdom allotted them, and after prayerful consideration of it in their own closets. Thus gathering with hearts overflowing with a desire for wisdom more favorably to illustrate and bring out the truth before their class — willing, too, to impart to the other teachers what thoughts may have been given them in regard to it, and thus "in watering others be themselves watered;" in short, for each to come to learn how best to illustrate and teach what has already been diligently studied, remembering that teachers' meetings are not the places to study the lesson, but rather to study how best to teach the lesson.

Thirdly. If possible, let the Superintendent, acting somewhat as a leader, draw out from each teacher what have seemed to them to be the principal points of the lesson and what is the one central thought, the most prominent Scriptural references to which should be read in order by the other teachers. After having thus found what in the lesson seems to be the great teaching, let each one then state their thoughts, and how best to illustrate by object or other teaching these prominent points in the lesson, and how best to apply them to their classes. After this, let the Superintendent state what has seemed to him to be the best way to bring the lesson home to the understanding and hearts of the whole school, remembering that our blessed Master set us an example of illustrating great truths by the daily events about Him. Thus in humility and brotherly love let each one strengthen and succor the other.

Fourthly. Let the subjects of the lessons, as far as possible, be those that have clearly the Gospel message in them. At times it may be only a verse or a part of a verse, always referring freely to both the Old and New Testament for references more fully to illustrate God's long suffering and tender love towards mankind, also the promises therein recorded and examples set by holy and just men. In all lessons let the one great theme be Jesus, redemption through His blood and a living walk in Him, always seeking to avoid the dangerous practice of taking chapter after chapter, regardless of the order or connection of the subjects, which error often tends to a lack of interest in both teacher and taught. Alike to be shunned is a too critical study of the opinions of commentators on doubtful passages in the Scriptures, remembering that no commentary ought to be freely used in teachers' meeting, lest too great dependence be placed on it and the true source of wisdom be lost sight of.

Fifthly. Let there be an opportunity for each teacher to speak of the peculiar difficulties under which they may labor, requesting the prayerful interest of the other teachers that wisdom may be given how better to manage the class, to gain attention or the love of the unruly, or for strength and wisdom to be able to guide aright the inquiring, sin-convicted scholar, or the building up of the faith of the new-born babe in Christ.

Thus in all the many and varied needs of the teacher, let there be full freedom allowed to ask for sympathy and encouragement, remembering that we are to "hold up each other's hands" and to strengthen the weak.

Sixthly. Thus letting the love of Christ flow freely in our hearts, we shall be enabled to bear gently with each other's weaknesses, and thankfully to acknowledge His guidance and manifold blessings, and be enabled unitedly to lift up our hearts in earnest prayer for our superintendents, teachers and scholars,—those of our own and of all other schools throughout His earth.

And now, in conclusion, having thus seen the necessity there is to the right conducting of our meetings, that we shall be blessed with the presence of the Holy Spirit, it is evident after all that much, if not all, depends on our individual faithfulness in obeying its teachings, of being as individuals thoroughly imbued with power from on High. Let us then each inquire, "Am I fulfilling all the will of the Lord concerning me, or am I keeping back a price." Let us remember the hidden talent, and go forward seeking to employ all that in mercy has been given us of Heavenly wisdom, with a single eye to His glory, who alike is our Father and Guide, and whose servants we are.

Fifth-day morning, 11*th mo.* 18*th.*—After a season of very solemn retirement before the Lord, during which several voices were heard in exhortation and in prayer, the topic under consideration was resumed.

Matthew Howland referred again to the New Bedford school, to illustrate the great importance of the mingling of the elderly Friends with the children in First-day schools. He gave very interesting statistics showing that, as a result of this commingling of labor, the school had increased from twenty or thirty to two hundred, and had reacted with great benefit in the advanced spiritual life of the meeting for worship. And he thought many of the children, in the silent sittings which they had, not only learned the lesson of sitting still, but really of silent worship.

Joseph Potts, John M. Whitall, John S. Hilles and James Wood followed. Their remarks all tended to establish a conviction of the necessity for teachers' meetings, and to elucidate from experience the right mode of conducting them. In the heart of each teacher the lamp should be known to be burning—the love of Jesus should dwell there—the social element of the Bible class should be made practical—feeling toward each other as friends, a higher friendship will be known. Regular attendance was enforced. These meetings are important as a means by which all the teachers are to know that sound Christian doctrines are taught in the several classes.

So deep and so pervading was the interest in this theme, that the Chairman felt it a difficult matter to lead the Conference off to the one in order for the day, according to the programme.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, TWELFTH MONTH 4, 1869.

Vitality of Truth.—Within the limits of different religious organizations, there seems to be a spirit of determined and not always very reverent investigation, which is not content with challenging abuses and manifest wrongs, but has a qui vive for every doctrine, dogma and practice, and is disposed unceremoniously to try all things. Whether or not it will be equally willing to hold fast that which is good remains to be seen; and the lover and devotee of essential truth, looks on with trembling anxiety, yet as his faith strengthens, hope revives, and he trusts to realize the Poet's vision:

"Up springing from the ruined Old
I saw the New.

"'Twas but the ruin of the bad,—
The wasting of the wrong and ill;
Whate'er of good the old time had
Was living still.

* * * * * *

"The grain grew green on battle-plains,
O'er swarded war-mounds grazed the cow;
The slave stood forging from his chains
The spade and plow.

"Where frowned the fort, pavilions gay
And cottage windows, flower-entwined,
Looked out upon the peaceful bay
And hills behind.

"Thro' vine-wreathed cups with wine once red,
The lights on brimming crystal fell,
Drawn, sparkling, from the rivulet head
And mossy well.

"Through prison walls, like Heaven-sent hope,
Fresh breezes blew and sunbeams strayed,
And with the idle gallows-rope
The young child played.

"Where the doomed victim in his cell
Had counted o'er the weary hours,
Glad school-girls, answering to the bell,
Came crowned with flowers.

"Grown wiser for the lesson given,
I fear no longer, for I know
That, where the share is deepest driven,
The best fruits grow.

"The out-worn rite, the old abuse,
The pious fraud transparent grown,
The good held captive in the use
Of wrong alone,

"These wait their doom, from that great law
Which makes the past time serve to-day,
And fresher life the world shall draw
From their decay."

As we thus believe in the indestructibility of Truth and the ultimate ascendency of Right, may we not thank God, take courage, and, mindful daily of our individual duty, trust in Him that He will care for His own cause in the earth? When we see around us "the removing of those things that are shaken," what comfort is there in the prophet's assurance that all this is only "that those things which cannot be shaken may remain!"

We are not of those who court innovations and delight in changes—who would willingly unsettle what has been fully tested and proved to be subservient to man's highest good. We value the wise conservatism which, whilst it perceives the world's steady progress, (as incapable of arrest as are the astronomical movements,) clings with affection to principles and even to practices which successive pilgrims to the celestial city have found helpful and promotive of that unearthly joy and peace of which no man and no vicissitude of life can deprive the soul that is joined unto the Lord. And therefore it is that we contemplate with a degree of thankful rejoicing the evidences spread before us respecting the present condition of our beloved religious Society. That there has been effervescence, excitement, and in some instances insubordination, is an admitted fact. In this we rejoice not, but we do in the precious evidence that spirituality has spread and deepened, and that "Truth is over all." Those things which cannot be shaken because they are in Him who is unchangeable do remain. We have had much information and observation of the state of Friends in many districts, and have deliberately come to the conclusion which we now state: that at no time, within at least a century, has there been more soundness in Christian faith, more of the love of Christ, or so general and appreciative belief of the truths which gave vitality and were essential to that Reformation in which George Fox was made largely instrumental. The great and ruling idea of that dispensation which the Lord Jesus ushered in—the guidance of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter whom He sent to teach all things to His Church—is, unless we greatly mistake, one which pervades the Society of Friends wherever it exists. We know of no class of Friends who entertain any doubt upon this cardinal point. Held, not as mere theory, but as a reality—not as a thing natural to us or accessible through our own virtue, but as the gift of Him who paid our debt of sin, and wholly consequent upon His having become sin for us,—this characteristic doctrine has, it is believed, never been more fully accepted or better understood than today. "Where is boasting then? It is excluded." The Lord hath visited His people. To Him, in humble thanksgiving, belongs all the praise.

May He in great mercy continue the visitations of His Spirit, descending "as showers upon the mown grass," and strengthen His sons and daughters to live in and walk by it, to His praise. Then may we expect the agitations of the hour to subside in a settlement upon the foundation which cannot be moved.

"Take heart! the Waster builds again!
A charméd life old goodness hath;
The tares may perish—but the grain
Is not for death.

"God wo~ks in all things; all obey
His first propulsion from the night;
Ho, wake and watch! The world is grey
With morning light!"

Erratum.—We regret that in last number, owing to the delay in obtaining the proceedings of the Conference, and the consequent pressure upon the compositors at a late hour and unusual division of labor, the essay on the first page of that number, on "The necessity of clear, simple Gospel teaching," was confused, the connection broken, and, it is feared, the benefit marred. The sheets being scattered, were intermingled, and there was not time afforded for proper revision. The paragraphs on page 211, commencing, "The standard cannot be kept too high," and ending with "Eternity," should immediately follow the one on page 210 ending with the words, "for their spiritual welfare." The intervening paragraphs should then stand in the order in which they are printed.

DIED.

HADLEY.—On the 14th of Eighth month, 1869, in her 17th year, Sylvia E., daughter of Miles S. and Ruth M. Hadley. [Monthly Meeting not given.] For several years past it is believed that she was "joined to the Lord,"—with whom she enjoyed sweet communion. She was a cheerful, lovely Christian, obedient to her parents, renouncing the world's fashions. She was a useful First-day school teacher, and in the family circle was often heard in supplication. The summons out of time was sudden, and truly blessed is the servant that is found thus waiting.

NOTICE.

A Conference for Teachers and those interested in Friends' First-day Schools of Philadelphia and vicinity will be held at No. 918 Locust St., on Fourth-day evening, Twelfth mo. 8, 1869, at 7 P.M.

By order of Executive Committee.

INDIAN CORRESPONDENCE.

Kiowa and Comanche Agency, 11th mo. 11, 1869.

Esteemed friend John B. Garrett,—I think thou wilt be interested in knowing that our company of ten men, four women and two children arrived safely at the Agency on the 7th inst. We left Lawrence on the 19th ult., with three wagons and one ambulance. We had five pairs of mules and a pony. The first 180 miles were partially settled, which added much to our comfort in travelling; the balance of about 260 miles was without any settlements of whites. We found some of the Osage Indians at two places hunting buffalo. A few presents made them friendly, and we camped both times near to them.

When about 150 miles from the Agency, three of our mules got away from us at night. We could track them 10 or 15 miles back, but could not follow them further. After spending two days in hunting for them, we gave them up as lost. We then hitched the pony and a mule to the ambulance and started on, thankful that we had team enough left to take our vehicles twenty or twenty-five miles per day.

On our arrival we found that many of the Indians were gone to hunt buffalo, and some were anxiously waiting to see their agent before starting to hunt. I have had several cordial greetings by them, and a few huggings.

We have concluded to hold a religious meeting in one of the rooms in the Agency building on First-day mornings, at 10 o'clock, and a First-day school at 2 P. M. I think that we all feel the importance of having our ways ordered of the Lord, and a desire that we may live near to him day by day.

Thy friend, LAWRIE TATUM.

AN INTERESTING CASE.

Our readers have noticed, that for a long time the American Bible Society has been in the practice of making grants of Bibles and Testaments, chiefly the latter, to captains of vessels sailing to foreign ports. They were usually granted to captains of well-known character, to be used at their discretion, or else were intended for individuals who had applied to the captain in some distant port. The books were regarded as seed sown somewhat at a venture, trusting to Him who said, "My word shall not return unto me void." Meantime we received information, from time to time, that the seed was not lost. Encouraging reports came to us, inducing a continuance of this work. But recently a case has occurred, which we feel constrained to lay before our readers, to encourage and stimulate them and us to perseverance:

A certain captain, sailing into a foreign port, offered a Testament to a young man, intelligent and highly respectable, whom business brought aboard, inquiring if he had ever seen one, and would accept of that. He took it and read it, first from curiosity. But its contents affected his heart. His understanding was first enlightened, and then, by the blessing of the Holy Spirit, his conscience was awakened, and finally he was led to Christ, in whom he believed to the salvation of his soul.

He soon began to tell to others what he had thus newly found. He obtained more Bibles and some tracts from the good captain, and distributed them among his friends. He soon began to read them aloud to such as would hear, and commenced in his way to explain and enforce what he read. He invited persons to his own house to hear the Bible read and expounded. He opened a Sunday-school. He spoke against the worship of the Virgin, and images, and devotion to the crucifix, and other errors of popery. He was called a heretic, a heathen, and utterly denounced, even by those dearest to him. He lost a valuable office because of his change of religious views, and his teaching others the things he believed and felt. His mother and friends persecuted him, and he went through many trials and afflictions. Nevertheless he stood his ground fearlessly and manfully, contending for the truth. His steadfastness was not without its influence on others, and after a time he had the pleasure of seeing many give up their opposition, and even embrace the truths which at first they opposed. At length several hundred became earnest readers of the Bible, some of whom gave evidence of having been savingly enlightened. There are now probably not less than 400 persons in that place who read the Bible.

We have now a paper before us, in the handwriting of that young man, in which he relates some of the conversations he had with those who at first opposed him. His arguments and mode of reasoning are so apt, that we think our readers will be interested in perusing some of them.

When he renounced the worship of pictures and idols, his friends said:

"You are very wrong in your ideas. How dare you speak against the worship of images, being an institution of the holy pope?"

"Because I obey no more the laws of that man, but the divine laws of the Lord."

Then taking a Testament from his pocket, he read from the 27th chapter of Revelation:

"And I John saw these things, and heard them. And when I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which showed me these things. Then saith he unto me, See thou do it not; for I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book: worship God."

"And God said, 'Worship me in spirit.'"

They laughed and said: "That is a Protestant Bible." He replied:

"No, it is only the true Gospel; but you are as superstitious as the men of Athens;" and then he read the following verses:

"Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' hill, and said, Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are too superstitious. For as I passed by, and beheld your devotions, I found an altar with this inscription: TO THE UNKNOWN GOD. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you."

"Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device."—Acts xvii. 22 and 29.

"But they were too ignorant to understand such holy words; for though they call themselves Catholics, they are very far from being true Christians. Alas, as soon as it was known in this city that I had become a Protestant, or a heathen, which is the same thing according to their belief, they began to shun my company, backbiting and slandering me at the same time. All the Catholics in this place wished me only evil; but I did not mind their wrath; 'for what glory is it, if, when ye be buffetted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? but if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God.'"—1 Pet. ii. 20.

So he went on endeavoring to bring those around him to understand the truth. He then hired a house and held meetings every Sunday morning, to pray and read, and explain the Scriptures. He also formed a Sunday-school. A good number, attracted perhaps by the novelty, attended; but after a time most of them became weary and deserted him. At this he was greatly disappointed, but would not abandon the work; "for," he says, "I follow the words of the New Testament: 'Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness.'"—2 Pet. iii. 17.

"When a meeting was held," he says, "the first thing I said to my so-called friends was: 'Search the Scriptures.'—John v. 39. Then I said to them, 'The pope has no power at all, and Protestants are right in not acknowledging or obeying him. "And being in the house, he asked them, What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way? But they held their peace: for by the way they had disputed among themselves, who should be the greatest. And he sat down, and called the twelve, and saith unto them, If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all."—Mark ix. 33–35. "And whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all, For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many."—Mark x. 44, 45.

"And I said that it was no use to worship Mary, for that she was a woman like any other. To this they all objected; but I gave these reasons: 'And it came to pass, as he spake these things, a certain woman of the company lifted up her voice, and said unto him, Blessed is the womb that bare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked. But he said, Yea, rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it.'—Luke xi. 27, 28.

"Some young men stated that they could not read the Bible, because their fathers were Roman Catholics. I always answered them: 'If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple.'—Luke xiv. 26.

"Many that shunned my company before are now anxious to become my friends, some of them even telling me that they are Protestants. But I tell them that a Protestant is a man of a pure life, which they are not. I do not want such corrupted brothers. There are many now who desire to obtain some Testaments and tracts."

Such is the manner in which this young man testified for Christ. His arguments were drawn from the words of God, and he showed no little skill in applying them, and no little familiarity with the Bible, especially in one who had so recently begun to study it.—Bible Society Record.

UNITY OF ROOT.

Amongst the seeming paradoxes which meet us on life's journey, there is none more admirable or worthy of investigation than the common ground upon which Christians of various denominations often unexpectedly meet when they get deep enough towards the root. There are probably few of our readers who have not at times experienced a more lively sympathy and a fuller unity of soul with those beyond their own pale than with many within it. So strongly is this felt occasionally, that we are half tempted to separate from the apathy and want of sympathy manifested within our own borders, and to unite with the living earnestness of other sects, probably forgetting that with them also it is only the few with whom we could unite, and that wherever we go there will be found coldness and indifference on the part of the many. Neither is this unity of spirit between different professors confined merely to the zealous upholding of the same great doctrinal truths—it extends also to the aims and desires for which the sincere believer under every Christian denomination labors, although the means by which these ends are to be carried out often differ so entirely as to destroy all unity of action between them. Nevertheless, it is a precious thought that after all, it is in the divine doctrines and aim that men of various creeds thus find unity, but that it is in the human ways and means of accomplishment that they are so driven asunder.

The evidence of this fellowship of motive has been very plainly set forth in the contribution of a valued writer from the other side of the Atlantic, where, from its less demonstrative character, full-blown Ritualism can perhaps be looked at with less foreboding than is possible in this land. It may seem strange to many, that differing so utterly as do the Anglo-Catholics and the Friends in their practices, so much of unquestionably common ground of union can exist; and yet more, that a religious community holding, as we do, the teachings, doctrines, and practices of Roman Catholicism in abhorrence, should circulate freely in our families and derive so much spiritual help and comfort from the writings of Pascal, Fénélon, Madame Guion, Thomas à Kempis, and many other staunch adherents of the Romish faith. It is, however, cause of abiding thankfulness to us to believe in this one visible Church of Christ, whose landmarks are thus felt but not seen of man, and whose boundaries are strongly confounding to sectarian divisions, and so perplexingly at variance with our dogma ic and well-defined human distinctions.

Again, when we remember how very small our religious body is, may we not humbly thank God that his truth, as we believe and uphold it, is not confined to our own pale, but that whether under Roman Catholicism, or Ritualism, Presbyterian, Methodist, or Baptist, there are very many faithful disciples, all acknowledging the same vital doctrines, and having, as has been shown, the same desires as ourselves for more reality in religion—more communion with Christ—more of the abiding presence of the Holy Spirit — more unity with his saints—more true worship—more daily devotion—and more extension of His blessed Gospel to the poor.

Not only does this thought open up to us a glorious vision of unknown multitudes around us inwardly bent on the same mission, though they follow not us, nor we them, but to our apprehension it contains also the germ of that oneness of condition spoken of by our Saviour, one in heart and feeling though not one in action—"As thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us." Surely if the sincere of every sect can thus unite in one Lord and one faith, and one inward baptism—with a like aim and desire to advance the kingdom of the same Lord, and to give intensity and extension to the same faith—we have a common ground of union wherein we might peacefully meet and rejoice together, and from whence each may start for fresh labors in different fields and by very dissimilar means.

Constituted as man is, we do not hold it to be possible that all Churches will unite in the same mode of action. All that we look for is, that whilst seeking to impress others with the rectitude of our own means, and testing its entire accordance with the teachings of the New Testament, we should constantly recur to these cementing bonds of unity in faith and desire. We hold indeed that it is not enough for believers to be content with a unity of root alone, leaving each to take their own course for the bearing of fruit unto their Lord's praise; but how marvellous is it that whilst there is this oneness of root and desire, the true followers of Christ can be persuaded through the devices of Satan to contend so fiercely one with another over means; condemning and excommunicating, and, as in the days of our Saviour, forbidding those who are really casting out devils in His name, because they follow not us—forgetting His divine rebuke, "Verily I say unto you, forbid them not." Let all those who are ready to break out into angry contention with the plans of others, first pray and watch that no harsh word or judging spirit may mar this pre-existing harmony of faith and object, and alienate those who are already children by adoption of the same Father.

In the few additions we purpose making on "Ritualism" as a means of spreading the Gospel, we desire, therefore, to bear in mind clearly those forms on which we write; whilst in judging of such practices, we own no other standard of appeal than that set forth in the New Testament. The whole mischief and false teaching of Ritualism arises, in our apprehension, neither from unsoundness of root, nor from its separation from the living Vine. It is from that which, having no connection either with the Root or the original tree, has been grafted on by man's device, and made to appear as though it, and not the former, was the cause of the growth and the fruit. The two false branches thus grafted on without sanction of the Lord of the Vineyard, and without instruction in His revealed will, are those of priestly authority and outward ceremonial.

It would be in vain for us to search the pages of the New Testament to discover any warrant for attaching such Judaistic remnants to the simple gospel of Christ, promulgated, as it was, by unpriestly men, and practised without these accessories of the Jewish temple worship, or Mosaic Ritual. But in every fresh exposition and every new instruction by the Anglo-Catholic teacher, we find these to be the two main guiding principles—the sine quâ non of their Church organization, and fellowship with others. It is this unrighteous admixture of Judaism with Christianity—this forbidden garment of linen and wool, which certainly tends, as with its twin sister at Rome, to overlay and stifle the simple gospel of Christ for the masses. It is not with us a question of what are its effects upon the best men amongst us. It has been proved in practice, and beyond the possibility of doubt, that under each denomination of Christians, good men have arisen, men of holy life and conversation, adorning the doctrine they profess, and bright examples to those in other sects. But the point we would earnestly raise is, what is the effect upon the mass of mankind? Does it elevate the multitude nearer unto the standard set before us in the Gospel? or does it tend eventually to sink them into a superstitious faith in men and things, resting on an observance of form when the substance has vanished from them?

The freshness and warmth of this form of religion forbids our yet testing it thus by its fruits; but if we may judge of its results by those of Roman Catholicism (and it is a mere illusion to assert that, both creeds hanging upon the same two prolific grafts of Priesthood and Jewish ceremonial, they are not identical in kind, as they must assuredly become identical in action); we say, if we look at the fruit of this double grafting as displayed elsewhere, we have before us in the history of Catholic countries, in Italy, Austria, Spain or Ireland, a melancholy prospect of decline in national spiritual religion. We know well of the life and religious energy which now animates the whole frame-work of Ritualism; but this is not the result of human graftings, but flows unquestionably from the soundness of root to which we have alluded. When, therefore, as years roll on, the present spiritual impetus and life depart from the ceremonial framework, what will remain but superstition and spiritual deadness in the multitudes who have been drawn aside from the old Protestant faith?

Whilst we can rejoice in those common desires which animate the hearts of believers, we feel that it is none the less essential to protest vehemently against every encroachment of the priestly element in our midst; for upon it hangs the whole fabric of Romish error and spiritual despotism.

"Errors, to be dangerous (said Sydney Smith), must have a great deal of truth mingled with them. It is only from this allian ce that they can ever obtain an extensive circulation. From pure extravagance and genuine unmingled falsehood the world never has, and never can, sustain any mischief." So long, therefore, as these two tenets of Judaism are placed in the fore-front of Anglo-Catholic teaching, so long will it be needful to distinguish between the undoubted truths held by the Anglo-Catholic party which our correspondent has elsewhere so graphically set forth, and their fallacious assumptions of priestly power. "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits, whether they are of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world." We will conclude in the language of the same beloved disciple, in words applicable, as we believe to this system of exalting Gospel preachers into sacrificing priests, converting men and saints into mediators, and merging substance into symbols and shadows: "This is that spirit of antichrist whereof ye have heard that it should come, and even now already is it in the world."—Editor of Friends' Quarterly Examiner.

Quarreling.—Quarrelling is almost always an indulgence, and therefore a thing which is avoidable. Nor is there any lot in life so fortunate and happy that quarrelling need be used as an alterative. Quarrelling, in short, is altogether and wholly a blunder. It wastes time "which is the staff of life;" it destroys amicable sentiments that may have taken years to grow; it embitters one's own mind, vexes others, disturbs the system, and destroys digestion.—Anatomy of Quarrelling.

BY CHARLES WILLIAMS.

We now formed ourselves in procession again, with Matt at our head. and having gone down a slight grade, came to a number of immense square holes, which the guide explained as the saltpetre vats, used in early days, when vast quantities of this salt were obtained from the cave.

Having now fairly entered the cave, the guide calls a halt, and tells us that "the hall we are now in is called the Main Cave. It is 40 feet wide, 60 feet high, and 4½ miles long." The width and height vary greatly, sometimes far exceeding these dimensions; and truly, a magnificent promenade it is, cut by the hand of Nature through the everlasting hills. The rocky walls rise in solemn grandeur,and are beautifully decorated with scrolls and projecting cornices of every conceivable variety of form. The ceiling is generally a smooth flat rock, at times roughened with ridges which some strong convulsion long ago forced in the yet yielding mass. The rocks are covered in many places with a white film of gypsum, that plays a conspicuous part in the scenery of this portion of the cave. Distributed as it is, irregularly over the dark limestone surface, it necessarily produces a great variety of accidental forms and figures, that diversify the lofty ceiling; now swelling up in masses of fleecy clouds, that seem to float in the delusive glimmer of our feeble lamps, and now taking the form of some singular animal, or the grotesque likeness of a giant, gaunt and grim, leaning over his wife who is sitting at his feet, and tossing a child into her lap.

Following the main cave about half a mile, we climb a steep stairway of plank, to another avenue which opens into it about fifteen feet above the floor. An assistant guide stationed himself at the foot of the stairway, to count the party as they climb the ladder. If the number finally leaving the cave does not agree with his report, the guides must go in search of the missing member. When all were up, he followed, and reported fifty-one.

We had now been long enough in darkness for the eye to become fully accustomed to the situation, and to be most keenly alive to the stimulus of the light; and it is surprising how distinctly even the minutest features of the rocky arcade came out in the glare of our lamps, which threw their gentle radiance both before and behind us in the thick and murky night, till we seemed to be travelling in a shifting halo of glory, that floated at our will through the dense darkness of this subterranean world. Our pathway led over rocks, and over beds of sand and clay; now along level plains, and now over steep declivities, as the chance surface of the floor dictated; while the limestone rocks on either hand and over head, united in strange combinations of every conceivable form, as the features of natural scenery are never repeated, and her variety is utterly inexhaustible. We pursued our novel journey in a great variety of moods; some absorbed in their own reflections, and some lightly chattering forth the passing thought, while ever and anon these grand old archways rang with the echoes that played along their lengthened corridors, as the uproarious merriment of our thoughtless party burst forth in peals of ringing laughter, or their calmer and more subdued emotions found a more dignified and appropriate expression in the eloquent melody of song.

I was particularly struck with the picturesque appearance and the exceeding beauty of our party, as they threaded their way over some rocky pass, or climbed a winding hillside in their onward, onward march. At such times the long procession of lights would come distinctly into view, each sparkling like a brilliant meteor in the intense darkness of that Plutonian night, and revealing the picturesque costumes and romantic beauty of our motley party, where gaudy colors and strong contrasts flashed out in beautiful harmony; the long line waving in graceful undulations, and swaying to and fro as chance dictated, or as they rounded some obstruction in the path. The women were dressed in bloomer costume, of red, and blue, and green, profusely trimmed with strongly contrasting colors; with gaudy head-dresses and brilliant sashes. The men were clad in corresponding apparel, with striped pants and richly-colored blouse, while a sash here and there had fallen sadly out of place, on a pair of sturdy shoulders. Every individual, man and woman, carried a cane to assist in climbing over the rugged asperities of the way. Imagine such a motley procession as this filing up a hill-side, or better still, crossing a broad hollow, where a person at either end of the line would catch a view of the entire spectacle; and then remember the peculiarities of the situation, involved in the shades of a night you had never known approached for its intensity of blackness, and hence the eye most exquisitely sensitive to even a feeble glimmer; and you will readily admit the scene must be most exceedingly beautiful.

We are now in the Gothic Chapel, a spacious hall hung with stalactites—that is, rock icicles—which assume most beautiful forms, here hanging in slender filaments that give a clear musical note when vibrated by a smart tap of the nail; these forming roughened ornaments that hang from the ceiling in most complex clusters; now extending to the floor they form a solid pillar, as it were to support the roof, and now fusing into long continuous curtains which hang in folds and wrinkles, fringed with finely-wrought tufts of delicate lace work, or tangled tassels, or knots of most intricate design. In one place the limestone deposite of which these stalactites consist, have formed a cluster of pillars, between two of which is a most curious arm-chair, very convenient and comfortable; and in another they take the exact form of an elephant's head without the trunk.

When we remember that these stalactites are literally rock icicles, formed by the deposit of particle after particle as the limestone water drops from their extremities through a long succession of ages, it is wonderful how complicated and irregular they are. When icicles form on the eaves of a building, they are generally conical in form, shooting downward in long slender points, sometimes, however, twisted or bent, or even interlocked, as a drop of water may be blown to one side and freeze into a lump, thus forming a basis for further irregularities. In these ever silent halls, on the contrary, where no breeze plays, and we would suppose no disturbing agencies ever act, the corresponding formations are as intricate, as irregular, and as tangled as can be imagined. Here a mass of rock will hang from the ceiling suspended by a small attachment; there, by many cords united; now a succession of pendants are looped together in complicated folds, and now the surface of a pillar will be sculptured with the most intricate figures in bas-relief, with highly projecting shrubbery, or tracery that would rival the artist's most consummate skill.

The Consumptives' Home, at Boston, which was established on September 28th, 1864, is an institution supported upon unusual principles. There is no fund, endowment or known pecuniary provision whatever existing for the support of the Home. No human friend has ever made any promise, express or implied, to sustain the institution, which is supported entirely by voluntary gifts obtained through prayer. The only means of soliciting money or aid in food, clothing, or any of the necessaries of life, have been the prayers of the founder and manager. The journal of this benevolent physician contains interesting accounts of the numerous occasions when the Home was reduced to the last extremity through the want of some particular article, and when that identical article was sent to the Institution in answer to prayers for it. The Consumptives' Home was started with one house, but now occupies four buildings, the purchase money for which was raised in answer to prayer. The last report of the Institution shows $50,328 has been given by friends during the last five years, and $20,105 during the past year. The Home has since its opening accommodated 331 patients, and accommodated 165 patients during the year ending September, 1869. The founder and manager conducts the affairs of the "Home" on cash principles, deeming, on the authority of the text "owe no man anything," that buying on credit is unscriptural. An Orphan Asylum, supported entirely by prayer, has been in operation in England, for many years, and the experience of the manager coincides to a remarkable degree with the answers to prayer recorded in the journal of the manager of the Boston Home.—Public Ledger.

OUR PATTERN.

BY PHŒBE CARY.

A weaver sat one day at his loom,
Among the colors bright,
With the pattern for his copying
Hung fair and plain in sight.

But the weaver's thoughts were wandering
Away on a distant track,
As he threw the shuttle in his hand
Wearily forward and back.

And he turned his dim eyes to the ground,
And tears fell on the woof,
For his thoughts, alas! were not on his home,
Nor the wife beneath its roof.

When her voice recalled him suddenly
To himself, as she sadly said:
"Ah! woe is me! for your work is spoiled,
And what shall we do for bread?"

And then the weaver looked, and saw
That his work must be undone;
For the threads were wrong, and the colors dimmed,
Where the bitter tears had run.

"Alack, alack!" said the weaver,
"And this had all been right
If I had not looked at my work, but kept
The pattern in my sight."

Ah! sad it was for the weaver,
And sad for his luckless wife,
And sad will it be for us, if we say,
At the close of a weary life:

"The colors that we had to weave
Were bright in our early years,
But we wove the tissues wrong, and stained
The woof with bitter tears.

"We wove a web of doubt and fear—
Not faith, and hope, and love—
Because we looked at our work, and not
At our Pattern up above!"

THE WEAK THINGS CHOSEN.

"One of God's ways of getting honor to His name, and of proving His power, wisdom and love, as well as His independence of us miserable beings, is to select His most blessed instruments from amongst the poorest and loneliest of this world. The gold which after much refining and preparing is to adorn the sanctuary, or to decorate the palace of an earthly monarch, comes forth from the hidden ports of the earth, and appears at first sight despicable and mean, until its true brilliancy is brought to light by the strong heat of the furnace. The lark which seems as though it pre-eminently sang forth God's praises, rises up from the ground, instead of having its seat with the eagle among the high and rocky mountain cliffs; and throughout nature many striking examples of this principle of the kingdom of God appear, a principle which was further carried out by Him in the instances of Moses, Gideon, David and the disciples of the Lord."—Trudel.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—European advices are to the 29th ult.

England.—A dispatch to the Duke of Argyle from the Governor of Bombay a few days since, announced that the Governor had received a letter from Dr. Livingstone, dated at Ujiji, in the interior of Africa, Fifth month 13th, 1869, at which time Dr. L. was in good health, and had been everywhere well treated.

Many failures have occurred in the grain trade at Liverpool, some of the firms having extensive American connections.

Ireland.—O'Donovan Rossa, one of the imprisoned Fenian leaders, has been elected to Parliament from Tipperary. It is supposed that a Fenian candidate will also be brought forward for Mallow. Fenian demonstrations are reported in various parts of Ireland, accompanied, in some instances, by riotous proceedings.

France.—The session of the Chambers was opened on the 29th, by the Emperor, with a speech, in which he said that it is not easy to establish regular and peaceful liberty in France. For months past society has seemed menaced by subversive passions, and freedom compromised by excesses of the press and public assembliages, but these have only served to prove the solidity of the edifice founded by popular suffrage. The will of the people must now be known. France wants liberty with order. Order, he said, he would answer for, and he asked the Chambers to help him to secure liberty. A course may be chosen between those who would change all, and those who would grant nothing. He then announced the municipal reforms to be made; among which are the election of municipalities by universal suffrage, the choice of mayors from those municipalities, the establishment of communal councils, and the grant of new prerogatives to the general councils. There is to be a more rapid development of primary education, a diminution of the costs of justice, and a reduction of the wartax on successions; the savings bank system is to be extended, more humane regulations made for the labor of children, and small salaries in public offices increased. Useful measures connected with agriculture are promised, and inquiry into the excise and customs duties. The foreign relations of France are declared satisfactory, and the finances prosperous.

Spain.—Gen. Dulce, recently Captain General of Cuba, died in Madrid on the 24th ult.

It is now asserted that 165 Deputies are pledged to support the Duke of Genoa as candidate for the throne.

The government has announced its intention to restore the constitutional guarantees which were suspended by decree some time since.

The republican members who recently absented themselves from the Cortes, returned in a body on the 27th. One of them moved a vote of censure against the government for the arbitrary use of power, but the motion was disagreed to by a vote of 146 nays to 35 yeas.

The proposed new constitution for Porto Rico was read in the Cortes on the 24th.

About 30,000 volunteers are said to have been sent to Cuba, to reinforce the troops acting against the insurgents.

ITALY.—The Œcumenical Council is to assemble on the 8th inst. It was announced on the 24th ult. that about 150 bishops had already arrived, many of them from America.

RUSSIA.—The old law limiting the residence of Jews has been enforced recently in some parts of the empire, and 2000 of these people have been removed from the Besserabian frontier to the interior of Russia within a few days. It is expected the Emperor will disapprove these proceedings.

DENMARK.—The official journal of Copenhagen published on the 27th an announcement that the ratification of the sale of the island of St. Thomas, (West Indies,) to the United States, has been postponed for six months.

EGYPT.—The Sultan has protested against the act of the Viceroy in proclaiming the neutrality of the Suez Canal, as a trespass on his sovereignty. Reports vary as to the degree of urgency of the form in which this protest was presented. One French paper asserts that it was an ultimation admitting no discussion, and that if the Viceroy should refuse to comply with its demands, he will be deposed and his brother appointed instead. It was hoped, however, that the matter could be settled by the advice of the European Powers.

De Lesseps, the chief engineer of the Suez Canal, has publicly denied various unfavorable reports which have been circulated respecting it, calling attention to the fact that in ten days fifty vessels sailed safely through the canal to Suez and back again. A dispatch of the 26th ult. from Alexandria, said that two steamers, of the French line plying on the Mediterranean, of 2,400 tons each, had safely passed through the canal. The inauguration fleet, on its return, left Suez one day and reached the Mediterranean the next; the exact number of hours is not stated in the dispatch.

DOMESTIC.—Gen. Howard has recently issued his annual report of the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau, for the past year. In accordance with the act of Congress, the Bureau was withdrawn from the States within which it had acted, and its operations, except the educational and bounty divisions, were discontinued 1st mo. 1st, 1869. A year ago, there were on duty 141 commissioned officers, 412 civilian agents and 348 clerks; now, there are 15 commissioned officers, 71 civilian agents and 72 clerks. A year ago, clothing and rations were issued to the destitute, costing $93,705 per month; now, such supplies are furnished only to the sick in hospitals. Instead of 21 hospitals and 48 dispensaries, with 5,399 patients and 85 surgeons, there are now two hospitals with 541 patients and five surgeons, and no dispensaries. During the year ending 9th mo. 1, 1868, the average number assisted was 16,804; during the last year, 1,983, many of whom were children, receiving half-rations. Clothing also has been purchased and distributed, raising the expenditures from the special relief fund to $252,547, besides a quantity of condemned army clothing transferred to the Bureau and given to the needy. The great mass of the freedmen are now self-supporting. In spite of all the disorders that have prevailed, and the misfortunes that have fallen on many parts of the South, a good degree of prosperity and success has already been attained. The charge that the negroes will not work, is answered by the fact that their voluntary labor has produced nearly all the food that has supported the whole Southern people, besides rice, sugar and tobacco for export, and 2,000,000 bales of cotton per year, which in 1866 and 1867 paid a tax of more than $40,000,000. The total expenses of the Bureau, from its first organization to 8th mo. 31, 1869, have been $13,579,816.72; and deducting $51,000 transferred to the Agricultural Department, and $500,000 set apart by resolution of Congress in 1867 as a special relief fund for all classes of destitute people in the South, the real cost has been $13,029,816.82. Official reports give 2,118 schools, 2,455 teachers, and 114,522 pupils within the jurisdiction of the Bureaus.

A report of the proceedings of the State Labor Convention recently held at Columbia, S. C., has been received by the Freedmen's Bureau, in which the statements of delegates from various counties show a condition of great want among some of the freedmen. One delegate, from Laurens District, declared that the people there were barely existing, and would die if something was not done for them. He had tried to make a living for his family by working for a third of the crop. He worked as late as he could see in the evenings, and began again at sunrise, yet at Christmas he had nothing. He had tried $50 a year, and 50 cts. a day, always with the same result. He declared that when the laborers were cheated of their wages, they could not obtain justice from the magistrates. The Convention addressed a memorial to the Legislature, asking for protection and the passage of laws giving the laborer a preferred lien upon the crops; for the appointment of contract commissioners in each county, to examine and attest all contracts between planters and laborers, and act as advising counsel of the laborer on questions arising under contracts; that laborers' suits shall have preference on the Court calendars, and be heard at the first term after they are brought; for a fair representation on juries; that lands sold by sheriffs be divided into tracts of 30 acres, to give opportunities for small capitalists; that planters' due-bills to laborers be made transferable, and a lien upon the crops; and that nine hours be a legal day's work.

The present arrangement for exchange of mails between France and the United States will expire with this year, after which letters to and from France, by vessels running directly, will be subject to the following rates of U. S. postage, to be prepaid by stamps at the office of mailing on matter sent, and collected at delivering office on matter received, viz: Letters, 10 cts. per half ounce or under; newspapers, 2 cts. each, and books, samples and packets of merchandize, 4 cts. for each 4 ounces or fraction thereof. Letters for France may be sent in the ordinary open mail to England without prepayment, but printed matter cannot. As all direct postal relations between the Departments of the two countries will cease at the time mentioned, correspondence cannot be forwarded, after that, to any foreign country by French mail, and the existing rates of postage by that mail to other countries will not remain in operation.

REPORT OF CONFERENCE OF TEACHERS AND DELEGATES OF FRIENDS' FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS.

The President introduced the third topic of the programme: HOW BEST TO INAUGURATE AND SUSTAIN MISSION SCHOOLS.

BENJAMIN FRANKLAND.—He had with him a Philadelphia newspaper in which appears a paragraph which he would take, he might say, as the text of his remarks, before reading which he wished to say that he regarded it as one of the signs of the times,—one of the happy circumstances of the present condition of Christianity—that the public press more and more recognises the claims of Religion and of Christianity. He alluded to the former difficulty to find in any newspaper an editorial endorsing Christian action—to find column after column devoted to records of gatherings of the character of the one here assembled. It seemed to him a fact to rejoice in, that the earnestness of our Christianity has become so recognised that those who publish these papers (simply, no doubt, to give the public what the public desire to have) recognise that there is a Christian heart and a Christian mind in our country that desires to have laid before it those matters which relate to Christian work and action. This editorial referred to a part of your city, about which he knew nothing personally—and says that Bedford Street is a reality which can only be removed by being dug up and carted away. Another part of the editorial says that Bedford street need not exist; and refers to the labors of a Christian Missionary who is solving the problem. This he thought led just to the point we want to get at; not only is Bedford Street a reality, but this world lying in sin and iniquity is a reality. He believed that the Almighty is pointing His church as never before to this great mountain that must be dug up and carted away, and that must be removed before the chariot wheels of His majesty and power can drive victoriously through this earth of ours. This is a reality—not a picture—an idle dream—a circumstance that we can sit idly in our homes and contemplate; these thousands of earth's sons and daughters going down to a living grave and we not putting forth our hands to help them. How, he asked, is this mountain to be dug up and carted away? As he looked back at the economy of Divine Grace and the plan laid down by the Almighty, he believed there is a means provided for this purpose—that it is the heavenly appointed work of the Church of the Redeemer to proceed with this work and to accomplish this mission. We present this morning the inauguration of these mission schools. He took a retrospect of the primitive days of Christianity, and found, as the solution of the question, How is this work to be accomplished? that when his Redeemer was upon the earth, when He saw this reality, this fearful weight of sin resting upon a dying world—when He saw with His all-seeing eye, and with His divine all-penetrating Spirit, that there was a Peter, a John, a Matthew, or any one else that was to be commissioned for the work,—He not only said to them, as He saw them at their fishermen's nets and in their several avocations, Come and follow me, but He said, Go—go into the world and do this work—preach the gospel to a dying world. He thought in the inauguration of this mission work there had been too much of men going out, to use a very plain Western expression, "on their own hook"—going without authority, without commission—except that the Almighty has so burthened their souls with the terrible reality of sin, that they could not stand still—could not see these perishing souls without going out to try if it might be possible by the help of the Almighty to save them. And yet while great good has been accomplished by these individual efforts, he regarded it as small indeed, in comparison with what would have been done if the Church had recognised its mission, and had commissioned these earnest souls to go out with this gospel and establish these mission schools and this mission work. As the reason for this, he saw this further fact, that in this world that God had created, in its physical as in its social and religious aspects, He works by means. When He wants to send the hurricane over this world of ours to purify it from its miasma, and from those circumstances which rest with weight upon the physical system, He gathers the winds into those chambers up yonder, and He holds them there until they gather force to accomplish their mission. When He would restore the coast-lines that have been washed away by the action of the water, He gathers the forces in the centre of the earth, and we hear the earthquake and the shakings of the earth which are to restore those lines; and yet these forces are not again felt until they have concentrated the requisite amount of energy. When the Almighty permits the spread of civilization over this world of ours; when it is His will that all these vast territories shall be covered over with the evidences of wealth and civilization,—He enables His creatures to gather together as the reservoirs and centres of power, of capital, and of enterprise necessary to carry out this result. But when He shows us this world of sin, unconverted to God, He establishes a Church as a reservoir, as a centre of powerful action; and He places within the hands of that Church all the power that is necessary to comfort the world that is lying in sin and iniquity. Therefore, he recognised the Church as the appointed means, the reservoir of spiritual life, that has been created and established by the Most High, and whose streams should penetrate into all the remote corners, the dark places, the haunts of sin and iniquity. And the Church should exercise its power, and say to those who with this love of souls in their hearts are moved to work in this direction: You are our servants—in the Name of the Master we lay our hands upon you and bid you God-speed. He thought that laborers in mission schools would be doubly nerved in all their action, thus going forth feeling the power of the Church with and behind them. He cogently set forth one of the gospel plans very happily adopted by the Society of Friends, in sending out its messengers two and two. He instanced Paul and Barnabas, and the Saviour's example. There is strength in this union; and every school needs, he thought, a two-fold agency,—the "chief speaker," endowed from on high with the faculty of utterance, qualified by the Holy Spirit to preach the gospel,—and, on the other hand, the executive faculty to build up and concentrate. These two faculties are not always blended in the same individual. There is in all mission operations a complete work to accomplish. It is not merely to pick up a soul here and there and transplant it into the Kingdom,—although that is the first object—but we want to plant a society, a family in the Lord Jesus Christ, whose influence shall penetrate through these Bedford Streets, these Five Points, these various reservoirs of concentrated iniquity. He proceeded to show that to establish a mission school the workers needed the appliances. Being now brought to the second prominent matter on which he wished to speak,—that every condition of life involved in itself the great law of development and progress. As soon as we begin to stand still, we die,—just as the water begins to stagnate where there is no current—no motion. So in the moral and spiritual world: no motion, no life, no energy—and there begins a process of decay, and the living organization becomes a dead fact in our hands. The consequence has been that in all ages the Church ever had to turn from the great work of spreading the everlasting gospel, and holding up the banner of the Cross, to attend to the work that should never have had to be attended to—to revive and to infuse a new life and energy into the body itself. If we are faithful to the living principles of the Church of Christ, we cannot become a dead body. If those living and eternal principles (that are eternal life everywhere) circulate within us, there is no need of all this care and attention in regard to that which Christ has established, and which He will keep alive if we are faithful to His Spirit, and if we always, in humility, draw our inspiration from the Cross of Calvary. But we need this life and power, and to attain it is not a matter that requires a vast amount of exertion. "I do bless our Father in heaven, my dear Friends," said the speaker, "that God is not very far from any one of us." We do not, said he, have to look into yonder heavens—we do not have to penetrate into the depths to find that blessed Master. He is very near every one of us, in the secret recesses of your heart and of my heart. He queried, (not referring to our own Society particularly,) what is the attitude of the Church to-day—whether we are more anxious for the one sheep that is lost than for the ninety and nine safe within the fold. He sometimes thought that our prayers, our earnest concern, the thoughts of our hearts and the energies of our natures, were more expended over the ninety and nine over whom the tempest and the blast are not sweeping, upon whom the wild beast is not preying, than in following the lost lambs of the fold who, as the Saviour tells us in the parable, are the objects of His most gracious care.

Upon another point he wished to give some expression. He believed we were too much afraid to acknowledge our Christian principles—too much afraid of the effect of this blessed religion upon our own hearts. He could not understand it. No people on the face of the earth are ashamed of their religion except Christians. He pointed to heathen idolators—not a man, woman or child of them will hide their heads when they speak of the doctrines of their religion. He told how they sacrifice their dearest objects, and of the immeasurable force in the human heart that can even so overcome the love of a mother for her offspring, as to nerve her to plunge her little one into the dark waters of the Ganges because she supposes that her God is pleased with the sacrifice. He spoke of the pagan throwing himself under the chariot wheels of his supposed God;—then turning to our religion, which he felt was with many too much of a mere profession, he knew of no other communion where the man hangs his head and avoids the subject of testifying in regard to the pure and eternal principles of that religion which has revealed to him the manifestation of the Father's presence.

The speaker said much which, for the sake of condensaton, we must pass over. He referred to agitations across the waters—to the attempt to bind afresh upon the hearts of men the old fetters of Ecclesiastical domination—to the coming down of the Lord to the church of Notre Dame de Paris, to the conclave of Bishops in Germany, and here and there a Convent or Monastery, and pointing them, as He did with Luther, to the Bible and its central thought, justification by faith in Christ alone. This contest is coming to our shores. We see the forces gathering. In the West we have to meet face to face the old story—Rome and Infidelity—Rome and political worldly power uniting together and making a strange alliance between that being who calls himself the Vicegerent of God on earth, and those who deny the very existence of God; these forces uniting for a renewed attack upon intelligent, free, vital Christianity. The question comes—the Church cannot disregard it—what will be the type of the Church of the future? Looking back, he turned again to George Fox and his times. The Lord came to him when these forces were the prominent ones in the then professing Church of Christ. The message God gave to that man was that of the indwelling Spirit of the Almighty in the heart of man. The effect of it was to over-ride mere human systems and forms—to turn men from these mere fragments that covered Christianity to the living Spirit of Christianity itself. And he asked, what does the world want to-day, if it does not want the same message. He declared that we want to do away with all this ritualism and all mere human devices, and to come again to this old issue—this first question of spiritual life. He did believe that there are principles within the Society of Friends—the first principles upon which it was established, especially that of the direct living action of the Spirit of God upon the heart of man, that furnish the solution of this question, and the only means by which these Bedford Streets and all this world of iniquity can be converted to Christ. He referred to some previous expressions of "throwing the responsibility upon God,"—quoting the words of a colored man about a full and literal compliance with Divine commands, leaving it to Him to take care of the result. He did not wish mission work performed in a sectarian spirit, and yet he clearly showed that its right and faithful performance would react in great benefit to the Church and in the organization of what could not be better called than a Society of Friends—friends of God and friends of humanity—friends whose hearts are entwined together by the eternal love of the blessed Master. He believed that all misgivings, whether to use this or that agency, will vanish as the morning before the rising sun of that Divine life which has always guided the Church of the Redeemer, and will guide it until the perfect day of God's love shines with unclouded brightness over a redeemed humanity. He assured his dear young Friends that there is but one source of inspiration from which may enter into their souls the living waters that will fit them for this work. That fountain is open to all—the blood of Jesus. O how it flows for humanity! How that cross stands erect—not in a valley, but upon a hill—so that the world may see it. And yet it seems as though for a little season the wheels of Divine love were almost impeded.

After weighty allusion to the Redeemer's ever-living heart of love and willing soul of sympathy, the speaker, in conclusion, addressed himself to our elder brethren. When Fathers in Israel had taken him by the hand, giving words of kindness and good cheer in Christian work, nothing could have been more sweet and pleasant. He thought that if in anything the young seemed called upon to do that which their elders would not exactly desire, it is a great deal easier to remove those differences, to bind the yearning hearts of the young to the hearts of their seniors, by cementing both together with the love of Christ, by that blessed baptism of the Holy Spirit that always comes down as an answer to the prayers of those who are sent as leaders of Israel and as guides of those who go out into the battle-field. O, let us remember those almost final words of the Old Testament, that the Almighty would bind the hearts of the fathers and the children together, lest He come and smite the earth with a curse. There is no greater power—there is no perfectness of the Church, no deliverance from calamity and judgment in this world, unless the hearts of the fathers and children beat as one, and unless our relationships, sanctified by grace, are made perfect in the love of our blessed Saviour.

Eli Jones endorsed the allusion to George Fox and enlarged upon it. When our blessed Lord gave that very remarkable commission to His disciples, He commanded them to preach the Word to the whole world and to make disciples of all people. It is very evident that if we are to make disciples of all, we must go out to all people, we must go down to the very lowest strata of society—and to succeed we must go in the Spirit of our Master, in true Christian simplicity, with holy earnestness, asking our Father in heaven to inspire us with zeal, energy and qualification to speak to those conditions of people whom we are called to meet. Referring to those who are eminently qualified to address assemblies of the learned, but whose words fall lifelessly upon a juvenile or uneducated audience, he was thankful that there is a wonderful adaptation to every needed work among the Lord's servants: that the Good Spirit, who calls out, qualifies and prepares the servant for the special service. It is very encouraging in looking over the Society of Friends on both sides of the Atlantic to perceive that the Spirit which moved George Fox, which inspired the young Parnell, the young Burrough, Whitehead, Mary Fisher and many others to go forth and labor for the advancement of their Master's cause, is warming the hearts of the young now-a-days—that we are having now, after the lapse of more than two hundred years, our Parnells, Burroughs, and others,—our young men and women who are ready to lay their all upon the altar. As had been intimated, they are entitled to the sympathy of the Church and should be followed by the prayers of the Fathers.

He spoke understandingly, and was prepared to enter into sympathy with these young persons. He had been with them in their work; he had stood with them where there was need of firm muscles and a steady hand,—in Smithfield, London,—where he witnessed what these workers had done in that poorest and most degraded part of this metropolis of the world, where an immense mass of humanity is brought together. He described the congregated misery, so great, that the minds attempting to measure it and the vastness of the work to be done, will instinctively quail at even the contemplation of the task, not daring to go there with a measuring line unless the Lord go with them. Yet there they have brought together the children, the inebriate, the ignorant; they have instructed the children—they have inspired the inebriates with a living desire to amend their course; and, said he, they have amended. They have talked with the ignorant, have brought together hundreds of widows, and endeavored to dry their tears and speak words of comfort to them; all this, or nearly all, done by members of our own religious Society. In Stoke-Newington meeting (not a very large one) there are fourteen individuals who leave their homes at 8 o'clock or 7 o'clock in the morning, and go four or five miles into the heart of London, some as teachers in the Bible class, some as superintendents, some to address the assembly that may be gathered. Others go in the afternoon and others in the evening on the same mission. It had been his privilege to go with those young persons—to stand beside and give them his sympathy in the work; and he rejoiced in their testimony that the Lord is prospering the work. He told that although the work was not under the official care of the Yearly Meeting, yet that Friends of the Yearly Meetings of London and Ireland are now teaching between twelve and thirteen thousand individuals outside the pale of their own Society. It is a work worthy the recognition of any church. To illustrate results he took his audience to Ratcliffe meeting in London, very near where, in the days of Geo. Fox and of the persecutors, when the parents were taken to prison and the house was broken down, the children assembled on the ruins to worship the God of their fathers. What has been done there? A few friends with hearts warmed to work for the poor, went down to Ratcliffe, and began by gathering some few children, and teaching in the house a mission school. He had been at the schools and at their worshipping assemblies, and was certain that the work had been blessed. Sure he was that hundreds and thousands may be gathered to this Society in London, if this Society is disposed to shepherd the sheep who come asking to its fold. At another Friends' First-day school he met 130 adults—young men and women—whom it was his privilege to address. The meeting-house being too small, it was proposed to build a new one. Each Friend at the meeting subscribed, and before long the needed sum of £700 was raised. This was the spirit of the meeting there. Then he spoke of the meeting in Dorset, where the host of workers is accumulating, the field enlarging, and many heretofore opposed stand back and some heretofore backward come forward with their talents and their utmost strength to aid it. One accredited minister in the north of England has built with his own means a large hall, connecting with it several school-rooms, where he meets his friends for missionary labor. He has associated with him another Friend (also a minister.) They call in the poor, the lame, the halt, the inebriate. At another time a Friend took him to a large hall that he had built and the rooms he had prepared in furtherance of the mission work. This Friend had been a member of the Church of England, but had joined our Society from convincement of its principles, and is there to work as a missionary. Other instances occurred to him while speaking—and now, in reference to the work on this side the water, it might not become one who had been so long absent to say much. He rejoiced in the belief that our great and good Father in heaven is about to revive the work in the midst of the years. He told of an incident at his own Quarterly Meeting the day before he left home. A person with whom he had grown up—over threescore years of age—who had been educated in our Society, but becoming wayward had turned his back upon it and upon every thing that was religious and good—there renewed his former faith in Christ, and declared that for forty years he had never attended a place of worship but to revile and scoff, and to get something to say against religion. On that occasion he said: "I dearly love this Society; I desire its prosperity; I believe I have had my sins forgiven." Practically he could say, I am with you. Three of that class travelled twelve miles to be present at that Quarterly Meeting. And Friends, (continued the speaker,) if we find that the breeze of Heaven is swelling out our sails, if we are stretching our canvass to the winds, let us see that there is plenty of ballast in the ship, that she may ride steadily; and let the man at the helm, the man at the mast-head, the man behind the mast and the man before the mast, steadily stand, each to his post, and listen to hear the word. The times may be stormy; there may be head-winds, there may be difficult places to pass, but the passage is safe and sure if we keep the great Pilot at the helm, if we mind each his own proper business and do the work that God bids us to do.

In conclusion, he had enjoyed opportunities of mingling pretty largely in his own religious Society; he had met face to face thousands of members of the most ancient churches in Christendom—had watched with care the signs of the times—had visited in foreign lands the missionaries representing those different religious societies, and heard from their own lips of the success attending their work. He returned to us with the conviction upon his soul (and he was not without evidence in the case) that to this people is committed a very important trust, and that we can perform that mission assigned us and do the work committed to us in the most successful way, as sinful children following the Master. We are to go forth with a smooth stone in the sling as our weapon, (no matter for Saul's armor, to think of that will do us no good,) but we are to go forth boldly, keeping our eyes fixed on our Master. He believed that He is ever ready to qualify His servants for the kind of work to which He desires to call them. He can give them the right heart and the sound judgment—give them places of labor with the heathen and in different parts of the harvest. If we preach Christ crucified, thousands will hear—and we have no business as the professed followers of Christ, in attempting to preach anything else.

[So much space has already been given to the proceedings of this morning's session, that we reluctantly pass over the succeeding addresses, fraught with instruction, by Wm. H. Ladd, Geo. R. Buffum, &c.]

Fifth day, 11th mo. 18th.—The subject next introduced was Home Mission Work.

Murray Shipley, referring to the judgment and ability with which the Executive Committee had arranged the programme, and to the bearing successively of the previous themes, said that Home Mission work had been placed in the central position. When the gospel first reached the human heart, the impulse was to take care of the salvation of our own souls. After we had experienced the peace of God, the thought that others should share it with us naturally prompted to turn to the welfare of those about us—to our work at home. Home Mission Work: consecration, confession work! How can any undertake it unless they know that consecration which God's holy Spirit works in the heart of him who is waking from sin and death unto holiness and life. How can we come to Christ except by a consecration of the heart to Him? How labor for Him unless we openly confess Him? With true consecration and hearty confession there is no point of labor that we may not hope to see crowned with success; nor is there any class that need be excused—there is work for all. The labor for the children has been placed before us. He then made an appeal for the wife of the working-man, considering her's as the saddest lot of any. The working-man whose heart is untouched by grace and his mind not developed to enjoy the pleasures of reading or mental attainments, seeks for his pleasures in what is necessarily debasing, which draws him from home, lowers his standard of propriety, and robs his wife and children of that precious home-love which makes life so bright and beautiful. This he illustrated by a fitting and touching anecdote, and turning to the women present, plead with them for the working-woman, in which class they might find plenty of mission work. He asserted that there were many of them who had never heard the gospel, or been visited by professors of any religious belief. There are many of them sick at heart, sick of life, weary, ready to throw themselves away—yet ready to receive the message of glad tidings that shall lift up the broken-hearted. He then plead with his brethren on behalf of the working-man. He held that there is no society in the world so capable of reaching the working-man as the Society of Friends. Thoroughly informed—steadfastly determined to carry out what they undertake — approaching these classes who respect you, and who consider this Society as the representatives of a true Christian life, your opportunities for labor are abundant. The speaker then encouraged all Friends to take hold of this work and gather in the parents. It is a great deal easier to stay at home, to mingle with our own sect, to indulge in reading books, making ourselves proficient in some "ology"—but here is the great work of souls. Working-men—where are they? Not in the places of worship—at home, 'midst their cares and sorrows, hardening their hearts daily. He then spoke of Mission schools and the primary duty of cleanliness, showing the condition of the new scholars and their homes, and the powerful effect of the Christian religion in brightening the home and producing cleanliness—of the increased self-respect in those men or children who have clean clothes, and their greater readiness to gather with others in public worship. He devoted a little time to temperance teaching, which should be connected with mission work, and, joined with these, to savings banks.

After these remarks, which were designed as introductory, he plunged into the general subject, the necessity of earnestness—of faithfulness—never sacrificing principles to theories—the inestimable importance of prayer and going forward with sure reliance upon the quickening grace of the Divine Spirit, and in that Spirit giving out what the heart feels called upon to give at the moment. Upon these and other points of vital import the speaker enlarged. The official report of the Conference will doubtless make amends for our unavoidable condensation. A few of his remarks were not gathered by the reporter, owing to noises in the street.

He thought the classes who are the object of this labor need the opportunity of watching over one another and of being builded up into a Church, and that without this we shall fail in what we ought to accomplish. There is a certain kind of teaching which they comprehend—but of didactic teaching they will not receive a word. Combine the adults and children in your meetings, and expound the truth to them faithfully, in full belief that the Holy Spirit will be there and will qualify them. He said the people should be organized into a religious body. And he had faith in our own Society, and that its great cardinal principle, resting upon the guidance of the Holy Spirit, is intended to adapt that Society to any condition of men. And under God's quickening and guiding, according to our needs, the work shall go forward in the right path, and we will undertake, as our own individual duty, to gather these people into the Society of Friends.

After pursuing the idea of Church organization, he counseled, if this be found impracticable, to organize the people into bodies, to break these into smaller bodies, and over these to set some man in your midst who is spiritually minded and is most interested in them. This idea he had taken from William White, in England, who divides his First-day school class of perhaps 150 adults (all of them over 14 years of age) into groups of six, eight or ten, selecting one to be the head of each group. If any absents himself, this one so selected visits him and inquires the cause. If the absence is caused by sickness, the needs are supplied—if by drinking, &c., he is counseled. This is a simple organization that any of us may bring about. The fields are white and ready for the harvest, the cry goes up of souls perishing, &c., &c.

Grace Dickenson rejoiced to be able to unite with those who had spoken in regarding the world as the field of labor, and that the great salvation is in mercy offered to every one in this wide field. Can there be any here now who feel that Jesus has really forgiven their sins and loved them with a love passing knowledge, who do not love to carry the same glad tidings to others. It was to her cause of gratitude that our heavenly Father permits and qualifies to be workers all who look to Him for the qualification. She related that in the middle of Ireland a Friend has gathered in one village between four and five thousand persons whom he employs in linen manufacture. He cares for their souls and bodies—he has given them comfortable homes, and established meetings and Bible classes among them. Many gladly come to Friends' meeting—there are more who gather and talk in another meeting with the view to bring up and encourage one another in good works. In this village no intoxicating drink is allowed to be sold, and, as a consequence, there is no need for any police force. There is not one of them who cannot tell those around what Jesus has done for their souls.

James C. Thomas quoted the words of our Lord, "The poor ye have always with you," and spoke of our interesting duty to the poor—the labor not new amongst us—the results of it not new. He lucidly explained the freedom afforded by our religious Society to every member to labor in the direction to which our Master points, recognising that every true member has a gift bestowed by the Head of the Church to be exercised to His glory. No distinction in reference to the exercise of gifts between male and female. The Lord's hand is believed to be as likely to be laid upon the Christian heart of a mother or sister to speak those words of tenderness and love which shall reach the hearts of the degraded. We cannot be true to our principles or to our Master if not taking part in this great work which daily lies around and before us, as we walk the crowded streets and lanes or the more secluded paths of the country. Everywhere there is labor called for—everywhere, everywhere souls to be saved! He believed the practical way for each to determine daily his duty in that great mission, is to rise daily from our beds with the feeling that there is something for us to do this day for our Master, and to ask him for guidance in that special service. He enumerated various possible services. To the mechanic working in our house—the porter in our store—the person we casually meet in the street, &c. It might be we should be sent like Elizabeth Fry to the felon in his cell—like Peter Ball to the thieves of a metropolis, &c., &c. Home mission work!—It is in our own houses—among our children—in our own circles—among our own friends whom we love—among all those with whom we are thrown in contact. It is especially to those whom we know to be in sickness and suffering. None can excuse ourselves because we have not the poor always with us. Though we cannot break our box of costly ointment and pour it on the Master's feet, nor wash them with the tears that flow from our eyes, yet, as we remember His mercy and tenderness, we can go and do His work among those to whom he sends us.

John M. Whitall, after preliminary remarks, illustrated his idea respecting the work of mission schools by a page from his own experience. Seven years ago his attention being attracted to a chapel in Shippen Street where there was no First-day school, he and his wife went down and organized one, beginning with twenty-five scholars. From that time, every First-day, except in very warm weather, they have attended that mission school, until now their list comprises nearly three hundred scholars, mostly parents. At first, many came in rags, out of cellars and garrets, in the most abject poverty. The effect of the teaching has been that, in the first place, they have got into better lodgings, clothed themselves better, and had themselves and their children cleaned up. Why it was absolutely dangerous to sit among them. That is now happily altered. You may go among them without the least fear, and a more respectable and better attended school cannot be found. We have carried it on upon Friends' principles. The time is not occupied with singing. Every lesson in the primer and the spelling book is from the Bible. Old people who did not know a letter when they came there, can now read the Scripture very well. Nothing but the Scriptures is taught in that school, and the effect upon the scholars is marvelous. The Holy Spirit made use of very poor means to convince these poor people, but it is a positive fact that many of them during these seven years have passed from this world and been taken to heaven—(he had not the shadow of a doubt of it;) and they attributed their first conversion to the effects of that school. If, continued the speaker, we have our sole dependence upon our Heavenly Father, He is able to give us wisdom at the moment. He would encourage every one, whether living in cities or less populous neighborhoods, to go forward in this work. The poor you always have with you, and at any time you will you may do them good. It had been a great relief to him to have some good object on a First-day afternoon.

Gilbert C. Congdon spoke interestingly and at length. He related his attendance, nine years ago, at the first Friends' meeting held in Bedford Street. In reference to the various divisions of home and foreign missions, the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ, as committed to the Society of Friends, contains ample provision, under the outpourings of the Holy Spirit, to carry out the good pleasure of that great Missionary of all missionaries, that holy Worker, true God and perfect man, who came to seek and save that which was lost, and who did not seek only the select ones,—the chosen few,—but went with publicans and sinners, &c. &c.

David B. Updegraff endorsed and enlarged upon the sentiments of several previous speakers, swelling the current of testimony in favor of this department of Christian service.

Stafford Allen, of London, being unexpectedly called upon by the President, responded with a hearty desire to strengthen the concern of the Conference. Noticing the large interest manifested towards the children of our own Society, he explained that in Great Britain their First-day school mission extends to the children of the poor, those of our own members being pretty much provided for by boarding-school appliances. They have in England and Ireland about 14,000 Friends, and they have under their care about 12,000 children [not Friends, as we understood him.] His friend Eli Jones had said almost every thing that he wished to say.

John Henry Douglass.—This, indeed, is the great mission of the Church—to gather souls into the Kingdom of Christ on earth, that they may be prepared for death and for the Kingdom to come. He had never yet been able to be the humble instrument in the Lord's hand for the salvation of a soul except when he realized in working with that soul, or with those souls to whom he was sent, the feeling that he was a poor sinner saved by grace. The tongue cannot express the sweet joy and peace of a soul in its earliest love, nor that of a soul which, after years of religious experience, attains to that state in which it may be qualified to bring souls to Christ. He repeated that he had never been able to gather a soul to Christ, except when he was enabled to realize as though it were but yesterday, when God for Christ's sake had [broken] his heart—when he remembered the wormwood and the gall and myrrh—when he remembered the convictions of the Holy Spirit—when he felt condemnation pressing upon him the wrath of God—that Justice had pronounced sentence against him. It had been under circumstances like these, as though it were but a moment past that he had just stepped out of the horrible pit—out of the jaws of death,—and had grasped as for the first time his Redeemer's strong arm. With a heart like that he had not experienced difficulty in reaching and bringing souls to Christ. He offered, then, this exhortation—do not forsake your first love. Let it abide with us day by day; and let us be like the old Friend who went into the prison where was confined a man under sentence of death — hard, dark, and supposed by his chaplain to be impenitent. This old man, with his countenance made placid by the love of Christ in his soul, sits down on the cold stone beside the doomed man, and reaching out his hand, from a heart filled with warm emotion, takes him by the hand, and, from the stand-point he [the speaker] had just suggested, makes this remark: "What a great mercy it was that Jesus Christ should come into the world and suffer and die for such poor sinners as I and thou are." The prisoner was reached—broken down—a changed man from that moment. He found peace. He said to his chaplain afterwards: "It was that I that killed me." J. H. D. thought that Peter had the same thing in view in what he said of the Gentiles having privileges under the Gospel equal to those of the Jews. He stood up boldly under a sense of what God had done for him, and what he was without Christ, and said: "We believe that by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved even as they." He did not say, as we should suppose a favored people (perhaps like ourselves) would say,—"We believe that by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ those poor miserable Gentiles will be saved as we are saved." No—but he reverses it that they may see where they stand. He presented a practical thought in answer to the questions rising as to what we shall do with these people who have been gathered: and the hearts had been revived and warmed of those who had been instrumental in their conversion. He spoke especially of the country places. Why, open rooms, and with faith in the Church of Christ and the appliances thereof, take them in. No church on earth can be that living representative of its blessed Head that it should be, and grow and prosper in vital religion, that is not gathering to Christ. We see how it was after the conversion of Paul: throughout all Judea home missions multiplied, and many were edified and led to walk in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost.

Rebecca Collins, with much emotion expressed thanksgiving and praise to God that she was permitted to see this Conference in this house, where, in her youth, she was received a member of the Religious Society of Friends, and where, in years long gone by, she, with a beloved son who now sleeps in Jesus, had a First-day school. She related various incidents within the scope of Christian mission work. In conclusion, she wished to impress upon the Conference that the secret of success is prayer. Let us be a prayerful people. God grant that every heart may be touched with the quickening power of the Holy Spirit. May we go home having experienced the new birth unto holiness, with a living faith in Christ, and resolve with His grace to walk in that way, that leads to the pearl gates of the heavenly city through which nothing that is impure or unholy can enter. (To be concluded.)

"John Bunyan was once asked a question about heaven which he could not answer because the matter was not revealed in the Scriptures: he advised the inquirer to live a holy life and go and see."

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, TWELFTH MONTH 11, 1869.

A Serious Dress.—A Governmental official of a distant nation became interested in Friends and their principles and in the attendance of their meetings. But he grieved to notice, in many of the younger members, the absence of what he called a serious dress. This is a copious subject, but the present design is merely to call attention to the significant and suggestive words of a stranger who expected to find in the children of persons "professing godliness" the character of apparel indicated as becoming by the great Apostle. To those who truly are spiritually-minded, the tyranny of Fashion is intolerable, and gravity, moderation and simplicity of attire are congenial and desirable. The views upon this subject of Mary Fletcher and other pious Methodists have been laid before the readers of the Review. The estimable writer of The History of the Moravian Church in Philadelphia, deplores the departure of his associates from their primitive simplicity, and points to the Friends as an example. If it be asked whether we have a Procrustean standard for a dress pattern, our answer is in the negative. We are far from advocating sumptuary laws, preferring that in Christian moderation we should be a law unto ourselves,—whilst we regret every tendency to drift into worldliness, on the part of those whom He who was separate from sinners has chosen out of the world. It is a great privilege to be free from the trammels of fashion, and it is easier to put them on than to lay them aside. The encroachments of worldliness come by almost imperceptible gradations. Our Saviour prayed for His disciples, not that they should be taken out of the world, but preserved from its evil—a fitting prayer for us to offer, on account of ourselves and those for whom we yearn. How desirable is it that those who, by the Church, are earnestly longed for in the Lord, should seek to put on Christ, that the sinless One who became sin for us may be our Righteousness, and clothe His creatures, who can have no merit but in Him, with His own spotless robe.

The Late Conference.—It is believed that the prolonged report is acceptable to our readers. The themes discussed, and the mode of treating them, afford sufficient variety, embody much thought, and are profitably suggestive. In the free comparison of views by the different speakers, with a sincere aim to arrive at just conclusions and the best modes of action, it cannot be needful to say that we do not unqualifiedly endorse every shade of thought. The speakers themselves undoubtedly had their views in some degree modified, as men and women of large experience followed each other in rapid succession. Let the extempore utterances be read, not for verbal and captious criticism, but with a large-hearted appreciation of their Christian bearing and proper intent.

As it is expected that a fuller and official report will be issued, it seemed appropriate to condense and omit much that was replete with edification. It was perhaps better to omit a number of addresses than to render too meagre others which it was attempted to present. In what is yet to appear, still severer curtailment may be found necessary. Meanwhile a number of contributions, both original and selected, are unavoidably crowded out.

Money received for Education in Tennessee, (as stated page 202,) $5.00, 5.00, 5.00, 3.00, 1.00.

Prof. Thos. Chase's Address on First-day Schools for Friends has been printed in tract form, and is for sale by Henry C. Russell, No. 109 N. Tenth St., Philada. Price 3 cts. each, or $2.00 per 100 copies. If sent by mail, the postage to be added to above prices.

MARRIED,

At Friends' Meeting-house, Smithfield, Ohio, on the 27th of Tenth month, 1869, John Cowgill, of Champaign Co., Ohio, to Eleanor H. Crew, of the former place.

DIED.

ALLEN.—In Osawatomie, Kansas, on the 11th of Tenth month, 1869, David Allen, son of David and Eunice Allen, aged 19 years and 8 months.

GRIFFEN.—At the residence of her mother Phebe Griffen, in Clinton, Dutchess Co., N. Y., on the 17th of Fourth month, 1869, Mary D. Griffen, aged 57 years. She was a useful and valued member of Creek Particular and Stanford Monthly Meeting, and an example through life of Christian simplicity, being from conviction a firm adherent to the doctrines and testimonies of our religious Society. She was called to endure much bodily suffering, which she was enabled to bear with patience and resignation, expressing near the close a confident hope of acceptance.

WEESNER.—On the 10th of Seventh mo., 1869, near Chester, Ind., Michael Weesner, in the 81st year of his age; a valuable member and Elder of Chester Monthly Meeting. During a confinement of nearly 7 years, he evinced patient resignation, often saying that he felt no condemnation, but was made to rejoice in his affliction. His dying hour was marked with sweet serenity.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PRESIDENT GRANT ON THE INDIAN QUESTION.—We take the earliest opportunity to present the appended extract from the first annual message of President Grant, read before both houses of Congress on the 6th inst. A valued Friend writes:

"His continued confidence in the 'new policy' of treating the uncivilized Indians of the country as 'wards of the nation,' entitled to its faithful guardianship, is indeed comforting; and the official declaration to all the world that the result of giving the management of a few reservations to members of our religious Society, and 'throwing the burden of the selection of agents upon the Society itself,' 'has [thus far] proven most satisfactory,' should be a fresh incentive to us all, and especially to such as have been selected to conduct this responsible work, to labor earnestly and faithfully, as the Lord conferreth strength, for the immediate Christianization and early civilization of those entrusted to our care.

"His recommendations that the Indians, as soon as fitted for it, should occupy their lands in severalty, and set up territorial governments for their own protection, are practical, judicious, and timely."

The President says:

From the foundation of the government to the present time, the management of the original inhabitants of this continent, the Indians, has been a subject of embarrassment and expense, and has been attended with continuous robberies, murders and wars. From my own experience upon the frontiers in Indian countries, I do not hold either legislation or the conduct of the whites who come most in contact with the Indian blameless for these hostilities. The past, however, cannot be undone, and the question must be met as we now find it.

I have attempted a new policy towards these wards of the nation (they cannot be regarded in any other light than wards), with fair results, so far as tried, and which I hope will be attended ultimately with great success. The Society of Friends is well known as having succeeded in living in peace with the Indians in the early settlement of Pennsylvania, while their white neighbors of other sects in other sections were constantly embroiled. They were also known for their opposition to all strife, violence and war, and are generally noted for their strict integrity and fair dealings. These considerations induced me to give the management of a few reservations of Indians to them, and to throw the burden of the selection of agents upon the Society itself. The result has proven most satisfactory.

It will be found more fully set forth in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. For Superintendents and Indian Agents not in the reservations, officers of the army were selected. The reasons for this are numerous. Where Indian agents are sent, there or near there troops must be sent also. The agent and the commander of the troops are independent of each other, and are subject to orders from different departments of the Government. The army officer holds a position for life; the agent, at the will of the President. The former is personally interested in living in harmony with the Indian, and in establishing a permanent peace, to the end that some portion of his life may be spent within the limits of civilized society; the latter has no such personal interest. Another reason is an economic one, and still another, the hold which the government has upon a life-officer to secure a faithful discharge of his duties in carrying out a given policy. The building of railroads, and the access thereby given to all the agricultural and mineral regions of the country, is rapidly bringing civilized settlements into contact with all the tribes of Indians. No matter what ought to be the relations between such settlements and the aborigines, the fact is that they do not harmonize well, and one or the other has to give way in the end. A system which looks to the extinction of a race is too horrible for a nation to adopt without entailing upon itself the wrath of all Christendom, and engendering in the citizen a disregard for human life and the rights of others, dangerous to society. I see no substitute for such a system except in placing all the Indians on large reservations as rapidly as can be done, and giving them absolute protection there. As soon as they are fitted for it, they should be induced to take their lands in severalty and to set up territorial government for their own protection. For full details on this subject, I call attention to the reports of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

CONSCIENCE: OUR OWN AND OTHER MEN'S.

Corinthians, viii., ix. and x.

BY THOMAS HODGKIN.

No true Christian man will ever be disposed to undervalue the blessing of a good conscience healthily discharging its functions in his moral and spiritual being.

He knows something on the one hand of the miserable estate of those in whom conscience, "seared as it were with a hot iron," has ceased to perform her office, who are free with an evil freedom, since conscience, the witness for God in their souls, has been bribed or terrified into silence and will cause them no pain, however great may be their deviations from the path of holiness and truth. And, on the other hand, it may be that he knows something of another danger—always far less prevalent than the former, and in our day less prevalent than ever, but still a real danger—the tendency to a morbid conscientiousness. There is a state of mind, or perhaps I should rather say of body, in which a truly devout and God-fearing man may find himself haunted by all manner of doubts and scruples about things in themselves absolutely indifferent. He can hardly walk down one side of a street without vexing himself with the question, "Was it his duty to have taken the other?"; imaginations of duties un-performed or of warnings neglected begin to crowd upon his spirit. Conscience, which ought to be simply a witness for God, sets up for a ruler on its own account, and proves a most insufferable tyrant; and unless medical skill can relieve his body and Christian common-sense dispel his scruples, Reason herself too often gives way under the intolerable yoke. I have seen this phase of mental disease described as "Neuralgia of the Conscience," and I think the term well illustrates the species of spiritual torture induced by it. I repeat that I do not think that the bias of our generation lies towards this error; still it does exist, and we should ask the help of God's grace to keep us free from this perversion of the testimony of His witness, as well as from the other.

Since these things are so, the earnest Christian will, as I before said, most gratefully thank God for the possession of a conscience delicate and yet strong, quick of understanding in the fear of the Lord, yet not captious and impracticable; condemning at once wrong things, and warning him before he begins to grieve the Holy Spirit of God, yet not continually suggesting actions or refusals to act, none of which he can explain, I do not say to the world, but to brethren in Christ whom he believes to be journeying towards the same heavenly country.

It may be said then, supposing a man to have such a strong and healthy conscience, he has nothing to do, so far as his spiritual life is concerned, but to obey its injunctions. The apparent paradox disclosed by several chapters of the 1st Corinthians is, that this is not all which the Christian believer has to do. In some, in many cases, he has also to consider "what approves itself as right to other men's consciences."

To show how this may come to pass, we cannot do better than consider the actual circumstances under which St. Paul's advice was given to the Corinthian Church.

Some men had endeavored to enforce upon the Christian converts from heathenism the necessity of an entire compliance with every jot and tittle of the law of Moses. They were to be Jews, Proselytes of the Gate, only believing in a Messiah who had come—not looking for one who was still to come—and submitting themselves to his government. Against this invasion of the liberty which is in Christ, Paul and Barnabas had zealously protested, and the result of their protest had been the well-known decree of the Council of Jerusalem (Acts xv.) declaring that—in addition of course to the ordinarily accepted moral law of the Gentiles—the new converts should only be bound to abstain from meats offered to idols and from blood and from things strangled and from fornication, and might leave all the rest of the law of Moses on one side.

But then in the practical working out of these precepts, continual difficulties arose on the question, "what are meats offered to idols," within the purview of this commandment? In a city like Athens or Corinth for example, "wholly given over to idolatry," almost every banquet would be more or less sacrificial in its character. Nay, the chances would be great that of the meat exposed for sale in the public market the largest part had been cut from consecrated victims which had received the death-blow from the priest of Juno, or Pallas, or Apollo, or some other of the imaginary inhabitants of Olympus, and had been taken from the very shrine of the false divinity by the butcher whose business it was to cut it up into portions, so much for the sacrificing feasters, so much for sale in the shambles.

Now was it the duty of a Christian man (some thought it was) to go questioning and prying about the market-place, "Has this been offered in sacrifice to Jove?" "Are you quite certain that that is not part of the victim slain in honor of Ceres?" and so on, asking perhaps a hundred questions before he could buy one joint of meat—exposing himself to the derision of all the rest of the marketers, who would probably suppose him to be moon-stricken, and, what was of more importance, bringing the names of these false gods into a prominence, and by his very scruples attributing to them a reality which in that decaying age of heathenism they could not otherwise have possessed?

Others of the Corinthian Christians said, "No: we do not reverence Mars or Venus. We know that they have no existence, and no imperial edict shall make us bow the knee in worship to their statues. But as they are impotent to bless so are they also to curse. The meat which has been killed before their shrines is none the better and none the worse for that unmeaning ceremony. We shall not eat it because it has been offered in sacrifice to idols, and we shall not leave it uneaten for that reason. It is a matter wholly indifferent to us. Nay, so far do we carry our utter disregard of the idol one way or another, that we should not object, if bidden to a feast by a still unconverted friend, to accept of his hospitality, although it might be given within the walls of Jupiter's temple and under the shadow of his statue."

These wide differences of opinion elicit from St. Paul the statement of one broad and simple rule, "Christian liberty bounded by Christian edification."

He says to the weak brethren, "Eat freely whatever is exposed for sale in the public markets, not asking any questions for conscience' sake." He knew that the actual contest with clear and manifest present evil affords quite enough scope for the energies of the soul, without hunting back over the records of the past to see whether a thing now indifferent was once stained with idolatry or crime. He clearly hereby discourages what may be called the microscopical style of scruple; that conscientiousness which is always laboring with perverted ingenuity to discover some trace of evil, deposited perhaps ages ago, in a custom or a word which Christian common-sense would pronounce to present apprehension harmless.

But, says the Apostle, should a brother Christian who strongly puts this scruple against idol-offered meats be sitting by thee at a feast, and should he happen to know that a particular joint has this history belonging to it—should he point it out to thee and say, "This has been offered to an idol," then eat it not, for conscience' sake. "But my conscience," thou wilt say, "is not wounded by eating." "I am not speaking of thy conscience, but of his." "But why should my liberty be judged by another man's conscience? If I by grace be a partaker, why should I be evil spoken of for that over which I give thanks?" To this the Apostle's answer is short and simple, "Whether ye eat, or whether ye drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God," and the inference is obvious, (particularly when we compare this passage with viii. 9–12,) if thou preferrest the mere gratification of thy appetite to the wound which thou art evidently causing to thy brother's weaker conscience, thou art not "eating to the glory of God."

(To be concluded.)

THE KING AND THE SCOTCH COOK.

The Earl of Rochester being in company with King Charles II., his queen, chaplain, and some ministers of state, after they had been discoursing on business, the king suddenly exclaimed, "Let our thoughts be unbended from the cares of state, and give us a generous glass of wine, that cheereth, as the Scripture saith, both God and man." The queen, hearing this, modestly said she thought there could be no such text in the Bible; and that the idea was little less than blasphemy. The King replied, he was not prepared to turn to the chapter and verse; but he was sure he had met it in his Scripture reading. The chaplain was applied to, and he was of the same opinion as the queen.

Rochester suspecting the king to be right, and being no friend to the clergy, slipped out of the room, to inquire among the servants for a Bible. The servants named David, the Scotch cook, who, they said, always carried a Bible about him. David being called, recollected the text, and where to find it. Rochester told David to be in waiting, and returned to the king.

The text was still the topic of conversation. Rochester proposed to call in David, who, he said, was well acquainted with the Scriptures. David was called, and, being asked the question, produced his Bible and read the text; it was from the parable of the trees in the wood going forth to appoint a king over them —Judges, 9th chapter and 13th verse: "And the vine said unto them, shall I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?" The king smiled, the queen asked pardon, and the chaplain blushed. Rochester asked this doctor of divinity if he could interpret the text now it was produced? The chaplain was mute; the earl therefore applied to David for the exposition. The cook immediately replied, "How much wine cheereth a man, (looking Rochester full in the face,) your lordship knoweth; (no doubt David had seen him fou' (tipsy) or daft, as we say in Scotland, often;) and, that it cheereth God, I beg leave to say, that under the Old Testament dispensation there were meat offerings and drink offerings—the latter consisted of wine, which was typical of the blood of the Mediator, which by a metaphor, was said to cheer God, as he was well pleased in the way of salvation that he had appointed; whereby his justice was satisfied, his law fulfilled, his mercy reigned, his grace triumphed, all his perfections harmonised, the sinner saved, and God in Christ glorified."

The king looked astonished, the queen shed tears, the chaplain looked confounded, and Rochester applauded. After some very severe reflections upon the doctor, Rochester gravely moved that his majesty would be pleased to send the chaplain into the kitchen to turn cook, and that he would make his cook his chaplain.—Scrap Book.

VOICES OF GRACE.

It is marvellous and beautiful to observe how various are the voices of free grace. "I am thirsty," says one. "Come to the waters," she cries.

"I am hungry," says another. "Then eat ye that which is good," she says, "and let your soul delight itself in fatness."

"But I am poor, and have nothing to buy with." "Come buy wine and milk without money and without price."

"We are weary," sigh the laborers in the sun-beaten fields, "Come unto Me," breathes her answer, like a breeze from the waters, "and I will give you rest."

"Cast thy burdens on the Lord, and He will sustain thee," she whispers to the pilgrim ready to faint on the highway.

"Behold the fountain," she cries to the guilty; "the fountain opened for sin and uncleanliness."—Exchange.

THE MAMMOTH CAVE.

BY CHARLES WILLIAMS.

We will now go back to the Main Cave, and follow it about half a mile further to the Giant's Coffin. A huge rock, about forty feet long, has been detached from the side of the cave by some of the mighty convulsions that have played through these sporting-grounds of the marvellous and the wonderful. When the party stand on the opposite side of the cave, and hold their lamps down at arm's length, the shadows of the rocky platform on which it lies, form a straight line a few feet below the upper edge, and it comes out in the most perfect figure of a coffin. And that ponderous limestone sarcophagus, the chance production of Nature's mighty energies, lies there in the silence and gloom of this Plutonian vault as age after age rolls by, in striking harmony with the solemn thoughts that occupy the contemplative mind while rambling along these corridors of eternity.

At the foot of the coffin a narrow gorge in the rock leads behind it, through which we must squeeze our way, now stumbling over stones that cover the narrow path, and now stooping to pass under some mighty rock that, like the portals of a modern bar-room, hangs all too low for an upright man to walk beneath its relentless arch. Following a winding tortuous passage, we descend a stairway called the "Steeps of Time," and along inexplicable complications, till finally a solemn warning is given by the guide, that we are approaching a scene of no little danger. Will any one doubt that, under these circumstances, this warning from one of Afric's tawny sons is most carefully heeded? A pit is announced, just before us on the right; a pit, sixty feet in depth. A pit in these regions of darkness, of solitude, and silence, is no matter of merriment. You may rest assured that every one watches his footsteps, and the lamps are carefully handled. The music of the party is suddenly hushed, their buoyant hilarity is all forgotten, and, while no one will confess to any emotion, a thrill of apprehension darts through every bosom.

Then the guide, leading the long procession, suddenly stops where some timbers are thrown across a black and terrible vacuity. Placing the party carefully around the edge of the fearful abyss, he lights a paper which has been soaked in oil;—and this is the famous Bengal light of which the sensational visitor has so much to say;—and holding it above his head, calls out to the party, "Look aloft." There, in the hitherto rough and irregular ceiling, rises a dome cut out of the solid rock, beautifully fluted and frescoed in graceful forms in monochromatic, to the height of more than twenty feet. Then throwing down the paper, it falls in the mass of solid blackness, and reveals the wild character of this strange pitfall. It is called the side-saddle pit, from its resemblance in form to that article. We pass by with a decided partiality for the opposite side of the cave, cautiously stepping over crevices that break almost across the gallery, and shrinking involuntarily from the very thoughts of the possible effects of a single mis-step.

A few rods further and we turn to the right, down a very steep flight of steps that descend into a narrow gorge called the Labyrinth, about forty feet deep, and just wide enough for one to pass; very crooked, and with most elaborate ornaments on the lofty walls and thread-like ceiling. Climbing another stairway, and descending yet another, the foot-path suddenly ends at a hole in the rock, a foot or two above the ground. This is the window of Gorin's Dome. Here the guide leaves you, and disappears through a narrow crevice, telling you to look through the window when he calls. Whilst awaiting his call, you impatiently look in; you strain your eyes to pierce the palpable obscure; you peer about from side to side, vainly endeavoring to catch the faintest idea of what strange scene may await you, with a vague impression, however, that the darkness is about to yield up one of its richest treasures.

Then you hear the voice of the guide, far to the right,—far above you. Turning to follow his voice with the eye, you see the glimmer of his lamp in the crevices of the everlasting rock more than a hundred feet away. You are struck dumb with amazement. In an instant the bright light of a strong illumination flashes out in the murky darkness. Then a cry of astonishment bursts from your lips. That flash of light has revealed a glory you never dreamed of till now. You are looking into a vast apartment two hundred feet in height, rock-ribbed and groined with curious and fantastic ornaments. You look down eighty feet to the rocky floor below; you look up one hundred and twenty feet to that strange and wondrous arch above. You instinctively draw back,—you are hanging over the fearful abyss, with perpendicular walls below,—but the surpassing glory of the scene compels you to look again.

For a few brief moments, that light sheds down its dazzling unearthly lustre, revealing the rocky arch above, in all its savage grandeur, in all its exquisite beauty. The opposite side of the dome consists of a mighty curtain of adamantine rock, swinging down from the very crown of that lofty arch, like a piece of exquisite tapestry wrought with the most delicate figures in filigree work, and curving hitherwards till its folds seem to come almost within reach: then sweeping round again to the left in darkness deeper and more appalling by the strong contrast with the transient glory of the scene. That curtain is strangely illusive in the glow of that flickering flame. Is it stirred by some power of enchantment? Does it wave to and fro, to the impulse of some imperceptible breeze? Although you know it is of solid rock, you can scarcely dispel the illusion that it is swinging and swaying to the rhythm of your own emotions.

But look again. The guide, having burned his taper half away, flings it down the deep abyss. Sailing, waving, flickering, it drops slowly and solemnly into that bed of darkness, carrying with it glory and radiance, and lighting up the floor of that mighty apartment with a fleeting flash of unwonted splendor. The shadows of that wonderful curtain of limestone now fall upward on the ceiling above, obscuring its beautiful fretwork, and shading its elegant tracery. Now the light burns dimmer; you gaze with feverish anxiety to catch the last faint flash of the departing glory. The vastness of the hall is gone: that curtain which you never saw approached before, is fading from your view; the flame quivers for an instant, throwing out a faint halo, like the glow of a planetary nebula in the blackness of a midnight sky, and then—it is gone. Darkness—deep, dense darkness:—a darkness like the shadow of Oblivion—has closed upon the beautiful scene. Sadly you withdraw from the window, for only two can look at once, and you must of necessity give way to the balance of the party. The same scene is enacted again: but the two heads fill the window, and you only catch slight glimpses by peeping over their shoulders.

FRIENDS.

John xv. 14, 15.

In blood of martyrs, and in strong men's tears
Wrung out in dungeons, have they writ their creed;
In deep soul-plungings, where weak human fears
Find every help, save God's, a broken reed;
Christ, as of old, Himself this flock would lead,
And therefore doth the angry world despise;
But, ye who love your risen Lord indeed,
Be not these meek ones crownless in your eyes!
No false vagary of Philosophy,
No superstitious flattery of the brain,
Misleads their steps; one only Light they see,
Guide without fault, their ransom'd heaven to gain.
"Ye are my friends, if ye obey my voice."
Would that all souls might in that name rejoice.

RE-UNION.

"When shall I arise, and the night be gone?"—Job.

Thou wilt not sever us, O Lord our God,
In thy blest mansions. On earth's dreary sod
Our hearts are torn with partings. One by one
The loved and cherish'd leave us. Every stone
The cold, damp cemetery holds, is faced
With lines that find their parallels deep traced
Within our souls. Thus works Thy chisel, Lord,
In strokes severe. Yet be Thy name adored
For all Thy dealings! In Thy purpose deep
A blessing lies, unscann'd by us who weep,
Amid these shadows. Night will soon be past—
The cloudy night of time that ends at last
In heavens's bright morning. Yet a little while,
And we shall greet that blissful morning's smile
With hallelujahs. Then Thy love's deep thought Shall be unfolded. All Thy blood has bought
Shall come with Thee; and each we loved and knew,
And mourn'd for here, shall rise upon our view
In brighter, lovelier form—akin to Thine—
Thy work, Lord Jesus!—perfect, pure, divine!—
Thus re-united, through eternal days
Our joy shall be Thyself—our theme Thy praise!

THE BIG TREES OF CALIFORNIA.

"Dixon" writing to the Boston Advertiser of the big trees of California, says:

We had a mile of good road, then a hard climb of two and a half miles with an ascent of 1,500 feet, then a mile and more over the rolling summits. It was nearly three hours of delight—winding about picturesquely on the mountain side, riding among firs and pines and spruces and cedars ranging up to diameters of ten and twelve feet, coming every moment into sight of new beauty of wildness and wild verdure, the blood in our veins quickened with long expectation, life joyously intensified with the sweet and invigorating air one gets allalong this coast.

The trees were at first a disappointment,—I believe we all said that. They did not seem so large as our imaginations had fashioned. When we clambered upon the Fallen Monarch and found that fourteen of us, men and women, could stand side by side across his old body twenty feet from the roots, then we began to say to each other that it was a good deal of a tree after all. Fifty-four paces from the root that trunk is burned off, and there it is seven feet in diameter,—162 feet from the ground as the tree stood. Then we put a cord about one of the smaller trees, and measured the cord,—finding a circumference of 66 feet breast-high from the ground. We got over our disappointment soon enough, and owned that we saw with dull eyes at the beginning.

This grove, like the other, lies along the slopes on either side of a little stream. It contains 567 trees, great and small, and is at an elevation of 5,500 feet above the sea. The highest tree is 272 feet—50 below the tallest of the Calaveras grove. Fire has made sad ravage here—many of the trees are much charred near the ground, and some of them are almost half burned away. The largest measurement one can now make is 92½ feet, but there are several that were over 100 feet in circumference before the flames got at them. The guides point out seventeen that you must have more than eighty feet cord to encircle, and there are said to be about one hundred more not less than 50 feet in girth. The "Grizzly Giant" has a limb 125 feet from the ground that is six feet in diameter. Through the hollow of one prostrate trunk three of our party rode abreast for nearly fifty feet, and within the burned-out base of one standing giant sixteen horsemen found place without touching a cord drawn about its body at four feet from the ground. Statements like these show what the Big Trees are—they are facts stubborn enough for any judgment. At first, as I've already said, the grove was a disappointment—I suppose it was because we had been riding all the morning through acres and acres of such enormous pines and cedars. One cannot help regretting that fire has worked such irreparable injury to so many of the trees; it was fire of years ago, probably set in the woods by the Indians. We are told that the Calaveras grove has never been despoiled in this manner, and the Mariposa grove is not likely to be further damaged by this agency.

This grove, two miles square, belongs to the State—having been donated by the general government in June, 1864. The grant was accepted by the Legislature in 1865, and eight commissioners were appointed to look after the trees and the Yosemite valley.

The opinion somewhat widely prevails, I have learned, that there are no little Big Trees—that they belong to a past age, and are likely to soon die from the face of the earth. This is a great mistake; we saw many not more than two or three feet in diameter, and at Clark's they told me that numbers exist less than twenty feet in height. The cones have been sent and carried to various parts of the world—tiny bushes two or three years old can be seen at several places in our own State. The seed germinates readily, and the tree seems to grow well in our northern latitudes.

The small and medium-sized trees lose but a trifle of their circumference in the first twenty feet: the older ones are considerably larger at the ground than at ten feet above. Some of us showed a slight disposition at first to scold at the old fellows on this account—the trees are of such height and symmetry that our eyes refused to admit their great size till the measuring line gave its proof. We spent a long day among them; each hour they grew upon our conceptions; in the evening our appreciation of their grand royalty was tenfold greater than in the morning.

Walk around one of the monarchs—it is twenty-five or thirty steps; examine its ridged bark—it is ten to sixteen inches thick; look up at its limbs—they are 100 to 150 feet above your head; measure their size—each is as large as the great trees of our Massachusetts forests; so far up in the deep blue that your eye's experience is no longer of avail—there is the rich green foliage murmuring in the afternoon breeze! One needs to lie on one's elbow to see into the tops of these strong creations;—for I found it easier to regard them as separate tokens of creative power, than to think of them as having grown by the slow process of years to their vastness. Yet, they have grown, and are still growing; looking up into the branches with a glass, one can see the twigs of last year hardening under the sun. There is the rugged and gnarly "Grizzly Giant"—what lengths of days are his! His years are the years of the Christian era; perhaps in the hour when the angels saw the star of Bethlehem standing in the East this germ broke through the tender sod and came out into the air of the upper world!

It is a dull soul that has no such suggestions as these when riding or walking in the California forests. As I have indicated, there are thousands and thousands of pines and oaks and cedars that give eight or ten feet of diameter; consider an oak of that size, and see how far down the years you must go to find the summer when it was but a sapling no larger than one's thumb. Take a common redwood; it was large enough for a ship's mast when Columbus first set his sails for this western continent. "Through nature up to nature's God,"—and so as I lay on the leafy and mossy earth and looked up into their swaying boughs, I could not help giving some of these trees birth in the day when Christ came. So doing, what a little thing is man and his best work,—dead to-day and forgotten to-morrow! But my tree was a twig in the year 1, and is green and vigorous in the year 1869—a delight to the eye, the pride of the world, with a voice of infinite suggestion for the soul of him who can hear and understand.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—European dates to the 6th inst. have been received.

Great Britain and Ireland.—It was reported that information had been given by secret agents of the government leading to the belief that there is danger of another rising in Ireland. The Cabinet was said to be considering the question of continuing the suspension of habeas corpus, but no action on the subject had taken place. The Irish in Southwark, London, have put forward another of the Fenian prisoners as a candidate for Parliament. The cotton mills in Lancashire which had been partially suspended, are again running on full time.

France.—In the Legislative Body, on the 30th ult., the Opposition submitted "interpellations" in regard to the prorogation of the Chambers in 9th month last, and to the action of the authorities in the disturbances in Paris last summer and in some other cases. One member offered an interpellation on the assassination of citizens, and demanded the impeachment of the Ministers. The introduction of these measures caused much excitement. In the sitting of the 3d inst. Henri Rochefort demanded that the National Guard should be ordered in future to guard the hall for the protection of the members, a demand that had no other effect than to induce in the Chamber eager expressions both of support and disapproval, the latter predominating.

Elections were held on the 5th in those districts of Paris where the late elections were not decisive. The city was free from disturbance.

The Empress has returned from the East.

SPAIN.—The constitutional guarantees, which were suspended some time since on the ground of public safety, have been restored, and several Republican journals, the publication of which was forbidden at the beginning of the recent insurrection, have been allowed to reappear.

DOMESTIC.—The statement of the public debt issued on the 1st inst., showed a total debt, principal and interest, including coupons due but not presented for payment, of $2,648,284,682,79 ; amount in the Treasury $194,674,947, 56 ; making the excess of debt over amount on hand $2,453,559,735,-23, a decrease in the past month of $7,571,454,13 The amount of outstanding bonds issued to the Pacific Railroads was $62,625,320 ; accrued interest, not yet paid, $1,536,205,04 ; interest paid by the United States, $4,984,822,54, of which $1,836,730,-04 has been repaid by transportation of mails &c., leaving $3,148,092,50 still due from the companies.

The annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, states the number of National Banks organized under the National Currency act, now in operation, to be 1620 ; amount of notes outstanding, Ninth month 30th, $299,789,055.

A postal convention has been concluded by the Postmaster General with the Post-office Department of Gteat Britain, reducing, after First month 1st, 1870, the rate of letter postage, prepaid, to six cts. or three pence per half-ounce or fraction thereof. If not prepaid, or if insufficiently prepaid, a fine of six cents will be added to the deficient postage, and collected on delivery. The rates of postage and conditions of payment on printed matter and samples of merchandize, remain unchanged. The negotiations on this subject, commenced about two months previously, were conducted near the conclusion, bv telegraph.

The Tennessee Legislature has adopted a resolution requesting Congress to remove all the disabilities imposed by the 15th amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Elections for the acceptance or rejection of the Constitutions recently framed, and for State officers, in Texas and Mississippi, commenced on the 30th ult., to continue four days in the former State and two days in the latter. The result was not certainly known in either State when this summary was prepared, but it was believed that in Mississippi, Alcorn was elected Governor, and the Constitution adopted. So far as heard from, the elections were conducted quietly in both States.

The Legislature of the Territory of Wyoming has passed a bill granting suffrage to women.

CONGRESS.—The second regular session of the 41st Congress opened on the 6th inst. In the Senate Lot M. Morrill, appointed to fill the place of W. P. Fessenden, deceased, was sworn in. The credentials of John W. Johnston and James F. Lewis as Senators elect from Virginia, were presented, and laid on the table to await the formation of the usual committees. Drake of Mo., introduced a bill, further to define and regulate the jurisdiction and powers of U. S. Courts ; prohibiting such Courts from adjudging any act of Congress invalid on account of unconstitutionality. The following bills were also introduced : by Williams of Oregon, to regulate the immigration of Chinese, forbidding their importation by contract ; by Sumner of Mass. relating to the appellate jurisdiction of the U. S. Supreme Court ; by Morton of Ind., to provide for the reconstruction of the State of Georgia, by reconvening the Legislature, excluding those disqualified by the 14th amendment, and if that body shall ratify the 15th amendment, admitting the State to representation in Congress ; by Cragin of N. H. for the execution of the laws against polygamy in Utah ; and some others.

In the House, a bill providing for taking the ninth census was reported from the Committee appointed at the previous session, and several bills were introduced. The credentials of the members elect from Alabama were referred to the Committee on Elections.

The President's Message was read in both Houses. After a brief reference to the blessings of our national conditton and to the responsibilities of those intrusted with the administration, he states, concisely but clearly, the case of Georgia, as respects reconstruction, and suggests a law authorizing the Governor to reconvene the Legislature as originally elected, admitting none who are inelligible by the 14th amendment, or who cannot take the test oath. The restoration of Virginia under her newly adopted Constitution, is recommended. On the currency question, the return to a specie basis is held to be necessary to stability, and though not immediately practicable, should be the aim of legislation. It is auggested that the Treasury be authorized to redeem its own paper at a fixed price whenever presented, and to withhold such redeemed currency from circulation until sold again for gold. The payment of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds as the time arrives when they may be redeemed, and the substitution of a loan at 4½ per cent. are urged. The sympathy of our government and people with the Cubans in the struggle with Spain, is asserted, but the contest has never assumed the proportions of a war in the international sense, nor justified a recognition of belligerency. The good offices of our government, to put a stop to bloodshed, were offered, but not accepted. The neutrality laws have been executed in good faith and illegal expeditions stopped. The only grave question now pending with any foreign nation is that of the "Alabama claims," and it is hoped that the time will soon arrive to approach its solution so as not only to remove past causes of complaint, but "to lay the foundation of a broad principle of public law which will prevent future difficulties, and tend to a firm and continued peace and friendship." The continuanee of a friendly and enlightened policy towards China is urged, and legislation to prevent the enslavement of the Chinese under the name of coolies. The conviction is expressed that three things are essential to our national peace, perpetuity and fullest development : 1st. Strict integrity in fulfilling all our obligations ; 2d. To secure protection to the person and property of the citizen in every portion of our country, without refersnce to original nationality, religion, color or position, demanding only obedience to the laws and proper respect for the rights of others. 3d. Union of all the Statos, with equal rights, indestructible by any constitutional means.

SUMMARY OF NEWS 271

REPORT OF CONFERENCE OF TEACHERS AND DELEGATES OF FRIENDS' FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS.

Fifth-day evening, 11th mo. 16.—A short additional time was allowed to the theme under discussion at the afternoon adjournment.

CHARLES R. TUCKER, after alluding to the Mission school described by John M. Whitall, told of a First-day school in the meeting where he belonged. The superintendent owned a store which was entered by burglars and robbed. The burglars—three small boys—were apprehended. Our Friend on beholding them, and learning that they were destitute and homeless, yearned for their souls, asked for their release, and gave his bond for them, on condition that they would meet him next First-day morning at his store. The appointment was kept—he met them with a loving, prayerful heart, fed and clothed them, and won their confidence. His school has increased, and he is seen on First-day mornings quietly wending his way to his place of business, with a basket on his arm containing a supply for their wants. Here he meets his scholars—four times the original number.

P. E. CHASE dwelt on the meaning of the expression home mission. We all think of the apostles as missionaries; perhaps we do not often think that the terms are identical; that apostle in Greek is the same as missionary in Latin. [His further remarks we must pass over on account of space.]

CATHERINE M. SHIPLEY.—[Most of her words were unheard by the reporter, owing to noise in the street.]—She believed that many here have been faithful, and know how to be self-sacrificing. We must learn to give up. She felt to-night that some of us may make a new resolve on this point, to give up each day something of our time and thoughts to the Saviour; for our Master rewards very liberally.

JANE WHITE spoke of the benefit derived by ourselves from devoting a portion of time to missionary labors; did not think it interferes with home duties, but that it is essential for us to have full faith in our Heavenly Father and in His power to sustain us.

H. W. SMITH spoke of home missions in the strictest sense, as bearing on those we love best in the world.

SAMUEL BOYCE made impressive remarks enforced by an anecdote on intemperance.

THE PRESIDENT introduced the next subject in the programme—

"CHRISTIAN WORK AMONG THE INDIANS, FREEDMEN, AND OTHERS."

JOEL BEAN—[After some preliminary remarks].—While the field, which is the world, is, in the providence of our heavenly Father, more and more opened to Christian effort, opportunities are presented on every hand for Christian labor. He trusted that the Lord is preparing His Church more fully to enter into the open fields. And while to our own branch of the church we see in many places an outstretched hand inviting our labor, and many a voice calls to us to "come over and help us," he could not doubt that the great Head of the Church, at the same time that He is opening these fields, is preparing laborers to enter into them. The speaker referred to many who with hearts warm with love to the Saviour, and seeing work all around them, are anxious to know what is their individual work. How precious the thought that we are not left to decide the question. When the disciples were told to lift up their eyes and behold the fields white unto harvest, they saw the opportunity to labor. But that opportunity did not constitute the call for them to enter in. However we may long to work for the Master, if we enter into that work without His direction, how much labor will be wasted! So instead of saying to His disciples, because the fields are white enter into them, He calls them to the Lord of the harvest Himself: "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that He will send forth," &c. And when they were sufficiently trained in following Him, and had received the outpourings of His Holy Spirit, they were sent. And as we wait upon the Master to know His will, and come to Him in humble consecration of our all, He will send us forth. It is not for us to choose our work—the pleasantest, the easiest, the most delightful; the greatest and holiest of teachers descended to seek the lowest of men, and they who follow Him most closely and learn most of Him, are they to whom the commission is specially addressed, "Go teach all nations." He spoke of some now under the preparing hand who have not yet clearly seen what is to be their peculiar part in this great work; but the Lord will make it manifest to His own children. Some we see called to Madagascar, to India, to the old Bible lands, &c., going forth in self-sacrifice, weeping and bearing precious seed, &c., &c.

James Whitall, by request, opened the subject of work among the American Indians, and with pertinent remarks introduced an interesting letter from Enoch Hoag, which, not being at present before us, may find insertion in another department of the Review.

Francis T. King having been requested by the Executive Committee to speak upon this subject, did so at length in extremely interesting remarks based upon intimate knowledge. We trust to see them reported at length.

Stafford Allen [of London, a nephew of the beloved William Allen], having been actively identified with the generosity of English Friends towards the American freedmen, was called upon by the Chair; gave interesting statements of the English work, and some occurrences which had come to his knowledge whilst travelling in our Southern States. For all this we refer to the forthcoming official report.

After remarks from W. H. Ladd, Yardley Warner, and Augustus Taber (omitted solely from the need of compression), the Conference adjourned till next morning.

Sixth-day morning, 11th mo. 19th.—[The same subject continued.]

Anthony M. Kimber.—"Christian work among the Freedmen" includes all charitable efforts for their physical relief—to feed and clothe the destitute; to provide their sick with medical attendance and remedies; to assist them in procuring remunerative labor, advising them to avoid the arena of politics, to cultivate the soil, and have their children instructed in some useful trade or mechanic art; helping them to secure a little home of their own, or otherwise protecting them from extortionate landlords. All this should we do, but not leave undone more important Christian work among the freedmen. Considering that the philanthropic department of such work seems to be well cared for by our Freedmen's Relief Associations, let us occupy the brief interval of time allotted to this subject with the consideration of our duty to afford them moral and spiritual aid.

Do we not owe them a heavy debt which is overdue, but a small instalment of which has been paid? Have we not opportunity for discharging much more of this obligation? We wonder that our ministers of the gospel do not feel bound to travel and sojourn among them! But is it not still more wonderful that so few other of our members labor in this harvest field? If the soil were barren or ungrateful, there might seem some excuse for such neglect! Let us not forget that their spiritual need is widely different from that of our Indians or the heathen. The freedmen may generally be considered as a Christian people. They rejoice in the privilege now offered them of reading for themselves the glad tidings which they have long heard preached, that He who made of one blood all nations of the earth, sent His only Son into the world to die for them. The foundation of their faith seems to be well laid. Our duty is to edify or build them up; to teach them, "giving all diligence, to add to their faith virtue," that Christian morality may appear among them as the legitimate fruit of their Christian belief.

All this we owe in common with other professing Christians; but as members of a highly-privileged religious society, we owe much more to the freedmen. Having been specially enlightened respecting the offices of the Holy Spirit, it is our duty freely to impart to them our spiritual views.

Alfred H. Jones had been for some time among the freedmen. They are generally a God-fearing people, with great veneration of the Deity. They nearly all believe in Christ as the Saviour of the world, yet they want the Aquillas and the Priscillas to instruct them in His way more perfectly. They are hungering and thirsting after righteousness; they have their preachers who often stand before them and expound the Scriptures so far as they understand them. He had sometimes heard this in a manner most pleasantly surprising. In many parts of N. Carolina the freedmen are looking towards Friends. The speaker related (what has been published in the Review) the application made by some colored people to be incorporated with our Religious Society. Having accompanied the committee which visited them, he recognized in the movement the guidance of God's Holy Spirit. He was not aware that more than one Friends' meeting was ever held in the town of Salem, N. C., where these people reside.

William Welsh being introduced by the Chair as a prominent citizen of Philadelphia, gave a very kind endorsement to the Indian policy of the President, and to the Christian work of Friends among the red men.

Edward Earle and James E. Rhoads followed. The latter, in conclusion, hoped we shall be very careful to avoid self-gratulation, and ever keep within that spirit which constrains us to say: "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us."

William S. Hilles warmly endorsed this remark. The work that is done is that of Christ, and not that of the people.

The President then stated the following theme:

"The True Qualification for all Christian Work. 'The love of Christ constraineth,' the Holy Spirit guides and teaches us."

Benjamin Frankland illustrated the subject with much power in a statement of personal experiences, and of the providences (accidents he did not believe in) which led him into the work. He was followed by Obadiah Chase in the same line.

Eli Jones construed the inquiry to be: Does the love of Christ constrain the Christian to work for the salvation of souls? Is the Spirit a safe teacher? As we go out into the Lord's work, shall we seek to be led by that Spirit, and to move only under its influences? He considered this one of the most important questions that can be put to this Conference. A union of sentiment upon this question should be as the rallying standard around which the Society in all parts of this great country and elsewhere should rally. What says our blessed Lord to His disciples? "It is expedient for you that I go away: for if if I go not away, the Comforter will not come. But if I depart, I will send Him unto you... Howbeit, when He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, He will guide you into all truth." He ascended to the right hand of the Father. Has He made that promise good unto His people? Let what transpired on the day of Pentecost tell. Let the testimony of the early Fathers and of Christians in all ages affirm. And their words come to us to-day as from a cloud of witnesses, all attesting that our blessed Head, the Lord Jesus Christ, has made good that testimony and promise to His people. The guiding influences of the Holy Spirit are to-day the crown and glory of the Christian Church. And what brothers or sisters who have had any part in mission work cannot bear affirmative testimony that in what they have done they have been constrained by the love of Christ? Constrained by the love of Christ before he was fourteen years of age to lift up his voice in the assemblies of the people, and constrained, as he believed, by the love of Christ, to visit the four quarters of the globe on which we dwell, he had mingled with people of many nationalities and religious creeds. And he had returned to us once more, and was now bound to another field of service. And what should he say? That the Holy Spirit is not a safe teacher? He would not say it. He would say that wherever he had gone in the constraining love of Christ—wherever he had kept his eye fixed upon the blessed Master and sought the teachings of His Spirit, whether in the great congregation of the educated and intelligent, among the natives of the west coast of Africa, or when he had spoken to the slave or to the freedman in the South—wherever he had been, it had seemed to him that the great Spirit had never been wanting in dispensing the good things of the Kingdom as they were needed. And having entered this work early, he might tell his friends that his heart had been drawn out in sympathy to this large company of young Friends. Only that his locks are white—only that he had seen his more than threescore years—he should reckon himself with them, for his heart is young. But he would encourage them to keep close to their Master, asking guidance. They knew that when Saul of Tarsus was converted, the first thing he asked was: "What wouldst thou have me to do?" And did not the Lord give him something to do? Did He not make him a master builder in His house? Did not he say, "By the grace of God I am what I am." It is under the precious influences of the Eternal Spirit that we should work; and so working, whether the service be in the Bible class or the First-day school—in teaching the child or the adult, or in the great congregation of the people—the Lord our God will be with us. He will give us tongue and utterance, mouth and wisdom. Let us speak ever with a full heart under the constraining influence of the Holy Spirit, and the Name of the Lord will be magnified, and the mission of this people will be a successful one. And when we lay aside our weapons of warfare, may each of us be prepared to say: "Not unto us, not unto us, O Lord, but unto thy name give glory!"

James C. Thomas.—Through all the deliberations and discussions of this body, the great thought now suggested for consideration has underlain it all. The foundation—the motive power—has been under it all: it is Christ, our foundation—it is the Holy Spirit, our Leader and Qualifier—and that only, which qualifies us for any, even the least service for our Lord. Addressing himself to his Christian brothers and sisters who know their sins forgiven for Jesus' sake, and who desire to give evidence of their love for Him who first loved them, he believed that for all such the powerful operation of the Holy Spirit is intended, either as preparing them for the Lord's service, or as qualifying them to do His work;—that there is no Christian who is faithful to his Master, who is not under the Lord's qualifying hand for future service, or is not, in the exercise of his gift, at present laboring for the Master. And it is because we are not looking for that qualification, and not willing to see that service, that many stand idle in the market places, while the command is, in the morning, at the noontide, and even, it may be, to a late hour in the night: "Go into my vineyard and labor." He desired that his dear young Friends might not, in the first instance, expect to find the qualification and the impression to service in the thunder or whirlwind, or by some mighty convulsion of nature, but in the still small voice, in that humble, earnest faith we have in our Lord, and in that gushing forth and swelling of our hearts whereby we are ready to extend our hand, it may be to those who are nearest to us,—to our children, to our friends,—to speak a word for our Master, and to bring them to Him. Sometimes when we feel this impression and this duty, we want to feel so sure that it is right—some of us are so afraid when we take the hand of our Lord, lest we may make some mistake; and yet we have only to commit ourselves to Him—to trust in Him and have His glory before our eyes, and simply do the service for which He is calling, &c. &c.

Daniel Hill thought with former speakers that the present is one of the most important questions that had claimed attention, and dwelt upon the constraining love of Christ as the proper and great motive. He suggested the test by which we should know whether this constraining love or something else is the prompting motive. We might, he said, be prompted by a desire for prominence—by ambition to build up our particular branch of the service; but when a heart-desire is felt for the salvation of souls, nothing but the love of Christ can beget that desire. He knew that it is sometimes said that the devil puts these things in our hearts. He did not believe that the devil ever suggested a good thought. It is contrary to his character. He knew that the devil may pervert and destroy good desires that have been begotten, in their practical execution. But when there is in any heart a sincere desire to be instrumental in the hands of the Lord in doing good, that desire is begotten by the Holy Spirit, and cannot be from any other source. He invited self-examination as to motive, and in conclusion said: The Holy Spirit comes not only as a Guide to lead us in the right way, but also to give power to do that work for which it has already begotten a desire.

Caroline E. Ladd called attention to the two commandments to love the Lord with all our powers, and to love our neighbor as ourselves. This love will constrain to work for Christ. The Lord who appeared in the watches of the night appears to us through influences and circumstances which are deep in their meaning. She exhorted the young to faithfulness in that which is least.

Hannah E. Bean.—Beloved young Friends, when constrained by the love of your Saviour and led by His providence, remember to seek for His Spirit,—to believe that it will be given,—to rely wholly upon it. And in all your efforts remember that it is not by any might of men, not by any power derived either from experience or from intellectual attainments, but by the Spirit of the Lord alone that His cause is advanced.

A. S. Folwell briefly expressed the belief that when the dear Friends who had so strengthened the faith of others had departed the results would remain, &c. &c.

Stephen Wood.—His feelings had been deeply interested in attending the previous sittings, and at this time. The language had strongly impressed his mind,—"Speak unto this people that they go forward;" also the language of the apostle Paul: "And I, brethren, when I came unto you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God—and my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but with the demonstration of the Spirit and with power, that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." He referred to the words of George Fox: "We are nothing—Christ is all." Looking over this religious Society, and briefly referring to the facts of the day, he desired that we might be a united people and truly the friends of our dear Saviour. "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." He evinced fervent charity for those who may not be prepared to unite in this movement. He desired that we may do every thing that is calculated to create unity and harmony in this Society, for he was firmly of the opinion that the times call loudly for a waking up—for new zeal—for new conversion—while we seek for light and guidance from on high to carry out the mission which had seemed to him to have but just begun for our religious Society.

Hannah W. Smith wished to ask a practical question. She thought the difficulty with many who desire to be earnest workers is, principally, how to know the voice of the Lord—how to know when He really leads in work. She would ask those who had more experience than herself whether "the love of Christ constraining us" does not mean when we feel a secret intimation to do something—not so much a command that we must, but a drawing of the heart—a secret intimation to do something for the Lord—whether that is not the love of Christ constraining us, and the voice of His holy Spirit teaching and guiding us.

Joel Bean desired to express his belief that "the love of Christ constraining," is—the Holy Spirit guiding. He fully believed it is our privilege, in the exercise of living faith, to know our blessed Lord in the direction of all our life as surely as in the forgiveness of our sins. And whatever does make manifest is light; simply accepting light in whatever way it may come—the intimation of the Divine will, our heavenly Father's pleasure—following it in the obedience of faith, it is given to the Christian to acknowledge, as many can testify, that the Lord does lead His people all the days of their lives.

Lydia Macomber—Mary Buffington—Gilbert C. Congdon—spoke briefly.

John H. Douglas [after valuable remarks omitted only for want of space.]—As he saw the shepherds with their sheep coming down from the mountains in Italy, and heard them calling their sheep, he noticed that each one knew the voice of its own master and followed him. What was the secret of it? It was the nearness, the intimacy day and night, which existed between the shepherd and the sheep. There may be a danger in our trying to tell the voice of the true Shepherd at too great a distance. Oh, let us come right into the fold, right into the presence and under the sheltering arm of our blessed Shepherd, and as we do this, the question that has been awakened in all our hearts at some time will flee away. Our time is short, though we are but young—some of us; and we want to live for Christ: and if I pray one prayer for myself more than another, it is—Blessed Pattern, make me more like thyself!

Sixth-day afternoon.—The President announced the next subject for consideration:

"The Need in the Society of Friends for First-day Schools."

Thos. Chase.—[See his Address in Review, No. 14. A desire was expressed for its publication, hence it was given in advance of chronological order.]

Catherine M. Shipley expressed a prayerful desire that our heavenly Father would raise up in this city laborers qualified to train those whom we love, &c., &c.

Allen Jay (of North Carolina) had come from that Yearly Meeting, where the First-day school work has been abundantly blessed during the last twelve months, and it was true that his heart had been enlisted in the work. He should return to the field of labor with increased interest, and, he trusted, with added confidence. We need a First-day school in our Society, for the reason that it is a blessing to that branch of the church that fosters it. This work for many years will demonstrate to any one who looks back upon it, that that branch of the church which has carried on this work most successfully has prospered most, and gathered the greatest number of souls to Christ. It will be a blessing not only to our Society, but also to others. Ours acknowledges, perhaps, more fully than does any other, the influence of the Holy Spirit, and the importance of rightly exercising every gift in the church. The First-day school opens the door by which those different gifts may be occupied. Though a young man, he could remember when his heart burned with a desire to do something for the cause of his dear Master. He told of his juvenile experiences, and of the manner of his being led to teach a First-day school. The Master who said, Go and preach, also said, Go and teach. We have the same authority for First-day school teachers to go and teach the gospel, that we have to go and preach the gospel. And we need a field in which our young men and young women may labor. The First-day school is the nursery wherein these young hearts are prepared for entrance into the church.

He told of 300 individuals receiving membership in North Carolina Yearly Meeting through the blessing resting on the First-day school. In one monthly meeting, where they had received 27 members, he heard an overseer say that every one of those acknowledged having received in those schools the first impressions which led them into the Society of Friends. In another monthly meeting where they have lately received over 100 members, the result is attributed very much to missionary work. Then he laid it down that we need a First-day school in our Society to give it increased vitality.

After pursuing the subject, the speaker concluded by saying, God has blessed us, and may we go home with renewed hope and strength.

Thomas W. Ladd and a number of other speakers followed.

David B. Updegraff enumerated various cogent reasons for Friends' First-day schools. He considered the question whether they are needed for our own children, and arrived logically at the conclusion that they are good for all or they are good for none.

Gilbert C. Congdon went over the North Carolina statistics. Of the 5000 children in Friends' First-day schools in that State, only 1400 are our members; 1500 are colored persons, 2000 are children of the white inhabitants of that State who are not Friends. Our North Carolina Friends are doing a great missionary work—carrying out the original conception and sense of obligation impressed upon our forefathers in religious profession, that our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who came to offer up His life for all the world, intended that this section of the church, in its field of operation, should occupy the broad, wide surface of humanity, &c., &c.

Samuel Boyce expressed the intense interest with which he had listened, and wished the address of Professor Chase laid before every family of Friends in the United States. He strongly enforced the need of First-day schools in the Society of Friends, and the effect they might have had, if rightly inaugurated half a century ago, in preventing schism.

Sixth-day evening.—Subject under consideration:

"Bible Teaching in Palestine."

This subject was assigned by the Executive Committee to Eli Jones. Of this evening no report is before us, and we understand the stenographer was absent. The narrations and information given by our dear Friend Eli Jones were highly interesting and instructive, being condensed from a copious store of personal information and reminiscences.

Seventh-day, 11th mo. 20th.—Several reports and matters of business claimed attention. The programme having been gone through, no themes of discussion were presented, and whilst we abstain from reporting the communications of the several speakers, conscious that we could not convey to those who were absent a feeling of the divine unction which attended, we do not hesitate to express the conviction that our adorable Saviour was present, bestowing precious gifts. It was a day of merciful visitation, and many awakened spirits magnified the Lord, and rejoiced in God their Saviour. It was a day to be remembered with reverent humbleness, for the outpouring of the Spirit was not through the power of eminent instrumentality, nor, in any degree, of man. It was the Lord's doing. It is our earnest desire and prayer to God that those who found their Saviour to be near and precious, and whose hearts melted with his love, may "continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving," and, whilst ever departing from iniquity and hasting to the celestial kingdom,

> "Nightly pitch their moving tents,
> A day's march nearer home."

A deep solemnity reigned through this sitting of four and a half hours, up to the closing moment, when the chairman, in the authority and wisdom given him for the effort, decided that the time had come, and declared the Conference adjourned.

Intermediate meetings were held on each day of the Conference relative to distinct departments of labor. None of these are at present reported.

CONSCIENCE: OUR OWN AND OTHER MEN'S.

Corinthians, viii., ix. and x.

BY THOMAS HODGKIN.

As before said, the measure of Christian liberty is Christian edification—the building up of the body of Christ. We are like a vast army marching onward through an enemy's country to our fatherland. The step with which the army marches is probably slower, each day's march is shorter, than some strong and sturdy warriors would easily accomplish. But there are frail and delicate men, and some wounded ones among them; these also must be remembered in fixing the order of march. For their sakes a kind of compromise must be effected with these stout-hearted ones, and for this cause it is that they should not ask too impatiently, "Why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience?"

A third class presents itself—that of the Christians who professed their contempt for the false gods of their neighbors by sharing without scruple in feasts professedly sacrificial and held in the very precincts of the temple. Here the Apostle is much more stringent in his denunciation. Here the eating and the drinking were openly, avowedly, ostentatiously mingled with idolatry; there could be no necessity for intermingling with these. No man could say, if enjoined to abstain from these, "Then must we needs go out of the world." It was here obviously a question of mere sensual gratification on the one hand, and injury, perhaps death, to the souls for which Christ died on the other. How could any true Christian believer hesitate in such a choice? And as for the argument drawn from the absolute non-existence of the false gods in whose honor these temples were reared and banquets given, the Apostle is not too confident of the truth of this premiss. Doubtless the idol, the chiselled stone or graven wood, is nothing; but is it so clear that there was not demoniac power and fascination at work in the unseen world of spirits to induce men to perform the otherwise incredible folly of idol-worship?

But, after all, the grand argument here, and for us, in all vexed questions of conscience was, "How harmonises it with the worship and service of Christ? What bearing has it on our communion with Him? Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and of the table of demons. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? Are we stronger than He?"

This test, whether any given act makes harmony or discord when brought into close comparison with an act of service to the Saviour, whether the two notes when struck together sound in unison or not, is a test of wide and far-reaching application; and we must admit that it sometimes decides the Christian's conscience against an act, the absolute wrongness of which he would find it hard to establish by logical argument.

In considering this last "case of conscience," we have, following the Apostle's guidance, deviated a little from our precise subject—"other men's scruples"—though this case also was decided by him in the eighth chapter on that ground. "For if any man see thee which hast knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him which is weak be" (wrongfully) "built up to the eating of these things which are offered in sacrifice to idols? And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish for whom Christ died? But when ye sin so against the brethren and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ." (Cf. Matt. xxv. 45.) But it seems to me that, in returning to the consideration of the question of actually partaking of a feast in an idol's temple, the Apostle was led to put the matter on yet higher ground, and to treat it as an offence, not only against the weaker brother's conscience, but against the banqueter's own also.

There is yet one more class of cases, I think, (a class which, from the nature of his subject, did not come under St. Paul's consideration here,) in which one man's scruples may be binding upon another.

We all know and readily admit that the child is bound to take on trust from its parents or teachers much that appertains to the conscience as well as to the intellect. It has continually to abstain from the doing of things in which it can see no trace of harm, simply because it is bidden to abstain from them. And though we admit that it is desirable as much as may be to satisfy the child of the reasonableness of the commands or prohibitions laid upon it, there will remain a large residuum of instances in which this is impossible; the child's liberty must be judged absolutely by another person's conscience.

Something like this marks the relation of the younger to the older members of every Christian Church. Oftentimes the latter are really "fathers in Christ" to the former; and whether that be so or not, it is reasonable to expect that the veteran Christian, who has been through a long life battling against the world, the flesh, and the devil, should have instincts, so to speak, as to that which helps and that which hinders in the great struggle: instincts whose practical result he may be able to communicate to his younger fellow-soldiers in the shape of a warning or an advice, though the process by which he arrived at them he may feel it impossible accurately to retrace.

Surely such warning or advice is always deserving of respectful attention, often of punctual obedience, even though the reason be not convinced; and thus we have another kind of cases in which "my liberty is rightly judged according to another man's conscience."

But it may be said, Is the weaker conscience always to prevail? You have assigned various reasons for obeying the dictates of other men's consciences; you have said nothing about resisting them. Without some counteracting principle of freedom, Christianity will become—what it has almost become before now—a mere aggregate of feeble superstitions which cannot be justified either by reason or Scripture, but of which all that can be said is, "A, B, or C, devout servants of God, though persons of slender intellectual strength, thought it safer to comply with them."

Undoubtedly there is an opposing principle in Christianity—a principle exemplified by our Saviour himself in his denunciation of the Pharisees and in his frequent cures on the Sabbath-day—a principle also exemplified by one whose conduct we can in this matter more safely take as a pattern for ourselves, since he possessed not that knowledge of the secret hearts of men which enabled Christ with perfect certainty to address the Scribes and Pharisees as "hypocrites"—I mean, by the Apostle Paul, when he said, "To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour;" and "When Peter was come to Antioch I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed." It is a principle of determination "to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free and not to be entangled again in any yoke of bondage;" a resolution not to yield an inch to spiritual despotism exercised after the manner of the Pharisees; a persistent attempt to realize in the life those noble words, "Now the Lord is the Spirit, and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty."

I can well understand this attitude of mind being entirely consistent with the most unbounded charity towards the scruples of weaker brethren; and thus the same man who would say, "I will go a mile with you as a matter of charity rather than wound the conscience of one of my brethren," might say, "I will not stir a step as a matter of subjection if you corrupt the Gospel message, and seek to impose this thing upon me as a necessity of salvation."

This is an outline of the general principles which, I think, pervade "the relations of our consciences to other men's scruples." How they apply in particular instances I have not sought to show. And, indeed, this must be in most fields of Christian duty beyond the province of any human adviser. The general scope of our obligations under the new law of life and peace may well be discussed and considered by us with the New Testament in our hands; the special application to the varying and never precisely recurring circumstances of life must be left to the Holy Spirit, who is promised us for a Guide as well as for a Comforter. Christian ethics may easily give us our major premiss, but the Holy Spirit furnishes the minor, and loving obedience to Him who has redeemed us welds them both together into the practical conclusion.—Friends' Quarterly Examiner.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, TWELFTH MONTH 18, 1869.

AMBUSCADE. — Our attention has been called to the subject of anonymous letters. It may be trusted that very few of the readers of the Review have need for a presentation of the strong views we entertain respecting this sort of brigandage. A hasty zeal sometimes impels a person, at whose hand the work is not required, to do battle with some supposed or reported wrong, and the result is a stab in the dark in the form of an anonymous address. The receiver, if sensitive, may writhe in torture, having no means of defence or refutation, although the insinuation or charge be unjust and even groundless. We condemn this manner of testimony altogether. The truth is noble, beautiful, powerful, and candid. It requires no dishonorable testimony-bearers. It gives to its servants a dignified commission, and a panoply which would be dishonored by skulking in ambush. The moral warfare does not call for cowards or guerillas. Paul, the bold rebuker of all evil, himself a pattern of Christian manliness, well describes the equipment of a champion of the right. First of all, "having the loins girt about with truth;" then, the breastplate of righteousness; the "feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;" the shield of faith; the helmet of the hope of salvation; the sword of the Spirit—praying always. When William Penn named his book, "Innocency with an open face," he set forth in the very title a beautiful theme for profitable contemplation.

It is for the safety of the individual and the good of the community, that the man who sees or fancies wrong in others, (the open rebuke of which would involve a responsibility he dare not incur,) should bear his burden till he finds the pressure of duty sufficient to enable him to father his charges and to take the consequences. In the ancient battles of the Lord, the officers made proclamation that the fearful and faint-hearted should have permission to turn back. (Deut. xx. 8.) And to this day it is better that he who has no weapon but the stiletto of an anonymous attack, should leave the service to open-faced innocency, girt about with truth and having for her motto, "The Lord is my strength, of whom shall I be afraid."

Another objection to anonymous protests is entitled to consideration. Such a rebuke irritates, excites a sense of injustice, and, distracting the mind from a self-application of what might be wholesome truth if properly administered, makes the wrong-doer feel himself wronged, and arms him with a sort of martyr self-complacency. Had a letter of Christian counsel come, over a respectable signature, it would have brought with it an evidence of sincerity, and might have carried conviction and awakened resolutions of amendment.

A delicate sense of honor in respect to the subject here treated of will prevent an act, under the screen of incognito, which may often injure and torture an innocent person, possibly blast a reputation, and ultimately cause remorse to the actor.

Whoever makes a charge should afford opportunity of refutation.

A Week of Prayer—A Life of Prayer.—An invitation has gone forth for a week of prayer (First month 2d, to First month 9th, inclusive) throughout the world. We shall be negligent disciples of the holy "Teacher sent from God," and dull receivers of His apostles' teachings, if any of the seven days thus indicated find us prayerless. "Watch and pray," said our blessed Lord; and again, "Men ought always to pray." The twelve apostles said: "We will give ourselves continually to prayer." Paul, Timothy, and Sylvanus wrote to their brethren: "We pray always for you;" and elsewhere we find the same trio of earnest Christians, "night and day praying exceedingly." Paul, in an earnest outpouring of his soul, exhorted the saints at Ephesus, and the faithful in Christ Jesus, to pray always, "with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance." Elsewhere he says, "Pray without ceasing;" and again, "I will that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands without wrath and doubting."

A schedule of topics for a concert of prayer on each successive day has been presented to the Christian world. And here the fitting words of Paul come brightly into view, as meeting the case: "Continue in prayer, and watch in the same with thanksgiving." "When you have gotten the requisite grace," said Adam Clarke, "take care of it, and bring it into its proper action by watchfulness; by which you will know when, and where, and how to apply it, being always grateful to God who has called you into such a state of salvation." It is a consideration humbling to the creature, that "we know not what to pray for as we ought." Thus Paul proclaimed long ago to the Romans, and in his perpetuated epistle he proclaims it now to those who are gathered in Rome. We are too weak, and the best of men are too finite for us to receive instruction from Pope or from "Evangelical Alliance," just what we shall pray from the second day to the ninth of the coming month. But we know our duty to pray always, and that hence we should be found so doing on those days. And how beautiful, how comforting, and how replete with inspiration the words of Paul in immediate connection with those above quoted: "The Spirit helpeth our infirmities;" "The Spirit itself maketh intercession for us;" "He that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because He maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God."

How precious the train of thoughts here brought into view! The Spirit of our Redeemer and Mediator, dwelling in us, knowing all our needs, knowing also the perfect will of the Father, inspiring our prayers, making intercession for us, and all "according to the will of God!" How unspeakable the inducement to "live in the Spirit," that such help should be ever at hand! How blessed the attainment to have our very will Christ-subjected—every thought brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ!

But whilst, when we approach the throne of grace with the aspiration, "Lord, teach us to pray," we seek our theme not from a printed schedule, but from the intimation of the Word which is very nigh—we do not regard with indifference that, at the very moment, tens of thousands of our fellow-Christians are praying for things altogether proper (if the Lord so will) to be prayed for. This knowledge may induce profitable meditation, solemnize our spirits, and perhaps lead to prayer inspired by and in accordance with the mind of The Spirit.

It is a most cheering indication of the increase of spirituality that the very first theme—the one suggested for the first day of the week of prayer—is the unspeakable gift to which Friends have ever testified—the glorious Promise of the Father, a result of Christ's laying down His life—"The work of the Holy Spirit." Can we not all unite in fervent desire that the Holy Spirit may grant an understanding and a realization of the dispensation of the Holy Ghost to all praying people throughout Christendom?

The Good Old Ways.—Our earliest Friends, in their Yearly Meeting in London in 1682, being greatly comforted by the prevalence of love, peace, and unity, and the general prosperity and spreading of truth, declared in their epistle: "We have great cause to prize the Lord's power and goodness, and to pray for the continuance of His love, and increase of His wisdom, government, and peace." To which George Fox subjoined: "The Lord in His glorious power was with us in all our assemblies, at this Yearly Meeting. He over all hath the dominion; and over all evil spirits gave dominion to His people. Glory to His name forever."

Something of this has, through abounding grace and mercy, been recently known; and a letter from a beloved Friend (from which passages are given on another page) assures us that in different places He who received gifts for men is giving liberally His Spirit to sons and daughters. "Therefore let your eye be in the Gospel," said George Fox on the same occasion his heart being filled, as ours should be, with the glad tidings.

Whilst mercies are new each day, and all things are new to each soul in which life and immortality are brought to light with an assurance of pardon and of sonship, it is all from the old unchangeable source and fountain from which our faithful predecessors drank, and found it to be in them a well of water. No strange thing has happened, nor change of dispensation. "The Way, the Truth, and the Life," in which they were revived and sanctified, are sacred and sufficient; and whilst we recognize the piety and acceptableness in the Divine sight of thousands upon thousands from whom we dissent in part, we hope to see in the Society of Friends no deviation from that spiritual system of faith and practice which has been designated by the word Quakerism.

DIED.

CHAMNESS.—On the 5th of First month, 1869, at the residence of his son-in-law Nathaniel Carter, near Mooresville, Indiana, Edward Chamness, in his 87th year; a member of Plainfield Mo. Meeting.

HADLEY.—Near the same place, on the 30th of Tenth mo., 1869, after a short illness, John Hadley, in his 82d year; a member of White Lick Monthly Meeting. The above-named Friends removed from North Carolina, and were among the earliest settlers of this State.

SPRAY.—At her residence near Bridgeport, Ind., after a brief illness, on the 26th of Ninth month, 1869, Elizabeth H., relict of James Spray, aged nearly 43 years; a member and Elder of Bridgeport Monthly Meeting. In this dear sister the Church lost an earnest worker, the orphan a friend, the poor a sympathizer.

MITCHELL.—At Nantucket, Mass., on the 16th of 10th mo., 1869, Lydia B. Mitchell, widow of the late Seth Mitchell, aged 82 years; a worthy member and Elder in New Bedford (formerly Nantucket) Monthly Meeting. The desire of her heart that she might be called suddenly, if it pleased her Heavenly Father, was granted, and evidence was given of entire preparation for the sudden summons.

"No weary day, no sleepless night,
No pain of severing ties,
No cloud to obscure the mental light,
No tears to dim the eyes."

GOUGH—HEATON.—At the residence of her son-in-law Geo. G. Keeler, in Ellenville, Ulster Co., N.Y., on the 14th of Tenth month, 1869, Sarah Gough, aged 72, widow of the late Dr. John M. Gough, of New York city, and daughter of Dr. Adna Heaton, formerly of Plattekill, N. Y. And on the 11th of Eleventh month, 1869, at his residence at the Valley, Ulster Co., Samuel Heaton, aged 68, brother of the above; both valued ministers of Marlborough Monthly Meeting. Words would fail us to describe the workings of the Saviour's love through these dear and devoted Friends. To both, death had lost its sting, and the world its attractions. They had performed their work with a degree of faithfulness while health and strength were given, so that when brought to a sick-bed they had only to bear the sufferings of the body; and these, though often severe, were in measure swallowed up in the joys of God's salvation and the peace of the redeemed.

WIDDIFIELD.—At his residence near Maple Grove, Province of Ontario, Canada, on the 20th of Tenth month, 1869, Henry Widdifield, a beloved and patriarchal Friend, aged 90 years.

ANDERSON.—On the 19th of Sixth month, 1869, near Bridgeport, Ind., in her 24th year, Lydia, daughter of Thomas S. and the late Martha Ann Anderson, a member of Bridgeport Monthly Meeting. The Christian graces of this dear young Friend endeared her to a large circle of relatives and friends. Her sympathy was warm toward all who were afflicted, and she took a deep interest in the welfare of the Freedmen. This induced her to leave home and its endearments to labor for them at Macon, Miss., hoping to be instrumental in their intellectual and spiritual elevation. Her health gave way under the hardships of her Southern home, yet she felt that, whatever might be the issue of her illness, she was glad that she had made the effort, and that she could not have been satisfied without it. She resigned herself, with patient calmness, to the disposal of her heavenly Father, and her redeemed spirit passed out of time in a happy triumph of faith.

MARSHALL.—On the 3d of Eleventh mo., 1869, in the 78th year of his age, Samuel Marshall, of Kendal, England,—a widely known and highly esteemed member and elder of the Society of Friends. His was a useful and honorable life: a man of science, a philanthropist, he was long the able and religiously concerned head of Friends' School in Kendal, and a faithful and useful servant of the Church.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., 11th mo. 30th, 1869.

Yesterday afternoon I spent the time till after dark among the poor and sick freedmen, and found some really in need of help and counsel. One case, in particular, is worthy of note: Under a roof, the eaves of which came within less than two feet of the ground, the ridgepole of which I could touch comfortably with my hand,—smoky and black, without a window, but with a hole cut in one end for a door,—lay a poor woman sick ever since last Christmas and evidently near the "cold river," with two small children and no one to render any help. A more wretched looking scene it would be hard to find, and yet this woman, without a morsel of bread for her children, or nourishment or medicine for herself, was one of the happiest creatures I have ever seen in my life, singing and praising her Redeemer continually, frequently saying, "Go tell sinners all around what a Saviour I have found." In the evening had a large and interesting meeting with colored people, and retired late in the evening well satisfied with the labors of the day, my visit seeming very timely. . . There are fewer indications about Lincolnton of severe drought than in the central parts of the State, that the people here who have been in times past proverbially poor seem to have been favored, and I think will be able to get through the winter without much suffering. There is a large population of colored people in Cleaveland and other counties west of this who have had scarcely any advantages of school, and are exceedingly anxious for learning. They have been neglected by being in a remote part of the State and off the line of the railroad; I hope the free schools may do something for them, but there are so many things that operate as obstacles to them that I am quite sure they will come far, far short of meeting the expectations of their sanguine friends. . . The school at Lincolnton is in a very prosperous condition; sixty-seven children were in attendance, and were the best disciplined I have ever seen there at any time when I have been there, and yet I was told by the teacher that she had not whipped any. When the school comes to fill up to one hundred or more, as it will very soon do, the teachers will be pretty severely taxed and likely require further help.

Lexington, N. C., 12th mo. 2d, 1869.

A great revival has been going on at Lexington for the last five weeks. It has not been confined to age or race. Some former slaveholders, who have been hostile to the negro since his emancipation, and who have looked with animosity on our endeavors to raise him to a higher civilization, have been the subjects of conversion, and now shake hands with him on common ground, talk familiarly with him of Christian experience, and wish him God-speed in all his efforts of advancement. Thus the great work of the Redeemer advances and the tone of feeling towards the black man changes. While he is persecuted, tormented and oppressed, and his friends hunted like partridges on the mountains, whipped, mangled, tortured, threatened, shot and hung in many parts of this land,—and even among our schools, some of the teachers of which have recently been the subjects of such barbarity,—thou canst but rejoice with me in learning that this moral "desert has been made to rejoice as the rose." . . . . . Alfred H. Jones.

New Vienna, 12th mo. 8, 1869.

My dear friend Wm. J. Allinson,— . . . . I should like to hear more of the Lord's work in different parts. The "Review" is the only channel of communication for our widely scattered Church. George Fox used to ask Friends to inform of the spread of Truth. Why should we not desire the same? I could write much more, but I have written in such a simple, free manner, that I hope it will find place in the "Review."

The Lord's work is prospering greatly in many parts of the West, especially in Cincinnati. The interest commenced with the children, and is reaching all classes. I spent last First-day and Second-day in that city. I found Friends were deeply interested by a special visitation of the Holy Spirit. Several meetings had been held in addition to their usual meetings, wherein several had been engaged in exhortation, prayer and confession. The meetings on First-day were very solemn, and in the morning an aged mother 82 years of age, told in few, beautiful, tendering words of the Lord's dealings with her soul; but the most deeply interesting meeting was on Second-day evening, appointed by our dear friend M. Shipley for the children and their parents, and such others as inclined to attend. At the hour appointed, a large company assembled—not only the children, but all classes and ages. Several Friends were led out in addresses to the children. The little ones were deeply impressed by all that was said: their little hearts were deeply stirred, and many tears were shed. It seemed evident that the blessed Spirit was doing a great work, which reached to the hearts of the mothers and fathers. Many of these were constrained to bow down in fervent prayer and thanksgiving to God. The work went on. Several young men even rose and confessed themselves sinners, and asked the prayers of those who pray; and before the meeting closed, some of the strong men arose in brokenness of spirit and acknowledged that they had been deeply convicted for sin that night, requesting that prayer should be offered for them. Many of the children rose and spoke most beautifully of their love to Jesus, and their desire to follow him all their lives. After the children had been dismissed, we remained and had an interview with the young men and older men who desired to converse with us. This was a solemn time. Many prayers were offered up for those who were asking "what must we do to be saved?"

They also tremblingly approached the throne of grace themselves. Some found peace and deliverance. One said: "I will now go home and burn all my infidel books, and live a new life."

There was no excitement in all this, but a deep work of the Spirit with power upon the heart.

May our prayers go up that the good work may go on, to the glory of God our Saviour. The work in our own meeting is going on, increasing in interest. Last night, at a meeting held at a private house, over one hundred attended. Quite a number resolved, "that as for me, I will serve the Lord." There is also a great work of full consecration going on in the hearts of our members generally. This is one great reason for the prosperity of the cause in our midst. During the past year a new meeting has been set off from this, composed of nearly two hundred members, and still the field widens. Shall we not have the prayers of God's people? If that great apostle needed and asked the prayers of the church, surely then we everywhere, who are gathering souls for Christ, need the same. May peace and great power be given to the church everywhere. J. H. DOUGLAS.

THE MAMMOTH CAVE.

BY CHARLES WILLIAMS.

Back again through the Labyrinth, over its rugged stairways, and threading its romantic ravine, we climb to the higher level once more, and pass further on into the bosom of the earth. The path is broad and smooth, mostly, indeed, filling the entire width of the cave, and the light of our lamps is amply sufficient to protect us from any danger that sight can guard against; yet we are now in a region where a single false step might place us beyond the reach of earthly help, and make us an inmate of the silent darkness till the last trump should sound, and call us up from a more noble mausoleum, than ever human strength or human skill erected in honor of the proudest monarch.

Soon the ground becomes damp and slippery; then a slight depression,—a ditch as it were,—breaks in on the left. It is not deep, but we instinctively shrink from too near an approach. A slip on the soft ground might bring us into inconvenient relations with it. Then a similar depression appears on the right, leaving you treading a narrow rounded ridge. An iron handrail is seen on the left, a few steps in advance. You grasp it with a firm hold, but are careful not to give it too heavy a surge, as it yields to the pressure in the soft and treacherous ground. A few steps further, and you enter upon a bridge, perhaps three feet wide and twenty feet in length. A handrail, not over strong, steadies you on either side. Once on the bridge, the guide suddenly calls a halt, and, stepping out to one side, lights a large taper. The flame shoots upward, and throws a strong illumination all around. "Look aloft," he calls again. There, scooped out of the solid rock, rises a most gorgeous dome sixty feet in height, hung with stalactites, and decorated with all the profusion of ornament, which nature pours forth in her wantonness of beauty.

But where are you standing? Why this bridge? A gully perhaps, damp and muddy, over which it carries you dryshod. When the taper is fairly fired, the guide flings it from him just before you;—it falls almost within your reach. "Now look down," says he. A thrill of horror shoots along your nerves as you watch that flaming brand. It is falling into empty space: into a mass of thick, dense darkness. Down, down it goes, flickering, waving, gliding, as the upward current of the air caused by the flame, acts on the chance curves of the paper, breaking its way through the darkness, and throwing out a gleam of sickly light that feebly illumines the walls of that horrible pit. Still downward, downward still it falls, flaring and flashing in the profound abyss, and dimly revealing strange mysteries, till finally it lights, exhausted and expiring, on the rocks below; and the quivering flame becomes but a sparkle of light, gleaming up through that mass of gross darkness.

It is a fearful experience to lean over that slender handrail, and gaze down,—spellbound with the mysterious horror that throbs in the bosom,—into that dismal den, where the light of the falling brand alone dispels the ever-during gloom. For a brief moment it flares and glimmers in the appalling depths, then dies away and is gone. Darkness fills the mighty void;—darkness that is doubly horrible;—you are standing over the Bottomless Pit. You feel a strong instinct to step lightly until you pass from over that mass of intensely black vacuity and feel once more the solid rock beneath your feet. The Bottomless Pit is one of the strange features of the Mammoth Cave. It is a well, directly in the avenue and occupying its entire breadth, 170 feet deep, 15 to 20 wide, perpendicular, of uniform size, smoothly walled, and perfectly dry. An avenue from some other portion of the cave communicates with the bottom, but visitors are not taken to its wonderful depths.

Beyond the bridge, a few rods brings us to Reveller's Hall. Here the guide points out a narrow crevice in the rock, which he tells us is the entrance to the long route. Thus far, direct from the outer door, by the Giant's

Coffin, and omitting Gorin's Dome, we have travelled the same track with those who go on the more serious pilgrimage of the long route. It is perhaps about two miles from daylight. Our path now leads to the right through Pensacola Avenue; a spacious gallery about a mile in length. Wild Hall, most appropriately named, is one of its chief attractions. The floor is strewn with enormous rocks in utter confusion, among which we wind, like worming our way through the tangled lanes of some great metropolis; the walls are very rough and craggy, and the ceiling spangled with crevices that cut deep into the rock, and run far into the walls on either hand, and the shadows play strange antics along this romantic ceiling, and among the crags and dark, suspicious crevices, giving this hall, perhaps above everything else in the cave, the peculiar character of wild.

At the Great Crossing the cave makes a most wonderful double loop; being crossed, nearly at right angles, by a second gallery of nearly the same size, about twenty feet above the floor, which, however, re-enters the main passage, at a few hundred feet distance on either side. When this crossing is strongly illuminated, it ranks among the most sublime views in the cave. Matt's arcade, a hall named in honor of our guide, has four beautiful terraces between the floor and the roof, projecting far from the walls as if to meet overhead, and the shadows from the ever-restless lights give a beautiful effect as they play among each other, and float along the lofty ceiling. A curious collection of stalactites, called the Pine-apple bush, is found in this arcade.

Once more we retrace our steps to the Main Cave, at the Giant's Coffin; then turning again to the right, proceed a quarter of a mile farther to the Star Chamber. Before reaching it however, we turn a sharp corner, called the Acute Angle. At this point the hall curves almost three hundred degrees, around a sharp point of rocks, without any diminution in its size. Here a bright light is started, and the view from the outer sweep of the curve is very grand, extending down both avenues as far as the eye can reach, till the vision is gradually lost in the thick shades of that stupendous night.

The Star Chamber is one of the most beautiful and impressive scenes in the cave. It lacks the awfulness of Gorin's Dome, and the horror of that bad Pit; but it combines more elements of beauty and grandeur than either. Words cannot describe it; they can only give an outline; and the fancy must fill up the picture, according to its warmth of coloring and boldness of invention. The Star Chamber is a certain portion of the Main Cave, about five hundred feet in length, sixty high, and seventy wide. I will give an accurate outline of its geography, from which its peculiar character can be understood, and partially appreciated.

As we enter it then, we rise a small hill, though it is perhaps not noticed until afterwards used by the guide, in the process of exhibiting the chamber. We are not aware of any change in the character of the mighty hall, through which, by this time, we are carelessly rambling. At the middle of the chamber is a low bench on the right hand side, where the guide seats the party. Just before us, and near the opposite side of the cave, is a ledge of rocks; beyond which is a lower path leading into a secret tunnel, which enters the cave again, several hundred yards back on the path we have just travelled. The walls arch slightly towards the top, and are ornamented with scroll-like cornices that project beyond the general surface; and the ceiling is a vast flat rock of dark limestone, thickly spangled with minute shining points, that pass by courtesy as stars. Now don't imagine them to be diamonds. The diamond ceiling, the glittering columns, and flashing brilliants, so prominent in highly-wrought descriptions of this cave, are found upon examination to exist only in the excited fancy of the writer, except in rare and isolated instances. I travelled the short route twice, and carefully, even anxiously, watched for this gewgaw tinselry, that had mingled with my childish visions of this most wonderful cavern, and saw not one sparkle that could by any possibility be mistaken for a diamond, whatever it might be called. These stars, then, are small sparkles of gypsum adhering to the limestone, which become visible when the lights are properly controlled. The edges of the ceiling and the arched portions of the walls are also thickly sprinkled with this white deposit, arranged in every complicated shape that the fancy could or could not devise: here spattered in tangled lines, entirely destitute of order, and yet bearing an imaginary resemblance to some remembered object; there floating in large masses, like fleecy clouds coming up from the undiscovered sky beyond.

Having seated the party, the guide takes the lights and blows them all out except six, which he carries to produce the splendid effects desired. He now passes off to the opposite side of the cave, behind the ledge of rocks, and a flood of light is thrown upon the gem-spangled ceiling, while the lamps themselves are concealed from view: the clouds seem to float away in the wide expanse above us, the stars twinkle with a pale lustre, so faintly we can scarce distinguish the separate sparkles, while an elongated cloud, far away to the right, is pointed out by the guide as a comet. He now passes further along down the pathway, and the ledge of rocks throws its shadow upward higher and higher, till it partially covers the ceiling. He calls our attention to it as an approaching storm; and the illusion is so perfect, it is difficult to divest ourselves of the idea that a storm is really arising.

(To be concluded.)

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

THE LITTLE SUBSTITUTE.

(Translated from the French.)

Several years ago, when I was teacher in a school at ——, I had occasion to reprove a pupil for his inattention and disobedience. My words failing to produce an effect upon him, I was obliged to resort to punishment, and accordingly I called him up, and commanded him to stand for a quarter of an hour in a corner of the school-room.

As he was going there, a little boy, much younger than the guilty one, came to me and requested that I would allow him to take the place of the lad who had offended. This request astonished me a good deal; however, I was not inclined to put any question to the child, and contented myself with observing to him that if I granted his request, he should pass the whole of the time in the corner, "and," added I, "a quarter of an hour is very long when one must spend it in punishment." These words did not shake him. I then pointed out to him the disgrace which attaches to a child who undergoes punishment, telling him that in the eyes of all the visitors who might enter the school, he would appear a naughty and unruly child. Nothing, however, changed his purpose. He still persevered in his resolution. I then allowed him to take his companion's place in the corner.

I was deeply moved, and I silently prayed to the Lord to give me a little of that wisdom which cometh from above, in order to draw from this incident some instruction, which might be profitable to the souls of the children who were confided to me.

When the quarter of an hour was expired I released the little boy, and asked him if it was his companion who had induced him to take his place.

"No," he replied.

"Do you not think he deserved to be punished?"

"Oh," said he, "he deserved it well."

"What, then, is the motive which has led you to bear this punishment in his place?"

"Because I love him."

What a touching reply! The other children had listened with deep attention to this conversation. I then called the disobedient boy, and ordered him to go in his turn into the corner. At these words there was a clamor of protestations. A multitude of little voices cried out at the same time:

"Oh, sir, that would not be right; that would not be right,"—"nor just either," added one of the boldest.

"Why would it not be just?" replied I, thinking to disconcert the boy who had thus expressed himself. "Has not your schoolfellow disobeyed?"

"Yes, but you have allowed Joseph to be punished in his place; you should not then, on that account, punish him."

My prayer, thought I, was heard; and I continued in these words:

"Does what has just happened recall anything to your minds?"

"Yes," said several voices; "it reminds us that the Lord Jesus bore the punishment of our sins."

"What name would you give to Joseph now?"

"That of substitute."

"What is a substitute?"

"One who takes the place of another."

"What place has Jesus taken?"

"That of sinners."

"Joseph has told us that he wished to take his school-fellow's place, and be punished instead of him, because he loved him. Can you tell me why Jesus wished to die in the place of sinners?"

"It was also because he loved us."

"Repeat a passage from the Bible which proves that."

"The Son of God who loved me, and gave himself for me." (Gal. ii. 20.)

"You told me just now that it would not be right, nor even just, to put the naughty boy in the corner, after having punished Joseph in his place—what instruction may we draw from this fact?"

"We learn from it the assurance that God can never punish any sinner who believes in Jesus Christ as his Saviour;" "and," added quite a little boy, "He will never do so; for the Bible tells us that 'God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son,' in order that 'whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.'" (John iii. 16.)

We talked a long time together on the subject of the grace and love of God. We spoke of Him who "was wounded for our transgressions—who was bruised for our iniquities, and by whose stripes we are healed." (Isaiah iii. 5.)

"Worldly pleasures are no more able to satisfy the soul than the light of a candle to give light to the world."

THE CONFERENCE.

We have had our "days of blessing,"
Owned and ordered by the Lord;
And our grateful hearts o'erflowing,
Long His goodness to record.

Day by day as we have gathered,
We have felt His presence near,
In our midst His voice hath spoken,
And we could not choose but hear.

Those who long have served their Master,
Labored in His harvest field,
Here have borne their faithful witness
To the love to them revealed.

Some who came so heavy laden
With the weary weight of sin,
Who had never looked to Jesus,
Never let Him enter in;

Here have heard the blessed tidings,
That the Saviour "passeth by,"
Here have cried aloud for "mercy"—
And have known Him hear their cry.

And the trembling young disciples
Have been strengthened on their way.
With new love to follow Jesus
As He leads them day by day.

Now we all, with glad thanksgiving,
For the blessing of these days,
Would ascribe to God our Saviour,
All the glory and the praise! S.

Selected.

"EVEN ME."

Lord, I hear of showers of blessing
Thou art scattering, full and free;
Showers, the thirsty land refreshing;
Let some droppings fall on me—
Even me.

Pass me not, O mighty Spirit;
Thou canst make the blind to see;
Witnesser of Jesus' merit,
Speak some word of power to me—
Even me.

Love of God—so pure and changeless;
Blood of Christ—so rich, so free;
Grace of God—so strong and boundless,
Magnify it all in me!
Even me.

Pass me not—Thy lost one bringing;
Bind my heart, O Lord, to Thee;
Whilst the streams of life are springing,
Blessing others, oh, bless me!
Even me.

Professor Wayland on the Right Spending of the First Day of the Week.

Fix a plan for the day, a time for rising, for reading, self-examination and prayer, as well as public worship, and never allow yourself to read secular books or to do any secular business whatever. Be as much as possible alone. No one can estimate the value of a well-spent Sabbath, as a means of moral culture. It arrests the course of worldliness, brings us near to God and ourselves, and strengthens us in all good resolutions.

THE STILL HOUR.

Why fleest thou from solitude? Why dost thou shun the lonely hour? Why passeth thy life away, like the feast of the drunkard? Why is it that to many of you there cometh not, through the whole course of the week, a single hour for self-meditation? You go through life like dreaming men. Ever among mankind, and never with yourselves. * * * You have torn down the cloister, but why have you not erected it within your own hearts? Lo, my brother, if thou wouldst seek out the still hour, only a single one every day, and if thou wouldst meditate on the love which hath called thee into being, which hath overshadowed thee all the days of thy life with blessing, or else by mournful experiences hath admonished and corrected thee, this would be to draw near to thy God. Thus wouldst thou take Him by the hand. But whenever, in ceaseless dissipation of heart, thou goest astray, the sea of the Divine blessing shall surround thee on all sides, and yet thy soul shall be athirst. Wilt thou draw near to God? * * * Then seek the STILL HOUR.—Foreign Preacher (in Phelps' "Still Hour.")

Christian Perfection is the perfection of love, of desire, of effort—not the climax of attainment. A man can never be too righteous to grow, not until a cedar can be too healthy and strong to grow—too full of sap to put forth a new bud, expand a new leaf, start out a new bough, fashion a new cone, and enlarge its own trunk.—Alexander Clark.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—European dates to the 13th inst. have been received.

Great Britain.—The English Ministry has declined to accept the modifications of the treaty of commerce with France, proposed by the latter.

Three Cabinet meetings were held last week, to consider the critical condition of Ireland. The Ministry, it is reported, has resolved to proclaim martial law in Tipperary and Londonderry, and to send 5000 additional troops to Ireland. On the assembling of Parliament, on the 10th prox., a bill is expected to be introduced by the government empowering it to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in Ireland.

The government is to take possession of the telegraph lines on the 1st of Second month next, under the law recently enacted; and it is stated that the Chancellor of the Exchequer finds it not necessary to raise a loan in open market to defray the expense.

An English company is forming to complete telegraphic communication between England and China, by way of India, and to extend it to Australia.

Thirteen iron steamers are in course of construction on the Tyne for the navigation of the Suez Canal.

The ship Monarch, of the British Navy, with the remains of George Peabody on board, was to sail this week for New York. It was to be accompanied by an American vessel.

Ireland.—A large Fenian amnesty meeting was held in Dublin on the 6th, at which speeches of the usual character were made, and resolutions adopted; but all passed off without disturbance.

France.—Some of the recent sessions of the Legislative Body have been excited and stormy. A speech made by a member of the majority, in which he took occasion to defend the coup d'état of 1851, gave opportunity for the Opposition to mske severe replies; and a subsequent speech of the Minister of the Interior, in support of the government, was answered by Rochefort with bitterness, and with offensive allusions to the Emperor, which caused much excitement. At a succeeding session, an Opposition member demanded the impeachment of the Minister of the Interior, which led to scenes of disorder unprecedented in the Chamber.

The Moniteur of the 7th announced that all the Ministers had tendered their resignations to the Emperor.

Italy.—The Œcumenical Council was opened by the Pope on the 8th, with imposing ceremonies. Seven hundred bishops took part in the procession to the hall of meeting. The official list published of persons entitled to attend the Council, comprises 55 cardinals, 11 patriarchs, 927 archbishops, bishops, and abbots, 22 mitred abbots, and 29 generals of religious orders. No political Power has sent a special representative. On the 10th the Pope delivered an allocution, expressing his satisfaction at the assembling of the Council, and his hopes of its action. He has issued a decree providing that in case of his death, the Council shall be dissolved. The business, except the details of organization, has been adjourned till after the 6th prox. (the festival of "Epiphany").

It has been reported that one of the subjects likely to be brought before the Council is the question of declaring the infallibility of the Pope in his official capacity, and to this much opposition is manifested in advance. The French government, it is said, made known to the Council that the question is inopportune in a religious point of view, and politically places France otherwise than according to the Concordat and releases her from the obligations then accepted. In the Spanish Cortes, the Minister of State made a speech forshadowing the policy of the government, and intimating that strong steps would be taken for the protection of Spain in case the Council should adopt measures hostile to her interests.

Spain.—In the Cortes, on the 10th, a bi'l indemnifying exiles under the monarchy was rejected.

Reports were circulated that Gen. Prim contemplates a coup d'état, intending to proclaim the Duke of Genoa as King, and present to the Cortes a law making himself Regent during the Duke's minority, expecting a sufficient vote in the Cortes and the support of the army; but in a speech in that body, on the 14th, he denied the intentions thus attributed to him, but declared his belief that an immense majority of the people are in favor of the Duke of Genoa, and that he will probably be soon proclaimed King.

Portugal.—Fears are entertrined of an extensive rebellion in this country, which the government is taking active measures to prevent.

Russia.—Thn Emperor has granted a concession for the formation of a company with the right to lay a submarine telegraph cable or cables from some point on the coast of Asiatic Russia to China and Japan, the consent of those countries being first obtained.

Egypt.—The Viceroy has acceded to the demands of Turkey, and the difficulty between the two is considered settled.

The Viceroy, in a recent interview with a delegation from Manchester, England, assured them that he was making extensive preparations to increase the cotton crop of Egypt.

DeLesseps, the engineer of the Suez Canal, has denied that the Canal Company needs funds or requires international protection, and promises that all his unfinished work on the canal will be completed without any interruption to navigation. The master of a yacht which was one of the first to pass through the canal after it was opened to commerce, asserts that in its present condition no vessel drawing more than 19 feet can pass safely. A report from the English Admiralty Office says that for 35 miles the canal is liable to sand drifts, reducing its depth, and to thick fogs, bewildering the pilots.

China.—Information has been received from Pekin that the treaty between Great Britain ann China, and also that between the United States and China, negotiated by the Burlingame Embassay, have been ratified by the Chinese government.

South America.—Advices from Rio Janeiro to the 22d ult. have reached Lisbon. The allied army, under the Brazilian commander, had captured another Paraguayan position, and were marching on Iquaterry, said to be the last outpost of Lopez.

Congress.—A large number of bills were introduced in both Houses up to the 13th inst., among which were the following: in the Senate, to amend the Civil Rights bill, so as to extend to all persons within the jurisdiction of a State the equal protection of its laws, and to make colored persons competent to testify in State courts; to prohibit members of Congress from soliciting or recommending appointments to office; to repeal all laws requiring the administration of the test oath; to increase the salaries of the Judges of the U. S. Supreme Court; to fund the maturing debt of the United States in bonds having 35 years to run, payable principal and interest in gold, interest at first 6 per cent., gradually diminishing at specified periods to 4 per cent.; to regulate the importation of immigrants under labor contracts, (evidently designed to prevent the introduction of the coolie system;) to repeal all laws granting the franking privilege, and others. In the House, to repeal the tenure of office act; to abolish the franking privilege; to establish a uniform system of naturalization; to fund the public debt at a lower rate of interest, and make the banking system free; to procure and disseminate periodically information of the amount of the cereal and other crops of foreign countries; to authorize the issue of $44,000,000 additional legal tender notes, to be used in the purchase of gold-interest bonds for cancellation; to provide for the sale of all coin in the Treasury not necessary for paying interest and other demands; to prohibit the sale of coin and provide for the redemption of legal tender notes at par; &c. Three distinct joint resolutions, differing in the language of the preamble, declaring Virginia entitled to representation in Congress, were presented from the Reconstruction Committee, and again referred to it. On a report of the Committee on Elections in the House, four members elect from Alabama were sworn in, viz. Hays, Sherrer, Helfin and Dix. Some progress was made in the consideration of the Census bill, but it was not concluded. A bill relieving a number of persons therein named, of disabilities incurred by participation in the rebellion, has passsd both Houses and been signed by the President.

SUMMARY OF NEWS 287

INDIANS MURDERED WITH IMPUNITY.

So says Gen. Sherman, who may be regarded as speaking authoritatively. It is melancholy to reflect upon the almost universality of the inhuman conduct towards the Red Men which has driven the President to try a novel means of ensuring justice to them. It is greatly to be wished that the whole aboriginal race might be placed under the guardianship of conscientious, peace-loving, just men, who would protect their rights, and by all means at their disposal seek to promote their highest temporal and spiritual interests. The two Superintendencies placed under the charge of uncompromising peace men, will, it is confidently trusted, demonstrate the practicability and expediency of the RIGHT. Meanwhile,—shall not the Government establish and enforce in every Superintendency the same benign and just policy which has been so fully endorsed by the selection of Friends as Agents?

MAJOR-GENERAL ORD, under date of Nov. 1, Headquarters Department of California, has sent a large mass of papers to Gen. Sherman, saying that "such cases as the within are not unfrequent. A harmless Pah Ute Indian boy was murdered in cold blood by a worthless vagabond, a few rods from Camp McDermot, last summer, who escaped. Other similar murders of Indians have occurred in Arizona since I took command of this Department, but the military authorities have no control over such murderers. It would act as a preventive if in such cases the murderers could be arrested by the military authority, and held or turned over for trial by the nearest United States court, and it would give the Indians some little show of equal justice."

Major-General Thomas, in his endorsement of this letter, says: "I can see no better method than to extend civil authority over the Indians now within the settlements, and enable them to appear as witnesses in all cases affecting their own conduct and that of the whites toward them. This affair is a fair instance of the cause of Indian troubles in this military division, and until the white murderers and robbers of Indians are punished, a large force of troops will be necessary to protect the peaceful white inhabitants in the thinly settled regions of the command from Indian revenge. I was present at McDermott a few days after the murder of the Pah Ute referred to by Gen. Ord, and know the excitement produced in the peaceful camp of Pah Utes by the wilful, unprovoked and unpunished murder of one of their number."

General Sherman makes the following endorsement: "This case illustrates the origin of most of the Indian wars on our frontier. A citizen may murder an Indian with impunity, but if the Indian retaliates war results, and the United States must bear the expense."

The Secretary of War concurs in the suggestions of these officers, and recommends additional legislation in the premises.—Associated Press.

JEPHTHAH'S DAUGHTER.

Wherever I have seen or heard the vow of Jephthah alluded to, it has always seemed to be a settled conviction in the writer or speaker's mind, that the fulfilment of that vow involved the real sacrifice of his daughter, as a burnt offering; and I had long since learned to accept this as a fixed fact in Scripture history.

But recently, by the simple and faithful reading of this interesting story, in the English version of the Polyglot Bible, with marginal readings and references, these conclusions have been somewhat disturbed. Jephthah said, (Judges xi. 31,) "Whatsoever cometh forth of the door of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's and I will offer it up for a burnt offering." In the margin I find the word or substituted for and; from which may be inferred that one of two sacrifices should be made.

Again, in the 40th verse, we read, "That the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah, the Gileadite, for four days." In the marginal reading I find the words, "to talk with her," substituted for "to lament." Now, how could they talk with her, if at the end of two months her father had offered her as a burnt offering?—New York Observer.

THOMAS PIERCE.

BY W. C. WRSTLAKE.

Thomas Pierce was born at Portsmouth in 1802, and his parents shortly afterwards removed to Newport, in the Isle of Wight. They made little or no profession of religion, and his early days were passed amongst those who upheld the sceptical opinions of Thomas Paine and his professed followers. We have no written record of his early life, but the knowledge of this circumstance will give us a clue to its general character. "As is the tree so also is the fruit," has been so painfully exemplified in the outward lives of many who have been brought under the pernicious influence of the writings and thoughts of such evil teachers, that we cannot wonder that the youthful history of this our late highly esteemed friend should have been dark in its features and hopeless in future promise. In sketching such a life it therefore becomes the narrator faithfully to record the evil results which sprung from the evil root, and a remembrance of this fact, and of the rough training which he received in this unhallowed school of thought, will enable those who knew him to make allowance for any sternness of manner or dogmatic tone which would occasionally display itself; it will enable us also with a fuller admiration to magnify the power of that divine grace which converted so unpromising and hard a material into "a vessel unto honor, sanctified and meet for the Master's use and prepared unto every good work."

The completeness of this marvellous change in his life and its object, is yet another evidence added to the great cloud of witnesses by which we are encompassed, to the reality of that transforming inward Power, which, apart from human effort (as with the Apostle Paul,) converted him who was before "a blasphemer and a persecutor and injurious," a stranger from the covenant of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world, into a hnmble and obedient disciple of the Lord Jesus. It has been well said that every such transformation is as positive an evidence to a hidden operative force producing it, as the fall of an apple is to the operative force of gravitation. He who would explain either phenomenon can do so only by reeognizing an unseen but self manifesting law. And if we could look yet further and obtain a glimpse beyond the veil of that great multitude which no man can number, who stand as witnesses before the eternal throne, each one ascribing his presence there to the power of Him who was slain and had redeemed them by His blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation, should we not perceive an echo of the same eternal truth, viz: the reality of the operating power of the grace of God on man's heart, and through it upon his actions and life?

Amongst the private memoranda left by Thomas Pierce we find a narrative of the dealings of the Lord with his soul, drawn up apparently some twenty-five years since. The opening pages are so graphic in description, and its first paragraphs are so charged with the message which in his lifetime was so continually upon his lips, the love of God toward lost sinners, that we cannot do better than present this portion of its contents entire. It commences thus:—

"One of the most pleasing texts of Sacred Scripture, and that in which all enlightened minds most cordially and heartily agree is, 'That we love God because He first loved us.' When we look back and trace the various circumstances used in His holy hand to draw us to a knowledge of Himself, what feeling can arise in the heart but one of deep and sacred love? How can we sufficiently adore that Almighty Goodness which even, whilst men were dead in trespasses and sins, caused the Son of His Love to suffer and to die, and that they through Him might live! And He who is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, still pleads for admission into every guilty soul, that He may cleanse and purify, and render it fit for the high and holy purpose for which it was created, even to become the temple of the Living God.

"It appears to me that the above remarks may suitably premise a brief relation of some of the dealings of a good and gracious Lord unto my soul, for I can truly testify that when I was 'dead in trespasses and sins' He was pleased to visit me and draw me in mercy and love to Himself.

"About the year 1824 (being then about twenty-two years of age) on board a ship in the South Seas, the query was raised in my own mind, Why was I created, and for what end was I placed on this earth? which followed me and would not be put aside. I took a retrospect of my past life, and could not but candidly acknowledge that if God had placed me here for a good purpose, I had been living in open rebellion to His will. My residence on board a South-Sea whaling ship for nearly two years had so exceedingly defiled my whole character that the gross sins too common amongst sea-faring men had become mine. I had plunged into wickedness with greediness; profane swearing was common in my conversation, and when I look back on myself at that time I can say with sorrow that I was dead in trespasses and sins.

"As the query followed me and I weighed my conduct by the measure of light I then had, I could not but condemn myself, and I did firmly believe that I had not fulfilled the end of my creation; for I felt satisfied that such a being as myself, endowed with the capabilities which I felt that I possessed, must have been created for the purpose of loving and being grateful to the Creator who made him. I felt deep condemnation for my past conduct, and could not but look toward God as a Being whom I had offended beyond forgiveness, and was really and truly lost! How well can I remember the thick darkness of that day—the dreary prospect before and behind me! The enemy of my soul's salvation was busily persuading me that I was beyond hope; that I had been created for the purpose of glorifying God, but that the whole tenor of my life had been directly opposite, and the sooner I put an end to that life the better. Oftentimes have I looked at the sea with irresolution; the fear of what I should find in the life to come kept me in my burdensome state in this. I suffered this state of mind for some months, and my existence was embittered to me; but in the midst of judgment my God remembered mercy; and although at this distance of time I do not remember what were the circumstances which led me to pray, yet I do remember that I did pray, and that my pillow was often wetted with tears of repentance.

"I did truly and bitterly feel the burden of my sins, without any one on board to sympathize with or comfort me. Those who have walked in the way of truth need not be told that I obtained forgiveness and felt an assurance that my sins were blotted out. Although no living being in the ship could at all comprehend the nature of my change, or sympathize with me, yet I found a companion in an odd volume of Fénélon's works which happened to be on board. It was to me a perfect treasure. I copied on paper a large portion of it, and deeply drank of those truly Christian sentiments which eminently shine forth in his writings."

So remarkable a change during the course of a single voyage—without the aid of man or any outward help, is in itself a mighty testimony to the truth of the doctrine of the immediate visitation of the Holy Spirit to man's heart, convincing of sin and of righteousness and of judgment. The breaking down of the hard and rebellious heart, and the planting of a teachable child-like spirit can be brought about by the Spirit of Christ alone; sometimes with, and sometimes, as we have seen, without any outward instrumentality. Deprived of all human sympathy or counsel, he accepted, as he hereafter tells us, the simple Scripture declaration of God's mercy to fallen man throuh the sufferings and death of the blessed Redeemer as there recorded, and he rejoiced in communion with Him of whom the Scriptures testify. Coming unto Him he found life.

But with his temperament such a blessed discovery could not be kept for himself alone. With that characteristic energy which distinguished him through life, whatsoever his hand found to do he was concerned to "do it heartily and with his might." What was good for himself was surely good for others also; and now to his shipmates, as hereafter amongst the Unitarians, and finally and for the last thirty years of his life amongst the Friends, we find him earnestly and fearlessly bent on imparting to others that which he himself believed to be the truth. But we will continue the narrasive in his own words:—

"I was not long in possession of that peace which results from a knowledge of sins forgiven, before I endeavored to lead my shipmates in the path I had so blessedly trodden; but I had to undergo much ridicule from those around me, and soon obtained the name of 'parson.' But I rose in the estimation of the captain of the ship, who gave me a place of trust, which was lucrative, so that I soon found that 'Godliness is profitable for all things, having promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come.'

"Soon after our arrival in Calcutta, I took ship for England, and arrived safely at my father's house in Newport, I. of W., in the year 1825. He was not willing that I should continue my seafaring life, and set me up in trade; which I accordingly commenced early in 1826.

"Here I would pause, and willingly would I blot out the remembrance of many things which occurred during the succeeding twelve years.

"The wonderful change which had been effected in me was done without the help of man, and at first without books; but now I had the different sects into which the professors of the true Christian name are divided, to contend against. Here the unwearied Adversary of my soul's happiness presented a temptation which overcame me. The first class of professing Christians with whom I became connected were Unitarians. I attended their chapel and read their publications, and at length adopted their sentiments.

"How careful ought to be the steppings of the Christian, and how ever on the watch lest we should become wise with the wisdom of this world and puffed up in our own conceits, and in fear lest He who hath loved us, and pitied us, and helped us, should leave us to ourselves. Hitherto my chief knowledge of religious matters had been a knowledge of myself as a forgiven sinner—that my heart had been utterly defiled by sin and vice, and that it had become in a great measure purified and cleansed. I took the Scripture history of God's mercy to fallen man through the sufferings and death of the Blessed Redeemer as I found it, but delighted mostly in heartfelt communion by prayer to my Heavenly Father. But now my religion became much in my head—new views were proposed and adopted—it was taught me that it was of first consequence to obtain correct and rational views of the nature of Almighty God—that the Scripture account of the redemption by the blood of Jesus shed on the cross, as commonly received and understood, was utterly inconsistent with his attribute of justice—that the commonly received idea of the existence of a spiritual Enemy to man's salvation known by the term Devil, or Satan, was altogether a delusion—that the Blessed Saviour himself was not the being I supposed Him to be, but that He was the son of Joseph and Mary, a man like unto ourselves—that He never had been in glory with the Father, nor knew existence until He was born here.

"I not only believed in the truth of these opinions, but became exceedingly zealous to spread them; and as I chose the light of my reason to walk by in preference to the simple light of truth, I was suffered by a just and holy Saviour to wander in darkness."

(To be continued.)

[A Meeting of the "First-day School Conference of Friends of Philadelphia" was held in the Locust St. House on Fourth-day evening, Twelfth mo. 8th, 1869. An Essay on Object Teaching in classes, and one upon the Needs of the First-day School Teacher, (which is given below,) were read, and elicited very interesting remarks upon the important topics presented. Those disposed to devote a portion of their time and talents to the service of our Heavenly Master in this work, were encouraged to be faithful to the pointings of duty, and invited to come for strength, patience and ability to the great Source of all good, the Giver of every perfect gift.—Communicated.]

THE NEED OF THE TEACHER.

How often we hear the complaint from a First-day school teacher—"I have no power over my class; I cannot interest them." Will it not be well if we can meet this need?

Many are the suggestions made, some of them very valuable, as to the best manner of gaining the attention of the class. Those who have used "Object lessons" in their classes find that the simple piece of card-board and lead pencil will at times aid them very greatly, in gaining the interest of unruly scholars. We know how much more easily an impression is conveyed to the mind through the eye than through the ear, how much more willing a little child is to listen to a story about a picture, when the picture is before it, —how it craves an explanation.—and also, how the least discrepancy between the picture and the explanation will be noticed. Then—as the impression made through the eye seems more ineffaceable from the mind than that made through the ear, let the teacher see that he makes no error, and that he teaches only truth. Well has it been reverently said by one lately, "we need as much the guidance of the Holy Spirit in 'object-teaching' as in anything else." Yet, after all has been done to aid the teacher—how often we hear the same complaint—"I have no power over my class."

We may do all that human ingenuity can do to make our schools all that well-ordered schools should be,—we may attend to minor matters, till the discipline of the school is faultless,—but is this all? Have we not all looked, when we were children, at some stamping-machine for making the impression on coins at our Mint, when it stood motionless? A beautiful piece of machinery, polished in every part,—every piece of brass shining in its proper place,—every screw in order,—and the little pieces of gold were there, in their appointed places too. And have we not wished that it might be set in motion, so that we might see those smoothly polished pieces, as they came under its influence, pass away each with the face impressed upon it? Was anything wrong about the machine? No. It was all complete, but motionless—accomplishing nothing. It was powerless in itself to accomplish anything. It needed something in order to make it work rightly. Is there not some danger of First-day schools being like these great stamping-machines? We need power to move the machine.

May we not gather instruction on this point from the dying words of a Christian, not long since taken to her heavenly rest? "A heart wholly consecrated to Jesus is the only true source of power for Christian work."

Let us look again at our stamping-machine. Suppose day after day it is still motionless, and we are waiting for results, and see none, —where would we go to remedy the evil? We ask, "Is the furnace all right?—has it any flaws in it?" Perhaps not, but there is no fire in it—there is the secret.

Is not this a fair picture of the heart of the unconverted teacher? His heart, like that furnace, may look well to the outward eye, but there is no fire there. It may be warm, from other furnaces being near it, but it has no fire of its own. There is no power there.

But some young teacher may object that, knowing the "heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked," it cannot be that the human heart has much to do with this great work, where the power is wholly from God. We do certainly admit that the whole power is from God,—but it is for the working of that power, through these hearts of ours, cleansed by the atoning blood of Christ, that we are responsible.

Let us look again at the stamping-machine. Suppose that all the time while the machine was accomplishing nothing,—in the open courtyard of the Mint, where it might be seen from every window,—a great warm fire was burning brightly—a power which, if rightly used, instead of neglected, would have moved every polished wheel and massive shaft with ease,—would that have helped our stamping machine, unless some of the 'live coals" had been carried into the furnace, and the fire had been kindled there?

Dear young teachers—you who feel the great need of power over your classes, you who may have put your hands to the work not realizing its solemn importance,—to you this day God offers a power which nothing can stand before, if you will but have Christ for your Saviour, if you will but consecrate yourselves to Him. You are either "for" Him, or "against" Him—which is it?

If you accept His offer, look at the promise given by the Saviour to His disciples of old: "Verily, verily I say unto you, he that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do, because I go unto my Father."

Into your hands precious little souls have been committed, to be stamped with the likeness of the Master; will you, instead of accepting the appointed power for your work, think, by the feeble though faithful efforts of your hands, to make an impression which requires far greater strength than you can possibly have in any other way but through Christ? You do desire to see great works done in your schools; when did Jesus ever refuse those that came yielding everything to Him, in faith? One sad record have we left us of His days on earth—where it was said of one place where He would have shown His power:—"He did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief."

And now, an honest word to Superintendents,—not a fault-finding word, but a solemn, earnest question to you who have so fully our prayers and our earnest desires for a blessing on your part of the work. We ask you to answer it, not to us, but to your God. What should we have thought, during the late war, of an officer in the Union army, who had entrusted the most important despatches of his commander, with one who belonged to the rebel army? What must God think of the Superintendent who will trust the most important message He ever sent to this earth in the hands of one who carelessly stays enrolled under the banner of the enemy,—whose heart is still on the enemy's side? Solemn indeed is the estimate of the Lord Jesus for such as these:—"He that is not with me, is against me; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth abroad."

Is it any wonder, when such is the case, that the warfare is often accompanied with such uncertain and unsatisfying results?

From the London Friend.

BENARES.

"39, Sudder Bazaar, Benares, Tenth Month 27th, 1869.

"Dear Friends: We greet you in the love of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, before whom we bow with reverence and with gratitude, acknowledging the love and mercy vouchsafed to us during our voyage to this place, where we arrived on Seventh-day morning, the 23d instant. During the whole of this long journey we had remarkably fine weather and calm seas, no interruptions by adverse winds, and but very little sickness. Our route may be easily traced by drawing a line on the map from Marseilles, passing between the islands of Corsica and Sardinia, thence between Cape Spartivento (the extreme southern coast of Italy) and the island of Sicily, thence a little south of Candia to Alexandria, thence to Suez via Cairo, thence to Aden and direct to Bombay, thence per railway to Nagpore (519 miles), thence to Jubbelpore by horse dak (162 miles), thence per railway to Allahabad and Benares.

"The whole group of islands lying north of Sicily has been subject to volcanic eruptions, which seem to have burst the bed of the sea and shot forth from the bowels of Mother Earth the lava that now forms most, if not all these islands, which appear to be a mixture of many kinds of stone, towering hundreds of feet above the level of the sea. A few miles northwest of Mount Etna there is one whose top has for a long time been covered with smoke, which issues from its crater. This appeared to us more grand than the older and larger Mount Etna, probably from our having a more distinct view. There is so little soil on any of these islands that comparatively nothing is grown. Most of them are inhabited by Italian and Turkish fishermen, who often are at war with each other, and sometimes capture small sailing vessels that happen to be in these parts in storms.

"The steamship Nyanza is 2,082 tons burden, commanded by Capt. J. Weeks. We were five days eight hours making the trip to Alexandria. Before the ship cast anchor we were surrounded by Arabs, who kept up such an incessant holloaing in the Arabic that our ears were not clear of ringing for hours. One of these fellows was sent by the proprietor of Abbat's Hotel with a note to us, stating that our lodging there had been engaged by some Friends a few days before. We sent our baggage by coolies, and he piloted us through the city to the hotel, which we were very glad and thankful to reach. As is the custom here, we had a cup of coffee at 7 A. M., breakfast at 12, and dinner at 7 P. M., then fight mosquitoes till 11, then go to bed for a night's repose; but the constant whooping and yelling of the Arabs kept us awake till near daybreak.

"Seventh-day, 9 A. M., we engaged a dragoman who can speak a little English to pilot us through the city. We first made the acquaintance of a few English merchants; then called to see Dr. Yule, a Scotch missionary resident here, who received us cordially and desired me to preach for him the next evening, which I was not warranted to undertake. We visited the Egyptian Cemetery and Pompey's Pillar. A circuitous route brought us to the canal, which is fed from the Nile. On its banks grow reeds, flags, and bulrushes—probably very like what the ark was made of for little Moses. The roads are nicely shaded by trees. The dust is about two inches deep, and is constantly flying in the air, which, with the hot glaring rays of the sun, is very trying to our eyes. The Pasha's gardens are very large, well watered; the dates and bananas abound in them, besides a great variety of shrubs and flowers, very beautiful. There are many large lizards on the trees. As we pass along the streets, we see the women grinding at the mills, reminding us of the passage, 'The one shall be taken and the other left.' We also see many broken cisterns, that will hold no water. We are struck with the manner of drawing water from the wells. The machinery is certainly very rude and ancient—a kind of endless chain made of ropes and bits of wood, to which are fastened a great many pitchers, and, as the oxen turn the windlass, these pitchers dip full of water, and when at the top empty their contents into a stone trough or waterpots. Some of the latter will hold twenty to thirty gallons. Another curious thing is the great leathern bottle still in use in oriental countries. They are mostly of goat-skins, and when full of water look in shape like the animal from which they were taken. Men carry these great bottles to sprinkle the streets, supply houses, &c. The streets are miserably narrow and dirty, and abound with dogs, that sleep in the day and howl like wolves at night. As in France, the shops are open on the Sabbath; a great many, however, go to some place of worship. There is the old Copt church, the members of which are quite numerous in Egypt, and more simple in their faith and worship than many others. The Mohammedans are most numerous: we often see them at their devotions. They stand and repeat some part of the Koran; then bow three times, repeating more. They get upon their hands and knees, kiss the earth, then rise, make several gestures, put their heads to the ground three times, look up and say, 'O Allah!' twice, bow again and kiss the earth, and say, 'Imene.'

"At 8 A. M. on First-day we had a meeting with a few Arabs and others, which was a very solemn, precious time. A Syrian interpreted for us. We attended the services of the American and Scotch missionaries stationed here: the former was conducted in Arabic, the latter in English. The American Mission School is in a flourishing state, and doubtless many of the young are being taught a knowledge of the Lord Jesus. At Ramle we had a precious season in prayer at W. T. Emmens', who was a member of the Church of England, but is in principle very much of a Friend. He was very loving and kind to us. Our time has been closely occupied here at Alexandria for three days, and with hearts uplifted to God for preservation, we proceed by railway for Cairo. The line of railway is up the valley of the Nile, which probably is the most fertile in the world. In this valley is the land chosen by Joseph for his father and brethren. . . .

"Soon after our arrival in Benares we were met by our dear friend Rachel Metcalfe, who gave us a cheerful welcome and escorted us to 39 Sudder Bazaar, which she has taken no little pains to make comfortable for us. It is admirably adapted to our mission, and I hope we may be able to retain it. We have not got over the fatigue of our long journey, but hope soon to be ready for such duties as may devolve upon us in this new field of service. We intend soon to engage a moonshee to instruct us in the language, and can do but little mission work until we understand it more thoroughly. I long to be able to speak to this people in their native tongue of the glorious news of salvation through Christ Jesus, God's well-beloved Son.

"Some of the missionaries here have called to bid us welcome and God-speed, and we hope to find them agreeable co-workers in the spread of the truth as it is in Jesus. We certainly feel our unworthiness and inability of ourselves to do any good thing, but God has been our helper and strength hitherto. Unto Him we feelingly commend ourselves and all our dear friends, specially those who have so kindly aided us in our arduous undertaking. . . . ELKANAH BEARD."

For Friends' Review.

It is interesting to watch the progress of religious liberty, and the spread of the gospel in different lands. The following letter, taken from the Poughkeepsie Eagle, shows that a wide field for Christian labor is opening in Spain. May we all remember the command given by the blessed Lord to His disciples, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." And may all of us, who have felt the love of God shed abroad in our hearts, be enabled to lay every thing at the feet of Jesus—labor, time, money, influence—with the query, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" As we do this, and are favored to teach and to preach the whole Gospel, which includes, "Peace on earth, good-will to men," we may expect the nearer fulfilment of the prophecy, "The knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea," and "Of the increase of His government and peace there shall be no end." EVANGELICAL WORK IN SPAIN.

Many friends of Rev. Wm. J. Knapp, formerly professor of languages in Vassar College, will be interested in the following letter from him, which we copy from the N. Y. Examiner and Chronicle. It is dated Madrid, Sept. 16, 1869.

"I came into Spain this time not knowing where to settle. There was the South, Andalusia, the North, Barcelona, and the Centre, Madrid—the whole land was before me. I bought my tickets from Paris only to Bayonne, near the boundary, thinking I would hold myself loose, so that Providence might guide me. Thence I crossed into Spain with a silent prayer, and proceeded almost station by station till I reached Alsasua, in the Basque Province. Here there is a branch road to Barcelona, and I thought I would go there first, and commence on a small scale. But going to the ticket office, I found there had been some misarrangement between the companies, so that for the day there was no train. There was, therefore, no other course than to pursue my way direct to Madrid, which I did. In about two weeks' study of the situation, I soon saw what was needed, but where the money was coming from I did not know. I proposed to hire several halls, capable of holding from 150 to 200 people, in different wards of the city, so as to evangelize those whom God brought to me, and to gather the children into schools. After some time spent in examining the question, I found the extravagant prices of Madrid would drive me into the lower wards, where the people of the roughest class swarmed. I finally got ready and laid the matter before the Lord. Where the money was to come from I could not conceive, for it would cost about $5,000 a year, in gold, to carry out my proposal. I had a short time before written to London to an excellent English brother, exposing the state of Spain, and some of the weak points of the mission work here, and how I desired to establish ward stations for preaching nightly to the people, and instituting free schools for the poor children and adults who cannot read. In thirty days from the time I wrote that letter, over £125 ($625 gold) was sent to me by that brother, in various sums ranging from £2 to £30. He had printed my letter, and sent it around to private friends, and this was the result. Lords, earls, bankers, clergymen and ladies sent their donations, and I was enabled to plunge at once into the work. I found great difficulty in securing a locale, or hall, on account of the disturbed state of the country, and I always told the administrator of the house I wanted a place for Protestant meetings. At last, after two weeks' search, God opened a door. In one of the worst wards of Madrid, the famous Barrio de Toledo, a terrible murder had recently been committed and the house was abandoned. I passed there one day in my search, and saw what a fine hall it had, large enough for 200 souls. The landlord was delighted to rent it for any purpose, because no private family dared live there. I at once took it, hired too stout persons to live in it, keep it in order and preserve the property. These persons had been converted by my agency, (for several weeks prior to this, I had been holding six meetings a week in private houses without expense.) So I had my benches made, bought my lamps and the paraphernalia of a mission station, fitted up one of the rooms as a Bible and Tract Depot, and stocked it. I issued my circulars, and got the people together. They came in this gradation:

"First night, 30, second, 50, third, 60, fourth, 160, and since then 200, with many standing, and boys outside holding on to the rejas or iron bars of the balconies. I organized a Sunday school of 150 boys and girls, and have two nights a week dedicated to teaching 200 children of both sexes how to sing our American hymns, and reading the gospel in large print. At last my children's school became so large, and it was so wearing on me to keep them quiet—a thing they had never been taught to be—that I was compelled to divide them into sections, and give them cards of admission, so that those who possess white cards with "admit the bearer" printed on them, come on Tuesday nights, and those with red cards come on Friday, while all come on Sunday—a day on which we are not troubled, because it is at 11 o'clock in the morning, and most of the poor boys are too busy to come. More than an hour and a half before the time, the people fill the narrow street, waiting for the outer doors to be opened, and whenever I make my appearance, the children rush to get hold of my hands, so that I am rather borne on the door by the impetus of the throng. While I am writing, the children passing my window (for I am at the station to-day,) are singing "I'm a pilgrim, I,m a stranger," Voya al Cielo, soy peregrino," &c. in broken fragments, and thus I have a constant satisfaction of knowing the seed is there. On four nights in the week I do not admit children, but give all the room to adults. I have 200 regularly, old men and women, many of the latter with babes on their bosoms, wrinkled, faded and weary with the cares of life. I have an Evangelist (a Spaniard) to help me, and many times while he is preaching, I have to retire into my office and weep, for my heart is too full to endure it or to restrain myself before the people. The work on my hands is nothing short of a marvel, and I know not where it will end. The people are exceedingly grateful, and often express themselves so, and hope I will be blessed. Since I have organized this mission station No. 4, I am looking for another locale in a neighboring ward. The people of that ward had sent to me to know why they could uot have a "chapel" too, as well as the San Cayetano district. I went over to see them a few days ago, to know whether it was really so, and oh, it would have broken your heart to have seen the entreaties of women and girls, gathering around me, and begging me to come there. So I have got my agents out to find the Lord's house among them. I have also lately had a large Republican hall offered me for a moderate rent in a most populous ward. It will seat 1,500 people, and 15,000 could easily be got together in the present state of Madrid. I have been to see Mr. Carrasco, the popular preacher here, and he has consented to preach in it once on the Sabbath. So I am waiting for the Lord to send the money for that, and I shall take it, for I can there also establish a monster Sunday school, and witness to the people in great numbers. My present hall, that is now in full operation, is doing the following work: Preaching the gospel to two hundred people four times a week, giving religious and elementary training to two hundred children three times a week—in all, by this means alone, four hundred people are being reached and nourished with food from on high. In the Lavapies district, I expect next week to have Station 2 going on. With the aid of Evangelists at a fair salary, I can thus enlarge and superintend a very extensive work, according as God blesses my labors. The toil is immense, but God will raise up friends so as to relieve me of many anxieties which need not press upon me.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, TWELFTH MONTH 25, 1869.

To-day.—The readers of the Review probably need no additional argument to show that the sentiment which credits the birth of our Lord on the day, of which the present date is the anniversary, is without foundation, even in plausibility. We do not accept a Pope's appointment for a special religious observance: yet the knowledge is pressed upon us, that throughout Christendom the thoughts of mankind are dwelling upon the incarnation of the Word—on the three heavenly mottoes of the angelic anthem which welcomed the advent of the Babe of Bethlehem. Can we be thoughtless respecting that which is a subject of thought all around us? Whatever brings more closely to mind the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world, should intensify our love for Him who first so loved us. If we walk the streets thronged with the multitudes of them that keep holiday, let it be done circumspectly, with believing hearts and with the feeling that to us Christ is precious.

White unto Harvest.—Considerable attention has been given in the Review to the Chinese question, yet we would not willingly lose sight of it. Few topics are more important to the patriot, the political economist or the Christian philanthropist. That they will form a numerous class of our population seems certain. That they may become the predominant race appears possible. Professor Pumpelly says:

> "The teeming population of our hemisphere two or three centuries hence, may have more Chings and Changs in their genealogical trees than Smiths and Browns."

These people are heathens, but they are civilized and have a literature, and are capable of moral and religious elevation. They are impressible, and are ready to receive Christian instruction with alacrity. What is the duty towards them of Churches and of Church members? If we let them alone, their standard of morality may be lowered by association with vicious Anglo-Saxons. If Christians do not care for their souls and step between them and cruel avarice, they will think our religion a false one bearing evil fruits, and will cling with increased affection to Confucius and Tien, Lochu and Buddha, and, as they strengthen and fortify themselves in sectarianism, Pagan sects will gain firm footing in our vaunted Christian land.

Every month of delay must render the Chinese problem more difficult. There is immediate need for thousands of First-day school teachers, imbued with the constraining love of Christ, to enter into a mission work of almost inconceivable magnitude. These emigrants, parents and children, should be collected as quickly as possible after their arrival; they should be treated with kindness, wisely advised even in their temporal interests, and lovingly taught in the things pertaining to salvation. Teach, and, if the Divine blessing attend (which it will if devoutly sought,) Christianize those who are here already; their influence will be favorable to the new comers, and it will soon become a natural thing for successive adventurers to fall into the open arms of Christian friends, waiting to receive them with the salutation, "Come with us and we will do you good." It is a startling and affecting consideration, how much depends upon promptness in this labor of love. How much good may be done, and how much evil prevented! Shall supineness on the part of the Church cause the United States of America to be, to a large extent, a Heathen nation? What are Church members about? Are they biting and devouring one another? Are they lengthening the cords and strengthening the stakes of sectarianism, forgetful that "one is our Master, even Christ, and all we are brethren?" Are they watching their fellow-members with critical jealousy, misconstruing their language to make apparent differences which do not exist? Are they wasting the time and talents which belong to their Divine Master, who has bought them with a price, and suffering His service to remain unperfomed? We do not wish preachers to run unsent, nor servants to choose for themselves their department of labor. But surely here is a great duty that has fallen upon this generation, well worthy the prayerful deliberation of the Church collectively and of individual Christians. There is a work to be done,—there are servants enough to perform it; and if the eyes of these are turned to the Master, He can qualify, appoint and send forth such a host of messengers of glad tidings, that, as they shall swarm over the mountain ranges which divide us from the Pacific slope, the cry will go up with even more impressiveness (if possible) than from the mouths of Isaiah and of Paul: "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion—thy God reigneth."

Since the above was in type we notice the unanimous passage by the Presbytery of Pittsburg, of resolutions asserting the special claim of the Chinese in California upon the sympathies of American Christians,—the "unmitigated disapprobation and disgust" with which the Synod regard the treatment they have received,—and the clear duty of the Presbyterian Church, (we should say of every Christian Church,) to provide, in Scriptural and day schools, instruction suited to their peculiar circumstances. Let all Christian men, women and churches lay it to heart.

"White to the harvest the vast fields are waving;
Where are the giant harvesters?—Alas,
In Mammon's service now ignobly slaving
Or treading devious ways, their hours they pass:
Or, entering rudely with misguided rigor,
As lords, not servants, in God's heritage,
Upon their fellow-servants waste their vigor
And prostitute their heavenly embassage.
Thus servants called, equipt and heaven-anointed,
Scatter the harvest they were sent to gather,
Forgetful that in love they were appointed
To bind in sheaves."

The Anarchy of the Ranters.—At the date of Robert Barclay's treatise with this title, there was a sect so called, who by forced deductions from Scripture justified themselves in various extravagances. In 1654, George Fox judged and confuted a company of these people. Soon after this followed the fanaticism of John Perrot, and 30 years later that of Keith; and many times since, individuals who had been professors of truth, have, through unwatchfulness and excitement, left the peaceable Spirit and wisdom of Jesus, and plunged into confusion of which God is not the author, and into anarchy. Witness the lamentable excesses in New England early in the present century, and subsequent schisms and subdivisions in Ohio, Pennsylvania and elsewhere, by which has been broken that "pure unity of the Spirit," than which, says Robert Barclay, "there is no greater property in the Church of Christ." The preventive and the remedy are to be found in Christian humility clinging to the Cross. "The spirit of a sound mind" is one of the good gifts of our Heavenly Father, and those who are in Christ will experience the healthful influence.

Times of revival in the Church are seasons of danger to those who, with hearts untouched by the Divine influence, are, like Simon the Sorcerer, ambitious to work miracles. How apt the simile of Jude: "Clouds without water carried about of winds—trees whose fruit withereth." Some reproachful instances of anarchy in our Western country (of which the Church will clear herself,) and of "unbecoming behaviour" during public worship farther eastward, tend equally to show the wisdom and safety of subordination to discipline and Christian order, "submitting one to another in the fear of God." The anarchy which Barclay condemns may be found in directly opposing extremes, while the genuine fruits of the Spirit (may we know them by experience, not merely by Paul's beautiful description,) are found in the members of a living Church, which, compacted by that which every joint supplieth, edifies itself in love.

DIED.

PYLE.—At the residence of his father, in Wabaunsee Co., Kansas, on the 5th of Twelfth mo., 1869, Thomas Henry, son of David S. and Sarah T. Pyle, (the latter deceased,) in his 19th year; a member of West Union Monthly Meeting, Indiana. He was subjected to extreme suffering from the crushing of his foot in the horse-power of a threshing machine, which he endured unmurmuringly, saying that the Lord had permitted his misfortune to wean him more fully from the world. Through the grace and good spirit of God, he had experienced true conversion of heart, and the seed which had been sown in good ground bore fruit to his Redeemer's praise. A few days after he was hurt, his faith was sorely tried by doubts, but after wrestling in prayer, he was enabled, through faith, to lay hold of the promises, and to say, "Get behind me, Satan." His faith never again failed him, but thenceforward he was enabled to bless and praise the most holy and excellent Name of God, for the many blessings bestowed upon him. Frequent and fervent were his prayers for sustaining grace under all his trials, and that the Lord by His Holy Spirit would continue to be at all times present with him. The burden of every prayer was, "Thy will, O God, and not mine, be done." At one time when conversing with his father on the subject of baptism, after quoting several texts of Scripture relating to the subject, and making remarks as to their meaning, he paused a few moments, and then remarked: "Oh, I don't need any water to be applied to me: the blood of Jesus has washed away my sins, through the operation of the Holy Ghost upon my heart. God has forgiven all my sins, not for any good that I have ever done, but by His mercy, through the suffering of His dear Son on the Cross." His many prayers were mercifully granted, and after taking an affectionate leave of each member of the family, and giving them good advice, as his last legacy of love, he said, "Tell all my distant relatives and friends that I am dying happy, and I want them all to meet me in Heaven." His last words were, "I thank thee, Lord Jesus, that thou hast come to take me home."

BETHANY MISSION.

The Anniversary Exercises will be held at the School-house, Brandywine Street above Fifteenth, on Third-day, Twelfth month 28th, at 3 o'clock.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PERQUIMANS Co., N. C., 12th mo. 2d.—Our Select Quarterly Meeting was a favored one, ministers and elders feeling that help and counsel had in truth been sent; and while the several exercises varied in their bearing, yet they all did speak the same language, and out of the mouths of four witnesses the truth was confirmed. An Epistle designed to embrace the exercises of the Select Yearly Meeting was read, we trust, to our profit. Our Quarterly Meeting was a very lively and instructive one, holding until nearly 5 o'clock. Not many realized that they were weary, for that which was more than meat or rest had been spread among us. There was a large congregation on First-day forenoon. Two ministers were concerned to gather those out of doors who could not obtain seats. In the house, Thos. B. Nichols and M. Newsom were employed in their Master's service. Both meetings were acknowledged to be seasons of favor. On that afternoon meetings were held for the colored people at their meeting-house, and again the Head of the Church was near to strengthen, anoint and bless. There were also evening appointments at school-houses, said to be satisfactory.

NEWBERRY, S. C., 12th mo. 10th.—[Isham Cox writes:]—Under an apprehension of religious duty, Edward Young and I left High Point, N. C., on the morning of the 6th inst., reaching Columbia, S. C., that P. M., and through the kind assistance of our worthy friend, Sidi H. Brown, Editor of the Christian Neighbor, we met at 7 o'clock a respectable and attentive audience, with whom the gospel of the Prince of Peace was preached as ability was afforded. Leaving another appointment for a meeting this evening at the same place, we proceeded to Newberry, where we had a satisfactory meeting in the Methodist house of worship, on Third-day evening, the 7th inst. On Fourth day we were kindly assisted in getting over to the old Bush River Meeting-House, formerly occupied by Friends. Finding the house in a dilapidated condition, we assembled in the yard with about seventy-five or eighty persons, many of whom were the descendants of Friends. The object of the meeting was briefly explained, and immediately a solemn quiet was sensibly felt to pervade the whole assembly. A blessing was invoked upon the effort of the hour, when an effort was made to worship where the Fathers had in days of yore held sweet communion in the presence of the Lord. It was a cementing, tendering time. That evening we were met by a few persons at the house of our friend, Benjamin R. Scott, where we had a precious meeting, realizing it to be a near approach to the throne of God. On Fifth-day we had a crowning, tendering time, at a Methodist Meeting House, a few miles distant. We trust that it may please the great Head of the Church to turn the feet of His anointed ones again and again towards this part of His vineyard, that the waste places of Zion may be restored, and that our branch of the Church may again prosper in this land, judges and counsellors being raised up as at the beginning.

From the London Friend.

MADAGASCAR.

My dear Friend, Robert Charleton: Since the departure of our last letters, we have seen a decided improvement in the appearance of my dear wife—her appetite continues good, and she has nearly regained her usual strength. Still I feel we cannot yet speak very confidently about her state. We have been cheered, since I last wrote, by the arrival of two separate mails, bearing good tidings from our friends in distant lands; the first being the mail then overdue, and the other the one in due course for this month.

We have been glad to hear that our dear friends in England felt disposed to make an addition to the donation which came from America, to assist in the publication of the Bible in this country, since by so doing a better machine has been secured to the Mission. To some it may have appeared more desirable for us to have had a small printing press of our own, so as to be independent of the London Missionary Society; but I do not think either party will lose anything by having our interest a little united. So long as we are able to work together in as good a degree of harmony and mutual forbearance as has been the case hitherto, with very little exception, whatever tends to make our interests one must be regarded with favor. For, thereby, both are made gainers, since united work tends to rub off our sectarian prejudices, and we are helped to look more with a single eye to Christ and His glory, and to cast off some of our selfish aims. To some of the agents of the L. M. S., in particular, we do feel very nearly united, and, as kindred spirits are wont to do, we often meet to mingle our sympathies and prayers together. I have never, however, more thoroughly felt the Scriptural soundness, both of principle and practice, of our own religious Society, on certain of the subjects on which we chiefly differ from our brethren, whose views are of a different cast, than has been the case since our sojourn in this land. At the same time, I have never more largely felt the cementing power of the love of God, which, in all our diversities, still binds our hearts together, prompting, to a very great extent, unity of action, both as a matter of principle and of policy. And this unity of action also affords us an opportunity for the mutual exercise of Christian courtesy. If our own religious body had first planted a mission in some distant station on this great island, and had been largely blessed with success in turning many to embrace the saving truths of the Gospel, and the work had fairly outgrown our own ability to carry it on, I am sure that in receiving any proffered help from the "Independents," we should expect them to stand with ourselves upon the broad platform of a common Christianity, rather than to raise a separate one from which to proclaim their peculiar views. As in this instance, the case is just the reverse, it is, and has often been a prayer of mine to have that grace afforded us which will enable us, without any compromise of principles, so to observe our stepping stones, as to work only as Christians and for the glory of God.

. . . . It has ever been a principle of the first importance, advocated by the members of our Society from its rise to the present time, to cultivate and prize a tender conscience, and to yield a ready obedience to every conviction of religious duty. . . . And as we are obliged to deal with things as they are, and not as we should desire to have them had the moulding influence been under our own control, I know of no safer watchword for those whose path of duty is in a similar line to ours, than those words of the Apostle, "I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and Him crucified."

With a message of love and Christian regard, very affectionately thy friend,

THE MAMMOTH CAVE.

BY CHARLES WILLIAMS.

Having given us time to admire this beautiful scene deliberately, he slowly moves forward, and the light gradually fades away, till finally he enters the covered passage, and darkness and gloom gather around. Still the bright light streams out from the mouth of the tunnel, and plays its beautiful freaks among the fretted rocks, and along the frosted ceiling. The beauty of the scene is utterly indescribable. It seems to deepen in interest, and increase in grandeur, as the darkness thus settles around us, while bright streams of light play in other portions of this mighty hall. Then a voice comes from the guide that startles us with a sudden thrill. He calls out in clear, distinct tones, "Well, good bye, take care of yourselves;" darts behind a projecting rock, and every trace of light vanishes away. Then we are enveloped in more than Egyptian darkness; a darkness to which the blackest midnight would be a glow of delightful radiance. Oh, the solemn awe of that unexpected night! What a thrill of undefined emotions springs up into startling activity, as this absolute blackness settles down upon us! What solitude! What silence, profound and overpowering! What a gush of solemn thoughts came pouring through my bosom as I felt myself thus identified with the majesty of "Chaos and Old Night!" What a place to commune with thy own heart, in the silence of all flesh, and be still!

Several minutes pass in this absolute silence, this ebon darkness. We become accustomed to the sense of vacancy: the optic nerve quivers perhaps for a few seconds, with the last faint pulsations of the vanished streams of light, but soon settles into perfect rest, and not even the phantom of an ideal image can be made to float before the eye. But now look to the left! Far, far away in the distance, along the hall through which we entered, we discover the faintest possible glow of light; the first blush of returning day just glimmers with doubtful beams. Slowly it brightens; it expands. Can it be that the darkness is breaking away? Can it be that the dense and oppressive veil which covers us, is losing a shade of its awful obscurity? Still it brightens; the light now fills the distant portions of the hall, and faintly plays along the lofty ceiling; slowly and gradually revealing the more prominent features of the scene around us. Then the sun appears, just hovering on the verge of the horizon, where he glows and flashes with dazzling lustre, and almost blinds us with the splendor of his newborn glory. It is the guide again approaching us; and he stops just where the brow of the hill over which we had passed, permits us to see the full flash of the lights. Our eyes, so long bathed in the thick shades of that impenetrable blackness, are exquisitely sensitive to the light, and the feeble glimmer of the lamps,—for it is no more,—is compared, without apparent exaggeration, to the full light of day.

We have now completed the short route, and it only remains to return to the entrance, a mile and a quarter away. We once more lighted our flambeaus, and I took the lead in our outward march. I desired to leave the party, and enjoy a quiet ramble to myself; so hastened on till the glimmer of their lights was just perceptible in the distance; and then fell into a dreamy reverie. The experience of the day had been so widely different from the former phases of my life, that I scarcely realized my situation. The fancy, kept in a constant state of tension, had become perhaps morbidly active, and was busy among scenes and objects far away. I lost all consciousness of being in the cave as I gazed upon the limestone clouds above me, and fancied myself rambling down some deep, romantic gorge, in the silence of night's solemn hours, the cliffs on either hand rising in fearful grandeur, and the clouds above my head floating in the blank and leaden-colored sky. I was treading the deep defiles of some rocky mountain pass, away in the cloud-land of Fancy's wide domain.

I know not how long I was absorbed in this delightful reverie, and I was recalled to consciousness by stumbling over some rocks that obstructed my pathway. I looked back to see if the party was coming, but all was silence and darkness. I had hurried on till they were left far in the rear. There I was, alone in this wonderful cave. Had I gone astray? Had the party taken another course? I listened and looked, and looked and listened, and soon a faint glimmer of light began to play upon the ceiling behind me, and the merry music of happy voices came floating through this grand old archway. An angle of the wall had hid them from view and checked their ringing echoes. Again I pushed forward, but no more reveries visited me that day. They were kept at bay by the sterner forms of unrelenting facts; and I plodded on in prosy mood, half disposed to quarrel with the untoward accident that had dispelled the pleasant dream; that had chased away the vapors of the brain, and banished the visions of the night.

In order to enjoy the full effect of these delightful scenes, the mind must be released from the trammels of a too literal reality. It must forget that it is bound to a physical form; it must soar away on the wings of fancy to the realm of the ideal, and play at large in unconfined and boundless freedom. Then, while the body retains a partial consciousness of its actual surroundings, and thus quietly checks and tempers the mind's too active ardor, we experience the delightful effect of a mingling of the real and the ideal; the dream-like play of the fancy, swayed by a reluctant allegiance to the will, and checked by the gentle admonitions of sense. We thus resign ourselves to the pleasing illusion that the narrow confines of these sombre halls expand into spacious grottoes, and from beyond their ill defined and shadowy boundaries, come up to the mental view beauties we had dreamed not of, as the ever-varying forms of clouds floating over an opening in a shady forest; and the stony decorations of these adamantine walls seem to melt into flowing figures in the glow of our flickering lamps. Such was my delightful experience during that memorable walk. Such was the reverie that played in the chambers of my brain, while I trod the grand corridors of this Temple of Eternal Night.

Soon I saw before me a sight that baffles all description;—the glorious light of day, after being for hours immersed in the blackness of that Cimmerian night. Oh, how beautiful, how purely beautiful! What richness! What softness! What mellowness! What glorious, unearthly splendor! What a radiance beamed down from the upper world! It seemed to realize my oft-cherished ideal of a window in the sky, through which the light of Heaven shall fall, above the brightness of the sun. Never before did I realize as then, the glory of that expression of the Psalmist, "He covereth himself with Light as with a garment." It seemed the only earthly texture fit to be the Creator's robe. Selecting a spot just where the first full glimpse of daylight was obtained, I stopped to admire the exceeding beauty of that gem of heavenly lustre, till my eyes became somewhat accustomed to the glow;—then stepped aside to await the arrival of the party, and watch their actions when first they caught sight of the beautiful vision.

As that long line of fifty travelers filed past me, each gave a shout of thrilling admiration and wonder. Some made remarks on the exceeding beauty of the scene, that bespoke the true lover of nature; some in the tone of the sensualist; many with that thoughtless levity which betokens a vacant mind;—but whether in the lofty spirit of adoration and praise, in the lower sphere of the sensual world, or in the mere shout of wonder with which the beautiful vision was hailed, I still read, in each successive exclamation of surprise, the essence of that noble strain of poetry in which Milton apostrophizes the same Heavenly vision, when returning from regions of darkness to which this is as the glow of moonlight, and a cavern to which this is but a shady nook:

"Hail, holy Light! Offspring of Heaven first-born,
Or of the Eternal, co-eternal beam,
May I express thee unblamed? since God is Light,
And never but in unapproached light
Dwelt from eternity; dwelt then in Thee,
Bright effluence of bright essence increate!"

GATH.

BY J. L. PORTER.

One object of my tour in Philistia was to discover, if possible, the long lost site of Gath. Since the days of Jerome it has been unknown; and even the wonderful geographical skill of Robinson was unable to trace it out. I need not here detail those incidental allusions and topographical notices of the sacred writers, and those accurate measurements and references of Eusebius and Jerome, which serve to indicate the district in which it must have stood. It is enough to say that I was satisfied they all pointed to some place on the route we were now pursuing. It was, therefore, with an interest approaching to excitement we surveyed the position and examined the remains of every village and ruin we passed. But from the moment we gained the crest of the first ridge north of Beit Jibrin, there was one prominent object away before us which attracted our chief attention—a bare, white, conical hill, standing on the very edge of the great plain, and yet rising high enough to command all the rocky spurs up to the very base of the mountains. As valley after valley was passed, it became more and more conspicuous. At length we reached it, and rode over rubbish heaps and terraced vineyards to its summit. The hill rises about one hundred feet above the ridge that joins it on the east, and some two hundred over the level plain that sweeps its western base. It is crowned with the foundations of an old castle, and round its sides are numerous remains of ancient buildings. The view from it is most extensive. The whole plain of Philistia was spread out before us, variegated with fields of yellow corn, and red fallow land, and long reaches of grey wastes. Away on the southwestern horizon the white downs of Gaza and Ascalon mingle with the glittering waters of the Mediterranean. On the west we could see the little hill of Ashdod dark with olive groves: further to the right Ekron; and further still the white tower of Ramleh. The mountains of Judah rise up on the east in dark frowning masses; every peak crowned with village or ruin, whose name carries us away thousands of years back.

The modern name of this hill, Tell es-Safieh, gives no clue to its ancient name. The Crusaders built a castle on it in the twelfth century, and called it Blanche-garde; and the surrounding country became the scene of some of the daring adventures of Richard Cœur-de-lion. This hill, if fortified—as it evidently was from the earliest ages—would be the key of the Philistine plain on the east. Watchmen from its summit could see every hostile band that would attempt to break forth from the mountain defiles. The warlike Philistines would never have overlooked a position so commanding, and naturally so strong; one so well-fitted also for defending those vast corn-fields in which lay their wealth and their power. From the moment I set my foot upon Tell es-Safieh, I felt convinced that it is the site of the royal city of Gath.

What a life-like vividness did this discovery throw on some of the most romantic incidents of early Jewish history! The gigantic Anakim were annihilated by Joshua throughout the whole land; "Only in Gaza, and Gath, and in Ashdod," those impregnable fortresses, they remained. (Josh. xi. 22.) And from this place Goliath—one of the last of giant race—marched out in his panoply of mail, the acknowledged champion of the Philistines, to threaten and defy the Israelites in the neighboring "valley of Elah," which we shall visit anon. (1 Sam. xvii.) And hither, a few years later, David came, a homeless refugee. When recognized, he feigned himself mad, and easily escaped into those thickets that cover the hills around. I had often wondered why David should have fled to Gath; and why, having at length propitiated the Philistine lords, he should have made it his home. Now, on the spot, I saw the reason. Here he was perfectly secure from Saul. He was on the very border of his kingdom, besides within a few hours' march of his native Bethlehem; thus able to keep up an uninterrupted communication with his friends through those mountain passes, and ready at a moment's notice to take advantage of any turn of events that might seem to favor his ambitious designs.

Descending through the terraced vineyards that cover the whole slopes of Tell es-Safieh, we were struck with the appropriateness of the old name Gath, "wine-press," for such a site even yet. An hour's hard ride up a green vale, fragrant with thyme, and spangled with wild flowers, brought us into the lower part of the "Valley of Elah." Before us, on the crest of a rocky ridge, was Jarmuth. On our right rose the ruin-crowned tell of Zachariah, doubtless the site of ancient Azekah. Here then we were close to the place where Joshua captured and hanged the five kings. (Josh. x.) After the defeat of Gibeon, and the rout of Beth-horon, the fugitives ran along the borders of the plain "to Azekah and Makkedah." Hotly pursued, they seem to have made for Jarmuth. They had got so far up the valley of Elah; but now, wearied and wayworn, they were unable to attempt the steep ascent; and seeing the foe close behind they hid themselves "in a cave at Makkedah;" one of those caves with which the whole region abounds. Their fate is well known. About a mile above this spot, on the right side of the valley, is a ruin called El-Klediah, answering to the position, and bearing some resemblance to the name of Makkedah. Two hours more over rugged hills brought us to Beth-Shemesh.—Giant Cities of Bashan.

BETTY'S EIGHTEEN YEARS AND GOD'S MOMENT.

When I first knew Betty C. she had been a religious woman for eighteen years; but all that time, according to her own account, she was an unsaved woman. She was not religious in just going to church or chapel, and being as good as her neighbors; she was earnestly religious, and anxious to be at peace with God and safe for eternity. According to the Bible, this was not enough; but it was a great deal more than Betty had once had.

Before these eighteen years she had been a very bad character. She had a shop which she kept open on Sundays, and by means of which, I was told, she was "a nuisance in the neighborhood."

The town missionary said to her one day, "Betty C., when will you cease your business on the Lord's day?" She answered him angrily, "Never till God sends a judgment on me." That week one of her children fell ill, and before the next Lord's day it was dead. Another was taken with the same disease, and the woman left the dead child with the sick one in the house, and hurried out to the town missionary's meeting. There he met her in the doorway, and exclaimed in astonishment, "Betty C., what has brought you here?" The only reply was, "He's sent it!"

The judgment she had called for had come, and it had burst the doors of her stout heart, and made her tremble before God. She went home and found the second child dead also. From that time the Sunday shop was closed, and Betty's ways were changed; but her heart was not changed; she was only moved by the terror of the Lord. When I went to see her she was ill, and almost broken-hearted with fear and disappointment about her soul. She was anxiously seeking peace, as she had been doing for eighteen years; but she could find none. "I've heard you preach," she said, "night after night; I come and listen, and gape, and swallow, but I can't get it."

Betty's mistake was in seeking peace instead of seeking Christ. And I had to leave her this time as I found her; for she was so occupied with her own feelings, that the sweet, simple gospel of free salvation brought her no comfort.

However, I gave her a little book of "Six Addresses," of which one was on the words, "He was speechless." Soon afterwards, I had good news about Betty, and I went again to see her. She was another woman—full of peace and joy, which she had never known before. She said her husband had been reading the book to her. They had got to the address I have mentioned, where the many excuses that sinners now have for putting away the gospel were shown to fail them when they stand face to face with the Judge. Her own words were: "God knocked me speechless in a moment, and I fell on my knees and began to cry out, 'What must I do? what must I do?' when all of a sudden something seemed to say to me 'If there was anything for you to do, God wouldn't have given Jesus to do it for you.'"

With that word the Spirit of God carried the gospel home to her mind and heart. She rose from her knees praising God; for she knew that she had got a Saviour in Jesus, and that her sins were all blotted out in His blood. Since that time Betty has been a joyful, humble Christian, telling those round about her what God has done for her soul.—Liverpool Leaflet.

CHRIST, OUR ALL IN ALL.

I need no other plea
With which to approach my God,
Than His own mercy, boundless, free,
Through Christ on man bestowed;
A Father's love, a Father's care,
Receives and answers every prayer.

I need no other Priest
Than One High Priest above;
His intercession ne'er has ceased
Since first I knew His love:
Through that my faith shall never fail,
Even when passing death's dark vale.

I need no human ear
In which to pour my prayer;
My great High Priest is ever near,
On Him I cast my care:
To Him, Him only, I confess,
Who can alone absolve and bless.

I need no prayer to saints,
Beads, relics, martyrs' shrines—
Hardships 'neath which the spirit faints,
Yet still, sore burdened, pines;
Christ's service yields my soul delight,
Easy his yoke, his burden light.

I need no other book
To guide my steps to heaven,
Than that on which I look,
By God's own Spirit given;
And this when He illumes our eyes,
"Unto salvation makes us wise."

I need no holy oil,
To anoint my lips in death;
No priestly power my guilt to assoil
And bless my parting breath:
Long since these words bade fear to cease,
"Thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace."

I need no priestly mass,
No purgatorial fires,
My soul to anneal, my guilt to efface,
When this brief life expires:
Christ died eternal life to win,
His blood has cleansed me from all sin.

I need no other dress,
I urge no other claim,
Than His all-perfect righteousness;
In Him complete I am:
Heaven's portals at that word fly wide;
No passport do I need beside.

THE ICEBERG.

BY DR. I. I. HAYES.

"Observe the little bit of ice that clicks in your tumbler at dinner-time. Observe it closely, and you will perceive how very small a part of it floats above the surface of the water—not more than one-eighth, at the farthest—while the remaining seven-eighths float beneath. Now, this little bit of ice is an iceberg in miniature—an iceberg in every essential feature, except that it did not, in all human probability, come from Greenland. In shape, in general transparency, in the play of light upon it, in its prismatic character, in its frequently-cavernous form, in the general shape of the projecting tongues which lie beneath the surface of the water, in the delicate mist which plays around its summit in the warm air, it is the very image of those great, floating monoliths of the Arctic frost which come sailing down Baffin's Bay with the polar current, in all their stately grandeur and magnificence, scorning, as they tread their watery way, the great billows of the ocean with a cold disdain, sending them away, moaning and shattered, in defeat, chilling the air for leagues around, yet gathering to themselves the gorgeous colors of the sky; immovable from their steadfast course, and majestic as the 'silvery moon,' that, like the iceberg, 'bathes its sides in the trembling wave.'

"The iceberg is the largest independent floating body in the universe, except the heavenly orbs. There is nothing approaching it, within the range of our knowledge, on this globe of ours; and yet it is, as we have seen, but a fragment of the ice-stream, which is, in its turn, but an arm of the ice-sea. And yet the iceberg is to the great quantity of Greenland ice as the paring of a finger-nail to the human body; as a small chip to the largest tree; as a shovelful of earth to Manhattan Island. Yet magnify the bit of ice in your tumbler until it becomes, to your imagination, half a mile in diameter each way, and you have a mass that is far from unusual. Add to this a mile, two miles in length, and you have what may be sometimes seen. I have sailed alongside of an iceberg, two miles and a half, measured with a log-line, before coming to the end of it.

"The name signifies, as we have seen before, ice-mountain; and it is truly mountainous in size. Lift it out of the water, and it becomes a mountain one thousand, two thousand, three thousand feet high. In dimensions, it is as if New York City were turned adrift in the Atlantic, or the Central Park were cut out and launched in the same place. An iceberg of the dimensions of the Central Park is far from unusual. And its surface is not in form unlike it either. It is undulating like the Park, and craggy, and crossed by ravines, and dotted with lakes—the water of the lakes being formed from the melting snows of the late winter, and also of the ice itself after the snows have disappeared before the influence of the summer's sun.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—Advices from Europe are to the 20th inst.

Great Britain.—A deputation waited upon Earl Granville, Colonial Secretary, a few days since, and dress asking for closer relations be-sh colonies and the home governanville replied, approving their rearing that he was opposed to colonial independence.

The last passage of the steamship City of Brussels is said to be the quickest on record. The steamer left New York on the 4th inst. and arrived off Queenstown early on the 12th.

The London Times, in a recent editorial on the Alabama claims, asserts that if Minister Motley should propose that negotiations for a settlement be reopened in Washington, the proposal would be accepted; and adds, that it would be useless to talk of negotiation unless each side is prepared to enter upon it with confidence in the honor of the other. Americans charge that England did not show a proper feeling toward them during the war, and afforded unfair assistance to their enemies; to which the defence is that it was England's duty to abstain from showing feeling toward either side, and that the alleged unfair assistance was a strict observance of neutrality. To restore satisfactory relations between the two countries, the claims of the Americans for sympathy must be understood and respected, while they must understand the difficulties in the situation of the English, as impartial bystanders injured by a war in which they were bound to abstain from interference.

Ireland. — Serious apprehensions were entertained of a riot at Londonderry on the 18th, on account of the celebration of the anniversary of the famous siege of that city in 1689, an occasion which frequently calls forth evidences of enmity between Roman Catholics and Protestants. Unusual precautions were taken by the authorities, in preparing police and troops to suppress any disturbances, but the day passed over without any acts of violence.

France.—The authorities, on the 18th, ordered all Spanish refugees in Paris who were in any way implicated in the late republican attempt at insurrection, to leave the country. Among them was one deputy to the Spanish Cortes.

Spain,—The Cortes has adopted a resolution instructing the Committee on the Constitution to prepare a bill providing for the election of a monarch. Gen. Prim has publicly declared that there has been no change in the opinion of the government or of the Cortes on the question of the monarchy. The crown will probably be offered to the Duke of Genoa, but if he declines, the government will not favor the establishment of a republic.

Italy.—A Papal bull has been issued establishing regulations for the Council. The Pope declares that although the right of making propositions to the Council belongs to himself and the Court of Rome, he desires the members also to do so, on the conditions that every proposition be made in writing, and submitted privately to a council of bishops named by the Pope; that it have for its object the general interests of the Church, not of a particular diocese; that it be accompanied by a statement of the motives for its presentation; and that it be conformable to the spirit and traditions of the Church. The bill appoints the officers of the Council, naming five cardinals as Legati to preside over general congregations, from whom members desiring to speak must obtain an authorization on the day preceding that of the intended speech. Those who intend to propose canons must first submit them to one of four Commissions, on Faith, Discipline, Religious Orders, and Oriental Affairs, the members of which are to be chosen by the Council, a cardinal selected by the Pope presiding over each.

The French bishops, it is said, have protested against the Pope's interferenee in the deliberations of the Council. The Spanish bishops sustain him.

It is now stated that the report that the French government had informed the Pope that the proclamation of the dogma of Papal infallibility would release France from the political obligations of the Concordat, was untrue.

South America.—The war with Paraguay is said to be unpopular with the citizens of the Argentine Republic, and the idea is gaining ground that it would be best to withdraw the allied army from that country. Lopez is supposed to be among the mountains, but his exact position is not generally known.

The provisional government for Paraguay, estabtablishod at Asuncion by the Allies, has issued a decree abolishing slavery, and ordaining also that after the expiration of six months from the promulgation of the decree, all persons setting foot upon Paraguayan soil, will by that fact be free, whatever their previous condition.

Domestic—Judge Grier, of the Supreme Court of the United States, having resigned his position, the President has nominated, and the Senate confirmed, Edwin M. Stanton, late Secretay of War, to fill the vacancy. For the place vacated by the death of Judge Wayne, E. R. Hoar of Mass., at present U. S. Attorney General, has been nominated, but the Senate had not given its decision up to the 21st inst.

Early on the morning of the 18th inst., at the village of Stockton, Luzerne Co., Pa., part of a disused gallery in a coal mine the workings of which had been carried under the village, caved in, carrying down two double houses, each inhabited by two families. The occupants of one building escaped, but those of the other, ten in number, were buried in the ruins, and must have all perished. The fires which had been burning in the houses, at once caught to the fallen timbers, adding to the terrors and dangers of the scene. Some bodies were recovered a few days afterward, but the danger of further caving delayed the search. The pit formed, is described as about 150 feet long, 120 wide and 60 to 70 deep.

Congress.—The Senate passed on the 17th, by a vote of 45 to 9, the bill to perfect the reconstruction of the State of Georgia, providing for the convening of the Legislature heretofore elected, with the exclusion of those who had aided the rebellion, (unless compelled by direct physical force,) and without distinc ion of race or color, and requiring the ratification by said Legislature of the 15th amendment, as a condition of the admission of Senators and Representatives to Congress. The same bill was passed by the House on the 21st, by yeas 127, nays 51. A bill providing for the taking for the ninth census in the Sixth month next, passed the House, and in the Senate was favorably reported from the committee to which it was referred; but the Senate recommitted it, and adopted a joint resolution suspending until Second mo. 1st, 1870, all existing laws on that subject. This resolution was also adopted by the House. The law of 1850 would otherwise have come into operation, in the absence of any new law. A member of the House having made a speech in favor of repudiation, a resolution was introduced, declaring: "That the proposition, direct or indirect, to repudiate any portion of the debt of the United States, is unworthy of the honor and good name of the nation, and that this House, without distinction of party, hereby sets its seal of condemnation on any and all such propositions"; and it was adopted with one negative vote.

A NEW YEAR'S GREETING.

"May the Lord enable our spirits to ascend in His love and unity, a sweet and holy sacrifice, imploring His forgiveness on all our shortcomings, and petitioning that He will grant, that in the year about to dawn there may be known by us all, through His grace, a vitality of love and power far greater than has yet been experienced. Dost thou not think we are losing much from want of a more steadfast faith in the power of united prayer?"

These words embody in substance the earnest desire and prayer of my heart for us all, and I am sure they will find a warm response in many of your breasts; wherever there is faith to adopt them as a prayer, let them arise from our hearts, not only for ourselves, but one for another and for all; let us implore for this "vitality of love and power far greater than has yet been experienced," and I cannot doubt as to the result. The truest prayer is that occasioned by a sense of our need, which has first been created within us by the spirit of Christ. The enlightening and convicting power of this spirit operating on our spirits, causes us to cry aloud for that which it reveals to us as deficient in us, and if we acknowledge our destitution and look up to Him who can alone supply all that we lack, this very prayer will become to us an earnest of the acquisition of what we crave. The spirit of the Lord will search the dark places of our hearts, and reveal to us perhaps what we little thought existed there; it will sift all our motives, and show us how frequently we have sought out our own ends in things that are past, when possibly we might have been unconscious of it at the time: it will cause us to exclaim with the prophet, "Unclean, unclean;" and under the contrasting sense of its own holiness will turn all our comeliness into corruption; and all this will it do that we may first be cleansed and purified, that the old leaven may be purged out, that so we may become "a new lump," to the praise and glory of Him who hath redeemed us.

It is the case with some, that the more they receive of this blessed Spirit, the more vile and sinful do they discover themselves to be; and there are seasons when this revelation of their own state by nature tends to discourage them; but if such would narrowly examine themselves, they would frequently find it is at such seasons as these that the most earnest and piercing prayers for something better than they possess, arise from the lowest depths of their being. This may show them they are in better company than they imagine; for these prayers are prompted by reason of the presence of the spirit of Jesus, who for our sakes has first descended into the lowest parts of the earth, and is the same who has ascended up far above all heavens, that He might fill all things. He it is who is virtually saying even to us, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me;" which when once we recognize, we rejoin with Peter, "Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head." Yes, it is indeed He who after repeatedly manifesting to you your weaknesses, infirmities and deep sinfulness, has yet caused you to aspire after greater holiness than you at one time thought was possible to be attained. It is He who has caused you to crave for entire sanctification of body, soul and spirit, with such ardent longings as you never felt, before these depths in your own being were revealed to you. And will He beget these intense yearnings within you, and not cause you to realize them in His own due time? Will He give you to see that which you are convinced can alone appease the cravings newly awakened within you, and never cause you to possess it as your very own? Ah! no. He will surely lead you to all that is thus set before you.

And now that we are entering upon another year, let us unitedly join in a prayer of the apostle, of similar import to that with which we commenced this greeting. "May the eyes of our understanding be enlightened, that we may know the exceeding greatness of the power of God to us-ward who believe, even according to the working of His mighty power, which he wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places." Eph. i. 19, 20. Let nothing short of this satisfy us, that so we may be enabled and qualified to meet the coming demands of the age in which we live, for truly we are living in eventful times. Perhaps the most remarkable phenomenon of the past three years, consists in the wide-spread spirit of prayer that seems to be poured out on the people of so many countries, causing them to ask and implore for a greater manifestation of the spirit and power of God than aforetime. Who can tell but that this is a preparing of the hearts of the people by God, for something greater than we have been wont to see in our days? It may be that the Lord is thus producing an appetite which can never be appeased, until He satisfy it Himself with the riches of His choicest treasures: that He is thus begetting a hunger and a thirst for the kingdom of God and His righteousness, which will importune until it be filled.

I cannot but think we are "losing much from want of more steadfast faith in the power of united prayer," It is for the lack of this faith that we do not more frequently and more earnestly "agree together on earth, as touching anything that we may ask:" and consequently it may be said of some of us, "we have not, because we ask not;" at all events not to that extent which we might have had, did a more lively faith animate us. Let us then, amend our ways; let us hereby "agree together," though many of us are distantly separated, to ask for this greater degree of vitality of love and power from God. This prayer need not be either formal or vocal; indeed, it is not so with many—it arises already from the hearts of some who have long seen how greatly it is needed; and the very fact of similar desires having been begotten in the hearts of these, may show us by whom it has been generated, and ought to serve as an earnest of its being answered in the Lord's own time.

The blessed combination of love and power! Not power without love; but, as the apotsle elsewhere describes it, "A spirit of power and of love, and of a sound mind." Let this be our earnest, our united prayer, that so with the manifestation of greater power, we may be guarded as on every hand, by receiving also larger measures of that love which "suffereth long and is kind, which envieth not, which seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil;" which, in fact, "never faileth," but will exist when all that is in part shall be for ever done away.

Let us follow after this, and we shall be found following after God in the footsteps of our Lord Jesus Christ. And then when it shall please God to answer our prayer, we shall see more clearly the "needs be" there has been for all our trials and provings by the way; the benefit also of the gradual and apparently slow manner in which we have been led along; how we have thus been rooted and grounded in love, in order that we might be the better able to comprehend, with all saints, the love of Christ; and that we may be safely entrusted with a fuller and richer measure thereof, than would otherwise be imparted to us. Then we shall see also, how that we have in measure been walking in the footsteps of Christ our Lord, so to enter upon our glory as he did into his: which, if we apprehended more fully now, we should be more patient under our tribulations, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God. Let us, then, run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Him who is the author and the finisher of our faith, who has trodden this very path, and in such a manner as to constitute Himself an example to us, that we should follow his steps.

But whilst thus "agreeing together" to make known our requests unto God, let us not forget to unite our "thanksgivings" with our prayers and supplications. Yea, let us be thankful unto Him, and bless his name for all his mercies toward us, for we can truly say with the Psalmist, "He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities;" and also with Daniel, "To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgiveness, though we have rebelled against him." We have not only to adore him for his "unspeakable gift," in that "when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son," but being reconciled, we have truly to magnify his name for the beginning of the communication of that life by which we shall individually be saved. It is by virtue of this breathing of Christ on our souls, that we have in any respect become alive unto God; that our spirits have become quickened to seek God and to look up unto Him; that we have been enabled in any degree to cry unto Him, "Abba, Father;" and herein it is that Christ has become the author of our faith. So that whilst seeking, and properly so, for a more abundant measure of the spirit of Christ, we must not be unmindful of what we have already received, nor forget that the Lord looketh for his own with increase. It is to him that hath of this increase that more will be given, but from him that hath not of it will be taken away even that which he had received. I mention this, lest in expecting the "greater things" which are undoubtedly to come, we should be losing sight of that which we as undoubtedly already possess; and which, rightly used, will assuredly command a blessing from on high. "And now, may the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever." To Him let us at all times commend one another.—English Tract.

TEXT-CLUSTERS.

The question "How to interest a Bible class" having received various, and many of them instructive answers, during the late Conference in this city, the importance of the subject may afford reason for committing to paper some suggestions derived from experience. As, when we walk through the woods or fields in summer, we often gather from among the flowers around our paths some to bear homeward, to admire longer for ourselves, and to show to others, not only for their own beauty and sweetness, but because they remind us of the meadow or forest from whence they came;—so we may find the Bible to be a great field, a world of beauty and richness, where we may gather and take home with us all that is most pleasant and wholesome, for food and medicine, for mind, heart and spirit. Collating texts, from the Old and New Testaments, all clustering around some central thought, and mutually illustrating each other, has been a favorite practice with many in scriptural study and instruction. I propose merely to endeavor briefly to exemplify this. Young pupils especially may have their attention drawn in this way by asking them to look out and read the references themselves, while the connection is shown by the leader of the class, from time to time.

Thus, let it be asked, "What is the shortest verse in the Bible?" Many will be likely to remember, John xi. 35—"Jesus wept." With this, so full of deep and solemn teaching, in the minds of all, let them be turned to that which is next to it in brevity—1 Thess. v. 16: "Rejoice evermore." What a marvellous contrast! And yet what a close connection. It is because Jesus wept that we may rejoice. Since he has borne our griefs and carried our sorrows, and in his stripes we are healed, therefore our joy may be full. Next, let it be observed that the same chapter (1 Thess. v.) has three other short and very remarkable verses,—(17, 19 and 25,)—"Pray without ceasing," "Quench not the Spirit," and "Brethren, pray for us." How much there is in these!

For another example, reference may be made to our Lord's parable of the mustard-seed, that groweth to become a tree, (Matt. xiii. 31, 32;) and the same may be found expanded in other texts, foreshadowing the growth of religion in the heart. Rooted and grounded in love, (Ephes iii. 17–19.) Rooted and built up in Christ, (Coloss. ii. 7.) As the stem, is hope, that maketh not ashamed, (Rom. v. 5;) for we are saved by hope, (Rom. viii. 24, 25;) and as the leaves that spread out under the light of God's love, and breathe day by day the atmosphere of his Spirit, is that holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord, (Heb. xii. 14;) as he that hath this hope in himself purifieth himself, even as he is pure, (1 John iii. 3;) so that the whole life may acceptably worship God in the beauty of holiness, (1 Chron. xvi. 29.) So may joy be compared with the flowers, (Philipp. iv. 4;) charity, with the fruit, (Coloss. iii. 14, Ephes. v. 2, 1 Corinth. xiii. 1, 2 and 13.)

Other somewhat similar Bible lessons may, if acceptable, be proposed in a future communication. H. H.

THE HOLY SPIRIT.

The Spirit came to inaugurate a new era, and make our hearts His home; came to bear witness to Christ; to take of the things of Christ and reveal them to us; came to act as Christ's vicegerent on earth; to fix the eye of our minds on Christ; to stir up our dead consciences, to assist our endeavors to be holy, to quicken our sensibility, to make our bodies His temple, our souls His empire, and to renew us more and more, till we come to His Heavenly kingdom. To the Spirit we are indebted for every conquest we achieve over our spiritual adversaries, and for every step we take in our heavenward path. Whatever is lovely in the Church is the product of His quickening influence. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth."

Only let the quickening and germinating influences of the Spirit be more ardently sought and obtained, and like a genial thaw in spring, there will be a melting away of unhallowed prejudices; there will be an expansion of generous sympathies; there will be a budding forth of precious graces and productions, unfolding a beauty and perfume, like the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed. Inward impulses will spring up into outward manifestations. The heart will touch the lip and transform the life—and the seeds of divine grace will appear green on the surface, growing in all the luxuriance of a spiritual vegetation. T. APPLEGATE.

THOMAS PIERCE.

BY W. C. WESTLAKE.

The change depicted in the life of Thomas Pierce—the loss of the joy and peace of soul which he had before realized, and the sadness of spirit and restlessness of life which succeeded this change—is thus mapped out for us in his own testimony, by one whose personal experience should warn us from the rocks upon which he, through unwatchfulness, "having put away concerning faith, thus made shipwreck."

About this time he married into a Unitarian family, and although attentive to his business at Newport, it proved unsuccessful, and in 1820 we find him with his wife and one child emigrating to Van Dieman's Land, where he settled in business.

About the year 1834 his temporal affairs, which had been so far prosperous, suddenly changed. All that he possessed was swept away as by a flood, whilst a wife and four children now depended for existence upon his sole exertions, in a land far away from those friends who might have assisted him. To this affliction also was added about this time the loss of a sweet little girl of three years old, who sickened and died after anxious and prolonged watching. This accumulation of troubles so wrought upon Thomas Pierce's mind that his own health gave way. He was attacked with nervous fever, and three days after the death of his child it appeared as though his own life would be taken. Whilst lying as at the very portals of eternity without expectation of recovery, he had a remarkable visitation. It appeared to him as though "with exceeding distinctness and brightness," the words were conveyed to his mind: "Did I not take thee from the deepest of sin, from the lowest depths of infamy, to be mine own; did I not conduct thee in safety to England, where I would not suffer thy endeavors to prosper, for it was here in this sinful place that thou wast wanted? Thou wast conducted here in safety, but thou gavest me not thine heart. In all thine endeavors thou hast been unsuccessful, thy labors always were abortive—nothing but affliction will turn thine heart. I have taken the life of thy child, and now I have laid thine own head low." He further narrates that his numerous sins from youth upwards, many of which he had long forgotten, rapidly arose before his view with intense vividness, and with them a solemn voice of warning for the future, whilst pronouncing his recovery, which from that period gradually took place. He now gave himself up to prayer, meditation, and reading the Holy Scriptures, though his Unitarian views remained for a while unaltered. He had at this time little religious communion with any, and he records his longing for fellowship with other religious professors.

"Many times (he writes) have I stood watching the numerous congregations flocking to their places of worship, and been affected even to tears at the loneliness of my own situation; and at such times have I often retired into solitude and spread my cause before the Lord, earnestly desiring to be taught the right way; to be confirmed in my views, or made to see their unsoundness. I searched the Scriptures earnestly and with prayer, but, alas! I only looked to have my understanding convinced, and neither expected nor sought for that divine grace which alone is able to keep us in the right way, or preserve us when we are therein."

In this seeking condition of mind he attended various places of worship, but without much comfort; and it was at this period (1837) that James Backhouse and G. W Walker visited that colony on Gospel service. He was tempted (he says) "more out of curiosity than from any hopes of liking either them or their doctrines," to attend one of their religious meetings also. Something was spoken, and although the "times of silence were wearisome" to him, he thought he would go again. Afterwards he requested an interview with these Friends. He says:—

"I knew very little about this Society in any way, or the peculiar doctrines they held. I had never met with any books respecting them; their very singular carriage and dress could not fail to attract my attention, yet deeming it to proceed from affectation or enthusiasm, I thought they were scarcely worth my notice. . . . . I found them very intelligent persons. They supplied me on request with some of their publications, one of which, I believe, 'Biblical Notices,' by J. J. Gurney, particularly attracted my attention, and its close reasoning somewhat shook my faith in my doctrines. I am induced to think (he adds here very pertinently) that one of the reasons of our becoming so firmly attached to peculiar opinions is, that we read with pleasure books approving of our own views, and refrain from those which oppose them.

A stronger reason for the diligent and prayerful study of Holy Scripture as the only repertory of Truth could not well be advanced than this disposition to read "our own side" only. It is not needful that we should record how the light again broke upon his watching eyes—how the "wearisomeness" of the times of silence vanished and he found them to be seasons of inexpressible comfort. He felt that the sweet influence of the Holy Spirit arose in his soul, "at times filling his bodily frame." His heart was contrited, and tears would force themselves to his eyes. Under such inward visitations of heavenly love he walked with fear and joy:—

"I laid down my former religious opinions and creeds at once, believing them to be as chaff or empty shells, in comparison to that substance I was now mercifully favored with. A conviction took hold of my mind that my Heavenly Father had been pleased (to use the words of the apostle) 'to reveal his Son in me.' As I read the holy writings, it was surprising to me how differently they were opened to my understanding, and texts were often brought to my memory with a light I never saw before."

But this spiritual rejoicing was not without its earthly trials. The giving up of his Unitarian views and the abandonment of formal daily family prayers proved (he says) "a bitter draught to my dear wife; and, as we tenderly loved each other, it was the cause to each of us of deep-felt regret. But I had tasted of the sweetness of the fountain of living water, and could not willingly suffer anything earthly, however near and dear, to separate me from it."

About a year after this we find another touching allusion to the same subject:—

"I had also another sweet reward given me by my blessed Redeemer, even the turning of my dear wife's heart to see and love His holy law and follow Him even as I had done. This was accomplished through much bodily suffering, the remembrance whereof is exceedingly painful, but the result precious."

They both became united to the little body of Friends in Van Dieman's Land, attending their meetings and rejoicing together in the truth, "walking in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost." His outward circumstances rapidly improved. As a law-writer in Tasmania he was now making a comfortable subsistence, when his father, anxious for his return to England, wrote an earnest appeal, and offering to retire from business in his favor. After much "trying of the fleece, wet and dry," Thomas Pierce decided on returning to his native place; and, after a very affectionate leave-taking with the little band of fellow-disciples with whom they were now so closely bound, he set sail for England in Second month, 1839, with wife and five children, where he arrived safely in Seventh month following.

During a terrific storm which occurred off the Brazil coast, and in which the sails were shivered from the yards, and the blows on the ship's side were so terrific that it appeared the ship must founder, he says, "he was favored to attain to the place of true prayer, and was strengthened to humble himself and renew his covenant with his Heavenly Father that his life should be spent in His service if he saw meet to spare it yet longer."

Although we have already quoted so largely concerning the first half of his career, we cannot refrain from extracting the following picture of one honored and lovingly remembered by not a few of our elder readers:—

"On the 3d of Tenth month, 1857, my two friends James Backhouse and G. W. Walker left the colony. Through continued intercourse with them they had risen very high in my estimation. I loved them as brethren, parted from them with tears of regret, and prayers for their welfare followed them. Another dear friend named Daniel Wheeler, who had been paying an extensive religious visit to the South Sea Islands, left the colony soon after them. His great age, with hair white as silver and a benevolence that beamed forth from his countenance, gave him a patriarchal appearance. All who knew him loved him, and I loved him chiefly because he was, together with his son Charles, one of the small company who met with me in the Saviour's name and participated together of that Bread which cometh down from above and giveth life to the world. It was a saying of his, when any reference was made as to the improbability of his safe return home on account of his age and many infirmities, 'That it mattered little where the soldiers of Christ fell, so long as they were in their ranks.'"

Having thus rapidly traced the eventful career of Thomas Pierce until the time of his final settlement at his native place, the remainder of the pages allotted to us will be confined as closely as practicable to his connection with the religious Society to which he was so ardently attached.

In the new fields which opened before him in this country, there was at times much to discourage so fervent a temperament. The close ties which, in a foreign land, bound up the little company of convinced Friends in Tasmania, were missed by him amongst the hereditary members in this country; and the impulsive zeal of the new convert was at times chilled by the listlessness and lukewarmness of the calmly-contained body of Friends here. "Those who are only educated as Friends (he has frequently said to the writer) know not the treasure to which they are the heirs. None but those who have bought the truth, the hidden treasure, can appreciate its value, or comprehend the inexpressible joy which its possession brings to those who, having been brought up in another profession, have become Friends only through heartfelt convincement."

Although, in his first visit to London, after landing, he thankfully records that the meetings he attended there were "covered with the same Almighty Power he had known first in the Antipodes—the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, both here and there, 'God over all, blessed forever;'" and the visits to Newport of our late friends John and Martha Yeardley, in company with Caroline Norton, at this period, "much refreshed and strengthened them, testifying that they were bound up in the same bundle of life," yet he thus records his sorrowful feelings, shortly after his admission into membership in this land, in 1840:—

"I soon found reason to believe that the Friends of these parts were not in that flourishing state which our beloved Friends of Hobart Town were. There appeared an insufficient dependence on the Great Head for instruction in disposing of the matters which came before the several meetings. This caused me much mourning and sorrow; and once my spirit was bowed down, and as I attempted to speak a few words the tears and sobs which accompanied them so overpowered me that I became melted even as a little child."

There being no Friends' meeting-house at Newport, he was in the habit of sitting down at home with his family for divine worship; but encouraged by Elizabeth Dudley and others, who at this time visited the Island on Gospel service, it was decided to adapt some premises in the possession of Friends for that purpose. In conjunction with members of one or two other families, who had been drawn towards Friends through the ministry of John and Martha Yeardley, a small meeting was accordingly opened, and, as may be supposed, zealously attended by himself and family. Although very few met together—often only some four or five in the morning, and two or three in the evening of First-day—he records these meetings as being "seasons of divine favor;" and, encouraged by the spiritual comfort and strength ofttimes received at these silent gatherings, they felt abundant satisfaction in thus assembling.

It was also instructive to observe his watchfulness lest the affairs of this life should encroach on those of eternity. Notwithstanding the anxieties at this time of an increasing family and a small business, he regularly, to the end of his life, closed his shop during the hours of the week-day meeting, that he and his family might attend. Thus endeavoring to seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, he lacked not the promised blessing of all needful things being added. This concern to carry religion into daily life, earnestly desiring to remember God in all his ways, and that his daily path should be directed of Him, was a very conspicuous feature in his character. Instead of being "religious by fits and starts," or on certain days and hours, those who were closely associated with him felt that, though in much simplicity, he seemed at all seasons surrounded with an atmosphere of religion, living constantly under its exercise. Another noteworthy trait was his zeal in attending all the appointed meetings for church discipline and church affairs.

"Now being admitted into the privilege of membership with Friends (he writes at this time,) it became incumbent on me to attend their Meetings for Discipline, which were held at Southampton, Fordingbridge, and Poole, alternately, each month. The two latter being nearly forty miles from Newport made them difficult of access; but I did attend them, and as my trade was not very productive, I soon concluded to try and walk to them, which, after a time, I was strengthened to do."

(To be concluded.)

INDIAN CORRESPONDENCE.

Extracts from a letter received by a Friend, from Joseph Newsom, dated Kow Agency, near Council Grove, Kansas, Eleventh Month, 12, 1869.

. . . We left Indianapolis with the blessings and prayers of our friends, for this place, on the 7th of last month, arriving here on the 13th. We were kindly and affectionately received by Mahlon Stubbs, Agent, Mahlon Newlin, Trader, and Nathan Pierson, Superintendent of the Mission School, and their families. I came as Farmer for them. Our four families, including thirteen children and four employees, young Friends, make in the aggregate, (when all at home,) twenty-five members of our Society here. We held our first meeting and Bible class last First Day, which we consider as an established practice. We expect very soon to get our various departments in hand, so that we can open our week day meeting regularly on Fourth days, at eleven o'clock. Having twelve young people in our families of a suitable age to go to school, we decided to employ a teacher for them specially, and the school has closed its first week very satisfactorily. . . . .

We feel that the work in which we are engaged is a great one, and that many Sanballats and Tobiahs hover near us, but with the example of Nehemiah, in his orders to the children of Israel while rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, before us, and ability to discern between thing and thing being given, and properly heeded, we shall hopefully move onward.

Our Reserve is nine by fourteen miles in area. The soil is good, timber and stone plenty, but no coal; water plenty and good. The Southern branch of the Union Pacific Railroad passes one-fourth of a mile from our house, and ten miles through the Reservation. There are about 200 families of Indians, and total number of individuals 685. There are 130 stone houses, the balance are log houses; but very few of the Indians live in their houses, preferring wigwams and tents. I have visited many of them in their tents. They greet me kindly with "How-wa-gosa" (how are you farmer) I answer "Yolla" (well or good,) or "Pe-si-ah," (bad or not well.) The Chief Allego-wah-hu, took dinner with us yesterday, and behaved himself quite genteelly.

There are 22 children entered in the Mission School, but it is very difficult to keep them there, as confinement is very repugnant to their former habits, so that not more than 16 have remained one week at a time. . . I am having all the timber that is down cut for the railroad, and put along the line of road. I use all the Indian labor that I can get, but they dislike labor so much, that I have to employ some white laborers. I am consequently in the saddle about half the time.

About 200 of our Indians are out on the Plains on a buffalo hunt, and will not be back before the 1st of Second month. We heard a few days since that they were killing very many, which is good news for us, for if they do not do well, we shall be compelled to appeal to Congress for an appropriation to feed them, as they are very poor, and their annuity is nearly gone. The money for wood and ties will not be sufficient, unless they get buffalo meat and robes. All our predecessors have asked and obtained appropriations for winter supplies, which we are anxious to avoid the necessity of, and have good hopes of doing. The winter thus far has been mild, no snow, and very little cold weather. . .

We have a satisfactory visit this week from J. S. Hilles, and J. C. Tatum from Philadelphia, which seemed to bring us very near our distant friends, and since being here, Mary Rogers and James E. Baily have visited us in gospel love; hence you will perceive a loving Savior will not desert us in his instrumental helps, as well as immortal presence. We believe his promises are renewed every morning, and we earnestly pray that we may be kept in the appreciation thereof, and render unto Him due thanksgiving and praise.

OUR KNOWLEDGE OF DISTANT WORLDS INCREASING.

We are living in an age when all the activities of the human mind seem stretched to their utmost limit in the effort to increase the mental and moral acquisitions of their possessors. Students and men of business are alike earnest and indefatigable in seeking to enlarge their treasures. As the result, while wealth is developed so largely, the bounds of human knowledge are wonderfully increasing. The secrets of nature long hidden from human intelligence and comprehension are being revealed, and we are coming to know more, not only of the planet on which we live, but of the distant worlds that roll above us.

The discoveries of the telescope have indeed been wonderful, bringing to our view countless worlds never visible to the naked eye. But a still more wonderful instrument has been discovered, which now, in the hands of scientific men, is analyzing the composition of these worlds, revealing the substances of which they are made. This simple instrument is the spectroscope, which determines the elements of the light that comes to us from distant worlds, as the solar spectrum separates the different rays that combine to make the pure light of day.

It is comparatively a recent discovery, but already its revelations have been wonderful. Astronomers by it discovered that a small star in the Northern crown, which suddenly blazed out with the unwonted brilliancy of a star of the first magnitude, was really a world on fire, and the intense light was caused by the burning of hydrogen gas by which it is surrounded. The nebulæ, also, which astronomers have hitherto supposed to consist of stars so numerous and remote that their light was blended and confused, have by it been determined to be but luminous gases.

But perhaps the most interesting discoveries of this wonderful instrument were connected with the last eclipse of the sun, August 9. This phenomenon was observed with great accuracy by several scientific parties, stationed at different places in the line of its totality. Many interesting questions of great importance to the astronomer and the navigator were to be determined. It was left to the spectroscope to determine the character of the mysterious red flames that blaze out from all sides of the sun when eclipsed by the moon. The spectroscope, when applied to this corona, settled the question that these flames were not, as supposed, reflected light, but self-luminous and gaseous, being in fact burning hydrogen, whose waves dart out into space from the surface of the sun to a distance equal to half its diameter. Rose-colored flames of great beauty were noticed along the edge of the sun's disk, some of which proved to be mountains of flame, with a base 150,000 miles in length, and 75,000 miles in height. The question is settled by these and other observations, that the sun is entirely surrounded by an atmosphere of burning hydrogen thousands of miles deep.

Not only were these peculiarities of the eclipse noticed and analyzed, but the same wonderful instrument has even analyzed the composition of the sun's surface, proving that it contains at least sixteen different metals, most of which are known to us upon the earth. It also detects and reveals the elements that make up the other planets, and even the distant stars. If these truths are revealed in the infancy of this science, what may we not expect to learn of the wonderful works of God throughout the universe as the science advances in its revelations, and unfolds to us more of the handiwork of the great Architect.

The physical phenomena of the eclipse in August, as seen where it was total, were of exceeding interest, beauty, and sublimity. All beholders were impressed by it with a new sense of the power and glory and goodness of the Creator. The importance of the light and heat of the sun to our existence was sensibly proved by the fact stated by Prof. Eaton, of Brooklyn, who observed it at Burlington, Iowa, that had the thermometer continued to fall for twenty-four hours as it did during the eclipse—had some Joshua been able to stay the sun and moon in their course but for that time—the earth would have frozen two feet deep.

Prof. Eaton, in a lecture upon his observations and impressions, stated that he had seen all the interesting countries of the Old World, and viewed many wonderful sights, but with the exception of the eruption of Mount Vesuvius, he would rather lose the memory of all, than of that three minutes' experience on Burlington Heights.—American Messenger.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 1, 1870.

The March of Time.—In meeting our subscribers on the opening of a fresh decade of years, we make no formal presentation of "the compliments of the season;" but we think of the days of former years, of the shortness of human existence, of the march of the centuries and of the sublime unchangeableness of the Author of being, to whom a thousand years are "as a watch in the night," and by whom the six inconceivable geological spaces were summarily referred to as so many days. How startling seemed the click upon the cog-wheel of Time when we first wrote the date 1820. And has not the opening of every decade seemed to us more impressive than an ordinary New Year's Day? Yet, as said of old the historian of those six geologic periods, "we spend our years as a tale that is told: The days of our years are three-score years and ten, and if by reason of strength they be four-score years, yet is their strength labor and sorrow, for it is soon cut off, and we fly away." "So teach us to number our days," said the writer of the Pentateuch and of that wonderful composition the 90th Psalm, "that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom, and let the glory of the Lord our God be upon us!" We commend as a theme of contemplation for to-day, that sublime prayer of Moses, in which, retrospecting his inspired vision of creation "before the mountains were brought forth," he declared that He who long afterwards "became flesh and dwelt among men," had himself been "our dwelling-place through all generations," and emphatically asserted the Deity of Christ—"even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God." What a glorious combination! Our Creator, ("by whom the worlds were made,") our dwelling place and our Redeemer! The Holy Spirit in the beginning brooding over the face of the waters; and in these latter days brooding over the otherwise dead waste of human spirits, "to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ." Let the day be given to His fear and service—

"For oh! eternity's too short
To utter all His praise!"

Disarmament.—The Herald of Peace, (a long established and valuable London paper,) is largely occupied with copious extracts from journals of France, Germany, Belgium and Sweden, in advocacy of Peace and Disarmament. The French journal Le Siècle has long urged the Berlin Government to take the initiative. It now publishes a paper from a Berlin correspondent, who says: "We openly proclaim that our object is this—to deprive crowned despotism of its power of home and foreign mischief." To the Chamber of Deputies at Dresden, the following motion has been presented:

"That it may please the Government to employ all its influence with the North German Confederation in order to obtain a reduction of military expenses, and to take measures for a general disarmament."

The French journal Le Havre says: "The rallying cry of Democracy must henceforth be Disarmament; and we see with pleasure that the Reforme is opening a campaign against war."

We might fill our paper with striking paragraphs showing how deep a hold the lovely peace idea has taken upon the popular mind of Europe. Arguments and statistics of a political-economical nature, and wholly irrefutable, are blazoned before the world. These must convince the judgment of thinking people. But to make a permanent public sentiment, one which will stand firm when national agitations

"Cry havoc! and let slip the dogs of war," requires higher, purer and unselfish motives. Before all Europe it has now been eloquently "demonstrated in detail, the damage which even a short war occasioned both to the wholesale and retail trade." This is very good as an incidental argument; but it will not head off the battle of Armageddon, or cause the nations to learn war no more. We want, we need a Christian testimony—one that will stand when both wholesale and retail trade are to suffer. The teachings of our Lord and the loving words of the beloved disciple are wanted to convince immortal beings, that we should do as we would be done by—(never was better law or sounder logic than the golden rule)—that he that hateth his brother is a murderer, and that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him. Let the statesman and the political economist study LOVE, which is the first, the second, and the new commandment—the synopsis of all law. Hate is the basis of all war. Love is the sure basis of peace. The "spirit and wisdom of Jesus" are peaceable. Christianity furnishes the argument, the motive and the power that must extinguish war. Pure Christianity is an atmosphere in which war cannot exist. From the panoply of God, stored in the Christian armory, let the champion of Peace draw all his weapons. Without these he may impress the understanding and convince the judgment, but he will not so correct and convert the heart as to make it permanently proof against those lusts "from whence come wars and fightings."

SECTARISM.—The essay of F. Firth on the Philosophy of Religious Sectarism (See Review of 11th month 13th and 20th) has called forth some reflections from a valued friend, who deprecates the spirit of sect, and who longs for that indissoluble oneness in Christ which would be the preventive against schisms in the Church which is His body. With much that our friend has written we sympathize. We are ready to hail every tendency towards true Church union. There was something to us very pleasant in the flowing together of the large masses who now constitute the Presbyterian Church, and we think that there are other religious organizations which might as well serve the Lord together as one household of faith, if only they would cherish fervent Charity, lay chief stress upon those essential points in which they are really united, and, making allowance for the rights of private judgment and for mental idiosyncrasies, leave a free and wide margin for individuality, in matters respecting which men may differ whilst maintaining in perfect integrity the precious unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Far from us be that libertinism which would allow every latitude of religious opinion. Some test there must be, and some terms essential to fellowship in a Church organization. Cowper states his view of the terms:

"What think ye of Christ?—is the test
To try both your faith and your scheme.
You cannot be right in the rest
Unless you think rightly of Him."

A living faith, both theoretic and practical, in the Lord Jesus Christ and His offices, including a full acceptance of the guidance of His Holy Spirit, will make a safe Church member from whom we should regret to be severed. How sad it is, then, to see a section created, a schism forced, because two classes of Christians, holding one common faith, differ in opinion as to whether a third class hold the same doctrine. Divisions have sometimes been based upon insufficient issues—sometimes upon a muddled misconception of facts, and the wounded Church laments that

"Doubt and discord step 'twixt mine and me, Joining their strength to that which with me copes."

We have met somewhere with the thought that the real Church of any neighborhood consists of the converted souls of that neighborhood; not, that this should be, but that such is the actual fact. Sectarianism steps in and disturbs the body of Christ—seizes a man by his idiosyncrasies and drags him off from those with whom he had sweet communion and spiritual oneness, and lands him in a sect. These sects all claim to draw their nourishment from "Jerusalem above, which is the mother of us all," yet the ways of Zion mourn while sectaries expend their strength in building impregnable walls about their special Zions, and millions of heathen remain unconverted, because the laborers who should go out into all the earth are wanted at home to man Sectarianism's wall, portcullis and moat.

We are no levellers or ancient land-marks which the fathers set up in the Truth, but we love the wisdom with which the Church at Jerusalem sought to prevent the formation of sects by deciding to lay upon believers no other burthens than what were held to be "necessary things." Our soul's desire is, that we all should strive and agonize to be in Christ. This attained, we shall be one in Him, and the "Unity of the Spirit" will be a secure cement for every Church. And then—lift up your eyes, oh lift up your eyes, and behold the fields white unto harvest! Surely the prayer which our Saviour enjoined will arise spontaneously in many hearts.

Who was George Fox the Younger?—A Friend residing in the far West requests an answer to this question. It appears that under the preaching of the distinguished reformer bearing the same name, he and James Naylor and Wm. Dewsbury were simultaneously convinced of the Truth. This was in the year 1651. Many others were reached at the same time: the three mentioned all became eminent as ministers. The subject of the present inquiry, although older in years than his cotemporary of the same name, to avoid confusion and mistake, and in recognition that his spiritual father was in Christ before him, voluntarily assumed the name of George Fox the younger. This signature he appended to his epistles and other writings, and thus he secured his object of distinct identification. He was a brave champion of Christian truth, and bore abuse and imprisonment with meekness, yet nothing daunted by the terrors of man. When he was preaching at Harwich, a rude mob, incited by the Mayor, interrupted the meeting, and he boldly exclaimed: "Wo, wo to the rulers and teachers of this nation, who suffer such ungodliness as this and do not seek to suppress it." For this he was imprisoned, his friend Robert Grassingham accompanying him in pure love and sharing his sufferings. Whilst a prisoner, he wrote an Epistle to King Charles II., which was personally delivered into the Sovereign's hand by R. Hubberthorn, and afterward printed. We quote a few fearless words:

"It was the just hand of God in taking away the kingdom from thy father and thee; also it is the just hand of the Lord to take it again from them and bring them under thee: though I shall not say but that some of them went beyond their commission against thy father when they were brought as a rod over you; and well will it be for thee if thou becomest not guilty of the same transgression."

In the year 1660 he wrote again to King Charles in innocent boldness, expressive of great pity towards him for his soul's sake, telling him plainly that by his great wickedness he had grieved the Holy Ghost. By this letter the King was touched at heart, and when his brother the Duke of York, who was "violently set against the author," advised severe punishment, Charles answered, "It were better for us to amend our lives."

In 1661, being imprisoned in Lambeth-house, and continuing valiant for the Truth, he wrote several pamphlets and epistles, replete with decided ability, and, as the course of events proved, marked by "the testimony of Jesus, which is the Spirit of prophecy." In one of his books, probably his last, written very shortly before his peaceful and blessed exit from time, he said: "My life is in the hand of my Maker, and not one hair of my head can fall to the ground without His providence. He hath redeemed my soul from hell, and my mind from the earth; and He hath given me His good Spirit to lead me. I am henceforth no more my own, but I am the Lord's, who hath formed me to His praise, and hath brought me forth that I may sound His powerful truth amongst the people. Therefore must I not fear man." A striking prediction written by him in Lambeth-house was so signally realized as to cause its republication four or five years after his decease.

American Travellers.—By our English exchanges we find that our Friends Jas. Owen, of Iowa, and S. F. Smiley, of Baltimore, are satisfactorily pursuing their Christian service in England. The exercises of our dear Friend S. F. S. in Scotland, the Orkneys and Falklands, &c., have told, only temporarily, we trust, upon her health and it is understood to be her prospect, after some comparative rest with a family of American Friends at Torquay, if able, to resume her labors in the North in warmer weather.

Australasia.—J. J. Neave and W. Robson are still plowing the South Pacific Ocean and sowing seminal truths in the isles afar off. In several of these they have had satisfactory meetings. At Raiatea they received much kindness from the King's grandmother, from the Regent and principal men. The King presented them with quantities of pumpkins, yams, bananas, taro, cocoanuts, sweet potatoes and a pig. Twenty-five prominent individuals by invitation visited them on shipboard. Next day the school children and their teacher visited the ship, and our Friends endeavored to make the opportunity a profitable one. At Tahiti their hearts were pained with the prevalence of intemperance and other vice, and of popery. The King himself, though kind and helpful to the missionaries, is sadly dissipated. They passed on, having opportunity in the different islands to proclaim the gospel of the dear Son of God. Reaching Raratonga, the missionary, named Chalmers, was soon on board with a cordial invitation to his house.

"The people had heard that two Friends were coming to see them, and the visit of Daniel Wheeler was fresh in the minds of some of the older ones, which raised their expectation and left us with an open door."

They had several religious meetings, as was afterward the case at Savage Island, Tutuila, Apia, &c. Way opening unexpectedly for their return to Sydney, our dear Friends fonnd it right to avail themselves thereof.

London. — The London Friend gives monthly accounts of religious and philanthropic movements under the care of our Religious Society in the Metropolis. The localities enumerated may not be familiar to most of our readers, yet the fidelity thus evidenced to the requirements of the day, must be interesting and gratifying to us all. Jonathan Grubb recently spent a fortnight in that city "visiting various philanthropic institutions, and holding many religious meetings"—at Burdett Hall—the Juvenile Mission Rooms—the Sewing School at Ratcliffe Meeting House—a temperance meeting at the Mosley Street Schoolroom—a meeting with the poor at Peel Meeting House—one at Bedford Institute—at Bedford Hall Meeting—at the Agricultural Hall—the Bedford Scholars' Meeting—&c. Friends have District visitors and teachers in Spitalfields, and various First-Day School, Home Missions, and other efforts. The spirit in which these are conducted is in a degree indicated by the following note: "The desirability of retaining some hold on our First-Day scholars, and the extension in some way of the benefits of religious fellowship to the attenders at our Mission Meetings, were felt to be subjects of pressing importance."

Our Advertising Sheet.—Attention is invited to the advantages which the Review presents as an advertising medium. Its extended circulation among a class of persons whose business patronage it is desirable to secure, has caused many offers of cards which we have been obliged to decline. Whilst the proprietors of the Review do not undertake to endorse the contents of the Advertisement Sheet, they exercise a care to exclude those which appear delusive, extravagant or of doubtful propriety. The Publisher solicits advertisements strictly conscientious in their language, of a character that shall not conflict with the high moral tone which we aim to maintain in every department of this periodical. Communications on this subject should be addressed to the Publisher.

Acknowledgment.—Received for Tennessee fund —From Hudson, N. Y., $5.00. From three sisters at Central Village, Mass., $7.00. From Rahway, N. J., $12. Dartmouth, $10. Sturbridge, $5.

DIED.

ROBERTS.—On the 5th of Twelfth month, 1869, Anna Maria Roberts, in the 76th year of her age; a beloved Elder of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting. We believe it was the concern of this our dear friend to be found daily walking in the Lord's holy, preserving fear; evincing by her meek and quiet spirit, and her circumspect life and conversation, an instructive example to others. She was favored to meet her approaching end with a calm, confiding trust in Him in whom she had believed, verifying the Scripture declaration, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee."

HEATH.—At Monterey, Mass., on the 31st of Tenth month, 1869, Lydia C. Heath, daughter of David and Catharine Devol, of Saratoga Co., N. Y., in the 34th year of her age; a member of Moreau Monthly Meeting. In the life and death of this dear Friend were strikingly exemplified the gifts and graces of the Spirit. Early visited and imbued with the love of Christ, the sweet and gentle influences thereof characterized her life as a Christian Friend, a wife and mother. With no cloud obscuring her vision of coming glory, she died triumphant in the faith, as one for whom Jesus prayed: "Father, I will that those whom thou hast given me be with me where I am." Her course of life, her gentle ministrations, her loving sympathy, her words of Christian cheer, have left an impression among her surviving friends, by which though dead she yet speaketh.

CORRESPONDENCE.

12*th mo.* 17, 1869.—[A valued Friend of North Carolina notices the mention in a periodical of the account of the sufferings of Friends in North Carolina, with a regret that no allusion is made by the Meeting for Sufferings to the compromise of our Christian testimony against War on the part of those who paid the fine in lieu of military service. The remarks of our friend, which we insert, are gratifying, as showing that faithful labor was bestowed, in the proper time and way, and that the integrity of the Society of Friends, in that sorely tested district of country, was maintained.]

The above comment seems to throw censure upon Friends in North Carolina for not speaking in decided condemnation of the course of those who paid the said fine. I was privileged to be present at the Meeting for Sufferings when the work above referred to was read for the last time, and this point was specially adverted to, and the opinion seemed universal among those present that that meeting had already borne clear and unflinching testimony against any compromise, in Epistles of Advice addressed from time to time to the members of N. Carolina Y. Meeting. None of these were ever printed, but they were sent down in writing to subordinate meetings, and I have seen but few recorded on the books of these meetings, but mention made of several others. The following, though not as pointed as some of these epistles, is the only one I find among my papers, and may in some degree illustrate the lively concern of that meeting for their fellow members in the hour of trial when many hearts almost failed for fear.

"Epistle of Advice from the Meeting for Sufferings, held the 1*st of Sixth month*, 1861, to the Monthly Meetings of North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

Dear Friends.—We have met under a deep feeling of sorrow on account of the excitement and commotion that now agitate our country. Under the influence of the love of God we are constrained to love our country and one another, and are united in the belief that a strict adherence to the precepts and example of Christ leads us to view every man as our brother. It is a plain Scripture injunction that he who loveth God loveth his brother also. Without this we cannot be his disciples, for if any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his. Seeing, then, dear Friends, that we believe these things, let us endeavor to walk by the same rule, minding the same things, living as far as lies in our power peaceably with all men, 'not rendering evil for evil, but, contrariwise, blessing:' for the Apostle Paul emphatically declares, 'The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds, casting down the imagination and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God.' The path that leads to life and peace is no less narrow than when first marked out, and if the master of the house be called Beelzebub, how much more they of his household. Therefore, beloved Friends, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing had happened unto you, but rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when His glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy. For they that fear the Lord and speak often one to another will be remembered by Him, and when He cometh to make up His jewels, He will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth Him. Then shall ye discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth Him not, for the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are His. And we can say with the apostle, 'We know whom we have believed, and are persuaded that He is able to keep that which we have committed unto Him against that day.' With a firm reliance upon the arm of Divine power, may we all be found in the faithful discharge of our Christian duties, having the mind stayed on God, that it may be kept in perfect peace, for He commandeth even the winds and waves, and they obey Him. The time has come when the credit of our forefathers will be of little avail to us, but our reward will be according to our works; for the Lord will have a tried people and a willing people in the day of his power. Gird up then the loins of your minds, watch and be sober. Be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might; take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand. Thus saith the Lord, stand in the way, and see and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest to your souls.

Signed on behalf and by direction of the meeting,

NEREUS MENDENHALL, Clerk."

How appropriate was such an exhortation as this, just as the dark cloud of war closed over the homes of those to whom it was addressed. We cannot wonder that many of those who were thus addressed stood faithful, some even unto death. Whilst some of its members faltered and bore a less firm testimony, the Yearly Meeting and Meeting for Sufferings ever counselled and encouraged their members to unfaltering faithfulness amid all the trials and persecutions which might be the lot of the faithful ones. And just after the dark cloud of war rolled away, the Yearly Meeting of 1865 thus addressed its members:

"The position which Friends have held in respect of war and slavery has been comparable to a little taper casting a glimmering light through the surrounding gloom; and though we may rejoice at the extinction of slavery in our land, we cannot rejoice at the manner in which it was accomplished. Dreadful indeed has been the ordeal through which our nation has passed. As the Israelites were delivered of old, so have been the slaves in our midst. Their oppressors have been overwhelmed in the Red Sea —a sea into which they rushed of their own accord. Marvellous and terrible are the judgments of the Lord. But while the war has ceased and the shackles of slavery have been cut asunder, the spirit of both still lives. The freedman is still subject to many difficulties and besetments, and probably to-day offers a broader field for our exertions than ever before. Let Friends then not relax their efforts in his behalf. In its higher sense let us practice the worldly maxim, 'In time of peace prepare for war.' When at ease we may, if not careful, lose more than in difficulty and danger. While men slept the enemy sowed tares."

And with this allow me to close this criticism. Truly thy friend,

SAMUEL A. PURDIE.

SARATOGA Co., N. Y., 12th mo. 21st.

Esteemed Friend William J. Allinson:—The Review is read with increasing interest among us. I am especially interested in the "Correspondence" department. It offers an opening for an interchange of information, of thought and interest, which may tend to unite us more fully as one people. An estrangement of dear friends has doubtless often been the result of a want of acquaintance, or understanding of each other's views, desires and intentions. Any opening which offers a medium to increase this knowledge and acquaintance, I rejoice to see improved, as one of the means to promote the fulfillment, and hasten the answer of the prayer of our Lord on behalf of his followers, "that they all may be one." With this feeling I am inclined to offer some thoughts and conclusions as the result of a visit in some parts of our Yearly Meeting.

Amid much cause for anxiety for the future of our Society, there are many hopeful evidences that the standard of Truth is not fallen; many evidences that "Ichabod" is not written upon us. The influences of the world have caused the love of many to wax cold. The need of watchfulness unto prayer was perhaps never greater. Yet the "Seed" still reigns. The Lamb has many followers who are struggling for the victory. There is a conviction in many minds that we, as a Society, are being called upon to arise and shake ourselves from the dust of cold formalism and traditional prejudices. For with all our profession and care to the contrary, the danger of substituting the form for the power, the name for the spirit, will not be denied. It is evident that we are passing a transition state, are becoming awakened to a sense of the responsible position which we as a Society occupy. This is well. May every lover of the cause of Christ stand firm in his ranks, faithful in the occupancy of his gift, whatever that gift may be. But among all these hopeful evidences of the times, there is a danger which greatly threatens to hinder the prosperity of the truth. This is that of extremes. It is said that one extreme begets another, and this may be so, but it is still more true that one extreme follows another. The increasing life and interest in one class of members is looked upon with distrust by another class. The desire to check what is considered intemperate zeal on the part of one class, is being looked upon as unauthorized restraint. An awakening among the young results in an anxious inquiry to know "what shall I do in honor of Him, the beloved of my soul?" Next follows a desire to mingle with kindred spirits, in seeking His aid and direction; to "admonish one another," to confess their faults one to another, and to pray one for another. While some, in accordance with the exhortation of George Fox, "encourage, love and cherish in all a bubbling forth from the spring of Divine Life," others feel that this is encouraging a superficial work, a creaturely activity, and look with distrust upon all such evidences as innovations. That there is an especial outpouring of His spirit upon the young in our Society, is apparent in many places. Upon the kind, loving and sympathizing care of these, doubtless depends the future of our Society. O! may none presume to steady the Ark with unbidden hands. In some instances the young are losing strength, through a disposition to disrespect the kind care of their elder brethren and sisters, disregarding their counsel, while the extreme on the other hand is an unwillingness to recognize an evidence of desire to serve the Lord, unless it be in the same channel they have marked out for themselves. This is the danger of the day. Danger of a barrier thus growing up which rises and widens as effect follows cause. All these are honest in their desires, who feel that they are standing for the cause, that to them is equally dear, none of whom would willingly grieve the Holy Spirit in themselves, nor restrain it in others. Then why is this so? Whence arises this danger? It may be through an unwillingness to recognize the different gifts, which tho' differing, are all of one spirit. Perhaps through a want of "Charity, which suffereth long and is kind." It may be through a want of following the Good Shepherd sufficiently near to distinguish his voice. Perhaps through settling into a form of Godliness without the life, or from a desire to lord over God's heritage, instead of feeding the flock of God. But with all this, I yield to no gloomy anticipations for our future. The Master is at the helm, and though storms rage, and billows roll, He will guide aright. The Lord may shake those things which may be shaken, but those things which cannot be shaken will remain. He is pouring out upon us an increased dispensation of his spirit. He is calling upon us to recover ourselves from the snare of trusting to a name to live. He is showing us that to have even Abraham to our father will not suffice for us, unless we work the works of Abraham in the exercise of faith, laying our all on the altar of sacrifice, and believing in Him for whom no substitute was found, who was offered as a Lamb for the sins of the world. In the exercise of this faith, which works by love to the purifying of the heart, we may find a place of safety from all danger. As the gifts of the Spirit form the controlling element of our lives, none of these conflicting views or feelings will be permitted to hurt or destroy in all God's holy mountain; but all will be found laboring for the building up of the Church and the members thereof in the most holy faith, for the gathering in of souls into the one fold, having one Shepherd, each esteeming others better than themselves, in honor preferring one another, ever remembering that we are nothing, "Christ is all." J. D.

New Vienna, Ohio, 12th mo. 17, 1869.

[Our dear friend Daniel Hill in a private letter writes:]

I had a meeting for children on First-day at Chilicothe, some 35 miles above here; supposed to be nearly 1500 children present: a very interesting meeting it was. Many of the children were in tears. I have faith in such children's meetings, if they are held under a proper concern.

There is nothing that cheers and encourages me more than the accounts of religious awakening and interest in and around Philadelphia. How much power is there, if it could only be properly employed in the Master's service, and how white the fields are unto harvest. I fear there is much talent there which is rusting out for want of proper employment. I do earnestly hope that Friends there may not suffer this new development (which is evidently of Divine begetting) to perish through neglect.

. . . We are having some precious visitations in this part of the vineyard, especially among young people and children. My dear friend, we live in eventful times. How it behoves us to look well that our part of the work is not neglected. Daniel Hill.

"Religion is the best armor in the world, but the worst cloak."

Let us be content to be real. In the presence of a cold, critical, news-bearing world let us maintain our integrity; and in the intercourse of our domestic and social life, "let love be without dissimulation."—London Christian Witness.

SCHOOL-MISTRESSES FOR LIBERIA.

Alexander Crummell, well and favorably known to many of us, in an able report written for the Protestant Churchman, after many excellent practical remarks on the necessity of teaching to the African girls, domestic habits and womanly employments, says:

FEMALE TEACHERS.

The consideration of this important subject would be entirely incomplete if we failed to notice the weighty question, namely, who should be the teachers of girls, the instructors of female schools? For it should not be taken for granted that men should train the rising mind of Africa. On the contrary we maintain, that if the great revolution, contemplated in this paper, is to be attempted, namely, the engrafting Christianity upon the social state in Africa, by the elevation of womanhood, then female influence should be the master agency.

Woman then is to be employed as a most valuable instrument in raising up her sex in Africa, and in restoring society.

Instead of sending school-masters into the country, school-mistresses should be preferred. Whether in Governmental or Mission-schools, we aim to strike effectually at the root of the native man's social degradation; and that is by lifting up the native female population. Wherever schools are established, by Mission or by Government, two-thirds, at least, of all the teachers should be women. This suggestion, moreover, is made irrespective of the sex of scholars. Female teachers are needed for girls; but they are as much, if not more needed for boys.

And this is the reason for this great need—Woman is as nothing, in the native man's estimation. Undermine this traditional, deep-rooted prejudice by subjecting all the rising manhood of these tribes to woman's influence and control. Place the native, as a boy, under the instruction and authority of a school-mistress. You will thus engraft upon his early life a respect for his mother, his sister, his future wife, yea, indeed, for every female; you also thereby gradually introduce a new idea into heathen society, namely, the worth and importance of womanhood; and thus strike a most effectual blow at polygamy, that great hindrance to all native progress.

AMMONIA AND COALS.

In London over 1,000,000 tons of coal are used annually in making gas. In this coal is contained a small quantity of nitrogen (not over one per cent.) from which is derived the ammonia so largely employed in agriculture and the arts. The utilization of this, formerly a waste product, has added millions of dollars to the wealth of England. In London alone, 10,000 tons of sal ammoniac are produced by the gas manufacturers annually, and in the United Kingdom more than 100,000 tons. How insignificant appears this trace of nitrogen in coals, about one pound in the hundred, and yet we see how important it becomes when manipulated by the chemist and compelled to enter into compounds of the highest usefulness in the industrial arts. It is impossible to examine attentively into any of the art processes, without being impressed with the important service which chemistry has performed in facilitating and perfecting the same, and in utilizing waste products.—Journal of Chemistry.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

THE RUNAWAY KNOCK.

"Teacher," said a bright, earnest-faced boy, "why is it that so many prayers are unanswered? I do not understand. The Bible says, 'Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you;' but it seems to me a great many knock and are not admitted."

"Did you never sit by your cheerful parlor fire," said the teacher, "on some dark evening, and hear a loud knocking at the door? Going to answer the summons, have you not sometimes looked out into the darkness, seeing nothing, but hearing the pattering feet of some mischievous boy, who knocked but did not wish to enter, and therefore ran away? Thus it is often with us. We ask for blessings, but we do not really expect them; we knock, but do not wish to enter; we fear that Jesus will not hear us, will not fulfill His promises, will not admit us, and so we go away."

"Ah, I see," said the earnest-faced boy, his eyes shining with the new light dawning in his soul, "Jesus cannot be expected to answer runaway knocks. He has never promised it. I mean to keep knocking, knocking, until He cannot help opening the door."

Trembling and weakly doubting,
I knocked at Mercy's gate,
List'ning yet unexpecting,
I did not even wait!
But stepping quickly backward,
I watched that I might see,
Whether the gracious Keeper
Would open unto me.
He came not, then I murmured:
I murmur not to-day:
I'm knocking now at Mercy's gate,
I will not go away

MY FATHER'S HOUSE.

JOHN xiv. 2.

One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er,
I'm nearer my home to-day
Than I ever have been before.

Nearer my Father's house,
Where the many mansions be;
Nearer the great white throne,
Nearer the jasper sea.

Nearer the bound of life,
Where we lay our burdens down;
Nearer leaving the cross,
Nearer wearing the crown.

But lying darkly between,
Winding down through the night,
Is the dim and unknown stream
That leads me at last to the light.

Closer, closer my steps
Come to the dark abysm,
Closer, death to my lips
Presses the awful chrism.

Saviour, perfect my trust,
Strengthen the might of my faith,
Let me feel as I would when I stand
On the rock of the shore of death:

Feel as I would when my feet
Are slipping over the brink,
For it may be I'm nearer home,
Nearer now than I think.

ACID RIVERS.

The Rio Vinaigre, says the Boston Journal of Chemistry, in South America, has its source nearly two miles above the level of the sea, on the volcano named "Purace."

Humboldt was the first to ascertain that its waters contain free sulphuric and muriatic acids. According to Boussingault, this river empties into the Rio Cauca, into which it falls from a height of about 400 feet, discharging daily 34,784 cubic meters of water, containing 37,611 kilgr. (more than 40 tons) of strong sulphuric acid, and 31,654 kilgr. (nearly 35 tons) of strong muriatic acid. No fish are found in the Rio Cauca for more than ten miles below the point where it receives these acid waters.

In the island of Java there are several small streams and lakes which contain free sulphuric and muriatic acids; and on the island of Sumatra there is a lake which contains free nitric acid. All these phenomena are the result of volcanic action.—Scientific American.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—Advices from Europe are to the 27th ult.

GREAT BRITAIN.—J. A. Otway, Under Secretary for the Foreign Department, and a member of Parliament, in a recent speech to his constituents, expressing satisfaction at the settlement of the American naturalization question, said, that an act had been drafted, to be brought before Parliament at the next session, enabling British subjects to divest themselves of their nationality whenever they choose to do so.

The steamer Monarch, of the royal navy, with George Peabody's remains on board, sailed for the United States on the 21st. Its destination is understood to be Portland, Me.

France.—A popular subscription has been opened for the relief of the Spanish refugees recently ordered by the government to leave the country.

The Journal Officiel has published an imperial decree making new postal arrangements between France and the United States. Letters sent direct, if 10 grammes weight, (about $\frac{1}{3}$ of an ounce Troy,) require prepayment of 60 centimes, (12 cents;) sent via England, 70 centimes, (14 cents.) Stamps are to be obtained of the French administration. Insufficient prepayment renders null that portion paid. Prepayment of all letters carried by French steamers is obligatory.

Italy.—A reduction of the Italian army is said to be proposed.

The only business yet transacted by the Council has been the appointment of committees on Questions of Faith and on Qualifications and Ecclesiastical Discipline. That on Religious Orders was expected to be chosen on the 30th.

The Russo-Polish clergy have instructed their delegates in the Council to oppose the union of the temporal and spiritual power, the dogma of Papal infallibility, the injudicious education of the clergy, and an organization of the College of Cardinals which practically excludes others than Italians.

Spain.—Elections for the Ayuntamientos, which were dissolved by the government, have been ordered and are to commence on the 3d inst. The elections to fill the seats in the Cortes left vacant by the Republican deputies who took an active part in the recent insurrection will take place on the 20th inst. In the Cortes, the republican minority have made an energetic protest against these elections, and they demand the restoration of the former Ayuntamientos. They declare that they will carry the matter before the legal tribunals, but counsel the people in the meantime to keep the peace and to make vigorous efforts at the new elections to return their true friends. The press unanimously demands that before the elections for vacancies in the Cortes, elections be held for municipal councils, in order to terminate the existing unconstitutional situation, the present municipalities having been illegally appointed by the government.

A very large republican meeting was held at Cadiz on the 21st ult. Perfect order prevailed, and the authorities did not interfere.

The American Minister is said to have submitted to the Spanish government a project for guaranteeing neutrality in the matter of ocean telegraphic cables. He had previously assured himself of the British government's approval of the scheme.

China.—Advices from Hong Kong via San Francisco are to 11th mo. 19th. The revised treaty between England and China had been signed by the proper officials of the government, but it had yet to be ratified and accepted by the other foreign governments before it would go into operation. The most important changes are, a modification of the transit dues; the opening of two new ports to commerce; the working of coal mines by foreign appliances, as an experiment, in two places yet to be selected; a reduction of the duty on native coal and other articles; the establishment of bonded warehouses; the navigation of inland waters by vessels not steamers; and a temporary residence in any part of the empire, for foreigners. The Chinese government has also agreed to employ an English barrister to frame, in conjunction with a Judge appointed by the Queen of Great Britain, a code of mercantile laws, to govern all international civil suits. The treaty is believed to be advantageous both to the Chinese and to foreigners.

Japan.—The Mikado has pardoned the late Tycoon and Prince Aidzu, who was a leader of the recent rebellion. A treaty with the foreign representatives has been ratified which is to stop the trading of foreigners with unopened ports.

Domestic.—Edwin M. Stanton, whose appointment as Associate Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court was announced in last week's Summary, died on the morning of the 24th ult. at Washington, D. C., aged 54 years. He had been in very feeble health for some months, his great labors and responsibilities as Secretary of War during the rebellion having broken down his strength, but speedy death was not apprehended until a few hours before the event, and it has called forth a very general expression of sorrow throughout the country.

The latest intelligence respecting the recent election in Texas, although official returns have not yet been received, gives reason to believe that Davis, the radical Republican candidate for Governor, has been elected by 800 majority.

Gov. Bullock of Georgia, has issued a proclamation summoning all those persons elected to the General Assembly of that State under Gen. Meade's proclamation of Sixth month, 25, 1868, who are qualified, to appear in Atlanta on the 10th inst., when persons qualified to hold office in accordance with the law of Congress, will be organized in Senate and House of Representatives as the provisional Legislature of Georgia, for the purpose of promoting the reconstruction of civil government in that State, according to the laws of the United States.

In Mississippi, Gen. Ames, the district commander, has issued an order for the Legislature to convene on the 11th inst, and appointing the Governor and other officers elected at the late election, to serve as provisional officers until formally installed. The Secretary of State elect is a colored man.

The most violent earthquake yet experienced in Eastern California and Nevada, occurred on the 26th inst., but we have no account of any serious damage.

Congress.—Both Houses adjourned from the 22d ult. to the 10th inst. In the Senate a bill was introduced to carry out the reconstruction acts in Virginia, and notice was given that it would be moved as a substitute for the bill on that subject reported from the committee. It directs the military commander of the district to assemble the Legislature already elected, excluding those who cannot take the test-oath; and on the ratification of the 15th amendment by this body, the State shall be admitted to representation in Congress, on the fundamental condition that the State Constitution shall never be so amended as to deprive any citizen of the right to vote, hold office, sit on juries, participate in the school funds, or enjoy equal personal rights with all others under like circumstances. Both Houses adopted a joint resolution authorizing the President to make suitable preparations for the reception of the remains of George Peabody.

THOMAS PIERCE.

BY W. C. WESTLAKE.

The Quarterly Meetings of Dorset and Hants at this period were often held at Bridport and Shaftesbury, and we find such entries as the following in the diary then kept:

"Fourth-day, to Fordingbridge; walked 25 miles; very hot weather. Fifth-day, attended Monthly Meeting, then walked to Southton, 20 miles. Sixth-day, returned home; walked 5 miles; weary." Or again, "Fourth to Sixth day, attending Monthly Meeting at Poole; walked 51 miles." At another time we find, "Second-day, went towards Poole; walked 27 miles. Third, attended Monthly Meeting, and walked 18 miles afterwards. Fourth, walked on towards Bridport, 23 miles. Fifth, attended Quarterly Meeting at Bridport." And the return journey runs—"Walked to Dorchester, (heavy rains) 15 miles; walked to Poole, 27 miles; attended Poole Meeting, and returned home; walked 10 miles." And in some concluding remarks, at the end of 1844, he writes:—"We have been still preserved in the good custom of closing our shop on Fifth-day mornings, whilst we attend our week-day meetings; and I have felt encouraged to persevere in attending our Meetings for Discipline, although it has involved much travelling and time. It has cost me this year more than 700 miles' travelling, the half of which I have walked."

Another way in which he believed himself called to place religious duty before secular concerns, was in his frequent attendance at the Yearly Meeting. Feeling it was required of him to attend on one occasion, he left home at a period when his wife was in a delicate condition, and with only a young daughter in poor health to look to the shop. Being in this trying situation, he mentioned his concern to his dear wife, who "warmly encouraged him to go," which he did, though, as he writes, "receiving pretty freely the condemnation of his relatives." But the simple faith in which he thus yielded to apprehended duty, "not looking at anything, however near and dear, when opposed to the drawings of divine love," went not unrewarded. According to his faith was it unto him. All went well at home, and he returned from London with a thankful heart and with the reward of inward peace. * * *

But not only in time and money spent in connection with Church affairs, was the work of faith manifested. The business of his father, to which he had taken, was that of ready-made clothes and the buying of left-off soldiers' greatcoats and apparel, and the clearing of barracks, to supply the agricultural population in the Island. The latter items formed the mainstay of his trade, but counselled by Friends who thought such dealings inconsistent with his profession, besides some objectionable features connected with the mode of purchase, he resolved to give up that branch, though greatly against his father's entreaty, who warned him that in so doing the other part of his business would assuredly fall away. This came to pass as predicted; his customers gradually disappeared and went where they could supply themselves cheaply with overcoats, &c., and he was brought to a great strait concerning his future maintenance. Just about this crisis, a bootmaker in the town having failed, Thomas Pierce bought a portion of the stock by auction, and having induced a working man in the town to teach him the trade, he commenced manufacturing boots. At the end of this, perhaps the most critical year of his outward history, when he came to balance his accounts he found himself worth precisely the same money as at the beginning! After all his anxieties he could not but regard this remarkable coincidence as in direct answer to prayer, and as evidence that his Heavenly Father would hereafter enable him to provide for his numerous young family. "From that time," said he to the writer, "I have never doubted God's providence over me, and I often look back to it with admiration and thanksgiving."

It was strikingly exemplified through his life that as additional calls were made upon his means, so also did his ability to meet them increase. His business steadily improving, and his means of living being no longer an anxiety to him, he was concerned generously to aid many who were peculiarly cast upon his kindness in later years.*

Amongst various domestic trials which attended his chequered life, we may specially refer to the loss of several of his children in early manhood, and when having tasted of the Lord's goodness and yielded their hearts unto Him, they had given promise of much comfort to their parents and hopes of future usefulness in our section of the Christian Church. Out of 10 children only 3 survived him; but as one after another was thus called away from the scenes of earth to a heavenly inheritance, he and his wife were strengthened together in the hour of trial, and in close sympathy of heart enabled to resign each into the loving hands of an all-wise Saviour. Whilst bowed down under outward sorrow, they were yet able to set up the spiritual Ebenezer, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us."

Amongst these losses was one son, William, who was removed by death in 1853, whilst engaged as teacher in Croydon School, and another son, Edmund, a promising young man, "after his father's own heart," who died at Manchester after a very short illness, leaving a widow and one child also to mourn his loss.

It is not our object to give minute details of his latter life. Whilst diligent in business, to be fervent in spirit serving the Lord, was the aim of his existence, in accordance with the covenant long since made when tossed helplessly upon the ocean; and in so doing he largely obtained the esteem and respect, not only of his fellow-townsmen, but of some in the upper walks of life. "He is always to be depended upon for any good work," was the feeling of those who knew him; and whether in schools, philanthropic societies, town matters, or political affairs, his sterling character gave him an unwonted influence. But throughout all, his attachment to the religious Society to which he belonged, and concern for its welfare, was the prominent and governing feature in his actions.

Much as his loss is felt by a numerous circle of friends and fellow-townsmen, probably there is no arena in which he will be more missed and regretted than in the small monthly meeting to which he belonged, at which his attendance was as regular as it was valuable. On many occasions, when travelling in various parts of the country, although not recorded as a minister amongst the Friends, he was concerned both in public and private to hold forth the language of warning to the lukewarm, and of encouragement to the poor in spirit.

After forty-three years of an union hallowed by many blessings, though encompassed, as we have seen, by many trials, his beloved wife was "called home." She, the indulgent mother and compassionate friend, who had fondly shared in all his vicissitudes, had comforted him by her gentle and devoted affection, and so often cheered him by closest sympathy in many a darksome hour, was now by a very few months to precede him, as we reverently believe, into that ever-glorious city wherein there is neither sorrow nor sighing, for all tears shall there be wiped away. After an illness of several months, borne with Christian resignation and patience, her meek and loving spirit quietly took its flight. They both seemed fully to realize their reunion in the eternal courts above, and he spoke more than once to her of the joy that awaited her in the reunion with her beloved children already before the throne. On the evening after her death, when a friend said to her now bereaved husband, "Grieve not too much, we know that she has gone home," he replied, "My mourning is past, I have nothing to grieve for now; I grieved when she was here in pain and suffering."

But though inwardly borne up under this deep bereavement, it was impossible not to

* As one instance of the blessing attendant on a right act, we may record the following for the encouragement of others similarly circumstanced:—His eldest daughter died in 1853, leaving three children in infant years; and a little while afterwards her husband followed her. The care of their three orphan children became a matter of deep solicitude, as they were thus left unprovided for. With a natural desire to help them, his duty to his own family did not then seem to warrant such an addition to the already numerous household dependent upon him. He earnestly sought counsel of the Lord to direct him aright, and at length he decided to take charge of and properly educate them, sorely against the prudent advice of his own mother and sister, but with the trustful and warm assent of his dear wife. An unexpected increase of business again followed this act, sufficient to make up for his increased expenditure. We might record other instances exemplifying the truth of the words of the wise man, "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth."

perceive the change which such a deprivation produced upon his frame. The loss of companionship of one who had so shared and entered into all his inmost feelings, was indeed poignantly felt, and one of his letters very touchingly alludes to his "lonely condition" now on earth, "—much more so than I had even expected." The keenness of isolation appeared rather to increase as the weeks rolled on, but in the tender compassion of his Heavenly Father the union which had been thus severed on earth was to be soon and for ever restored!

"I am now (he wrote to a friend a little before this time) in my sixty-seventh year, and approaching the limit of my existence in this world, where I have met with much to rejoice over, very much to deeply regret, and abundance of mercy and forgiveness at the hands of that divine Master who has been, in the latter part of my life, 'a lamp unto my feet and a light to my path;' and I can joy and rejoice in Him and feel assured that He who has been my morning light will prove to be my evening song."

Nine weeks after his wife's death he went up to London and attended the Yearly Meeting. He alluded several times to his "journey being nearly ended," and although apparently in usual good health, he spoke of it as attending "once more for the last time." As stated in our last number, he was seized with paralysis at one of the sittings. Remaining motionless when the meeting broke up, some Friends gathered round him and found he was unable to move or speak. On his removal to his lodgings, every attention that the kindest medical skill could bestow was unavailing. He never spoke again, but after ten days' illness, calmly and peacefully breathed his last.

He was interred in the Friends' Burial-ground at Stoke Newington, amongst the graves of many loved and honored Friends who had gone before; the silence around the grave, (where were gathered many from different parts, attracted by deep common sympathy for the survivors and love for the departed,) was broken by the impressive words, "I am the resurrection and the life; whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die;" and again was the same glorious language of his Lord and Saviour revived in the solemn assembly held afterwards in the Meeting-house.

Our task is done; but not without a keen sense of personal loss can we bid adieu to one with whom we have been long associated. We have so far exceeded the length proposed for this memoir, that we may now safely leave it to carry its own lessons, and point its own moral. Although very uncompromising as a Friend, Thomas Pierce displayed a wide charity towards those who differed from him, seeking to rejoice over the grounds of union rather than to find out and magnify the points of difference; and many who knew him as an acquaintance, would hardly be prepared for the genuine cheerfulness of tone which was manifested in his conversation and outward life. That the memory of an upright man, fearing God and loving the truth as it is in Jesus, may not quickly fade away, we have ventured thus imperfectly to portray his life—his death—but what pen can describe, or tongue tell, of that far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory now revealed, after these light afflictions which were as but for a moment!—Friends' Quarterly Examiner.

THE NEED OF BIBLE KNOWLEDGE IN EARLY LIFE.

In looking over the broad field of Christian labor, that ever widens when viewing the necessity for energetic and persevering action, the subject of live Scripture schools and of faithful Bible teaching, seems to me of great weight; and I have queried much as to how a higher degree of success in this work can be attained; what is most needed to secure the attainment of a more earnest and holy zeal for the promotion of this cause amongst us, that would secure to us, and especially to the lambs of the fold, a groundwork of principle and a true foundation of faith in the seed time of life.

To all these queries the answer of Inspiration comes most forcibly—"if any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." Then follow in the mind the explanatory words, "Behold the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding."

We may safely conclude, if we feel any lack, that we ask of God, and so often as we feel a lack we continue to ask; and in so doing I do believe we will dwell more continually in His spirit; and if so dwelling, have we not the promise of that which alone can lead us to find the best and right way to make our Bible instructions lively, practical and effectual, securing encouraging appreciation? That this is a work from which we cannot be excused, let us hear the Divine command concerning the teachings of Scripture: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words which I command thee shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates." Deut. vi.-5 to 10. "By the study of the Bible, the mind of man is brought into contact with the mind of God."

The Saviour said "search the Scriptures," and the Apostle testifies "they are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith, which is in Christ Jesus." I find no chapter or text which releases us at any period of life from the study of the Scriptures. But, do we sufficiently realize the importance of the time of beginning this study, or of teaching it? Solomon said, "train up a child in the way in which he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." The prophet says, "Whom shall he teach knowledge, and whom shall he make to understand doctrine? Them that are weaned from the milk and drawn from the breasts. For precept must be upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little." "The first seven years of life are more important than parents are aware. In them are sown the seeds of all that is good and amiable in character, or most that is evil. The most effectual corrector, even at this early period, is the Bible." And since the condition of a child is that to which we must come to receive the blessed Saviour, I conceive that childhood is the important season in which to sow the seed. For at mature age we have to make use of all the child-like simplicity of confidence that remains in our nature to help us exercise faith in God's word or His promises. Faith, that very simple and yet difficult thing to be obtained, after leaving childhood, that makes us a child of Christ. "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no wise enter therein." Receive it with child-like confidence, believing from the heart, that "Jesus died for me, even me."

The need of early culture cannot be sufficiently estimated; of beginning with the bud or germ. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand." I am impressed that the weight of the command is in the morning; "wait not for the noon-day sun, nor for the evening shade. Pre-occupy the ground. Seek the dew of God's blessing, and our children shall be numbered among the lambs of Christ's flock."

"The lambs of Jesus, who are they,
But children who believe and pray—
That keep God's laws and ask His grace,
And seek a heavenly dwelling place.
The lambs of Jesus they are meek,
The words of peace and truth they speak;
To all God's creatures they are kind,
And, like their Lord, of gentle mind."

They may, and probably will be, more vivacious, sprightly, lively and buoyant in juvenile life, than afterwards. This is natural; religion tends to happiness,—cheerfulness and joyfulness are commendable, the fruits of faith and hope in God.

The "fruit of the Spirit is love, peace, joy, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith."

"Religion never was designed To make our pleasures less."

It imparts true pleasure and abiding peace, and sweetens everything in life. The child Samuel heard the voice or call of the Lord, when aged Eli did not. "May we sow the seed in faith, and the Lord will take care of it." To us teachers the poet has said,

"O'er wayward children would'st thou hold firm rule,
And sun thee in the light of happy faces?
Love, Hope and Patience—these must be thy graces,
And in thy own heart let them first keep school."

The Bible says, "He that winneth souls is wise," not drives, but wins by love and kindness. May we strive to imitate our blessed Master, who so loved us that he gave himself for us; and we will be able to

"Breathe o'er our labors, the fervent prayer
That the shadows of grace may dwell richly there."

Finally, as there can be no success of lasting benefit without the sure influence of the Holy Spirit, let us ever seek to dwell very near to Christ, for Scripture assures us "our labor cannot be in vain in the Lord."

DEMONSTRATION AGAINST FEMALE PREACHERS.

The Free Presbytery of Orkney met in Kirkwall on Tuesday week.

After some routine business had been disposed of, Mr. Roy said there was a small matter which he wished to introduce, and he would do so by putting a question to the clerk. Was it true that a female had been officiating in the Free Church of Harray?

Mr. White said it was quite true that on his way down from the Assembly, a Miss Smiley, from Baltimore, handed him a letter of introduction from his friend Mr. Dixon, of Leith. The lady, who was a very accomplished person, was accompanied by Mr. Fox, of Liverpool, and he gave them an invitatiod to visit him at Harray when they returned to Orkney from Shetland, should they find it convenient. They called, and spent two days with him, and requested that they might be allowed to conduct meetings in the church. Through conversation and otherwise, he had satisfied himself as to her soundness in the faith, and he confessed that thereafter she had spoken in his church, but during the whole service she did not give utterance to a single statement with which he could find fault. He did not, however, announce the meeting from the pulpit, but simply made it known to one or two people. These were the circumstances of the case, and on points of doctrine he was prepared to vindicate her opinions.

Mr. Roy said, the main question at issue was, would the Free Church, or would that presbytery, tolerate female preaching in their churches?

Mr. Armour thought Mr. White should be allowed to make a remark; it was for the information of the presbytery. For himself he might say that if Mr. White was bad, he (Mr. Armour) was four times worse. The lady spoke only once in Harray, whereas they heard her four times in Sanday.

Mr. Roy continued—The question was not whether any particular lady or ladies should speak the truth, but whether it was agreeable to the custom of the Free Church and in accordance with Scripture that females should speak at all. He believed it was both inconsistent with the practice of the Church and unscriptural, and he could not see how Mr. White, who had all along objected to lay preaching, could consistently favor female preaching. Some were amazed that Mr. White would have allowed any such thing. He (Mr. Roy) was amazed himself to think how that one so perfectly orthodox should permit a layman, far less a female, to address a meeting in his church. One brother said, Mr. White would not allow Hopkins to speak in his church, but this was as bad as Hopkins; another said it was worse. When the report of the occurrence became noised abroad, it had a very bad effect. Mr. White's opinions were well known, and the argument used by the people was: If Mr. White has done this so ought you; there was no fear of him doing anything wrong. Mr. Armour seems to think that he is in the same position. He (Mr. Roy) wished the presbytery to express its disapproval of female preaching, so that in future such practices should not occur. He would therefore move that—"Whereas 'female preaching' has been permitted within two congregations within the bounds, and whereas female preaching is inconsistent with the practice of the Church, and opposed to Scripture, the presbytery enjoin on all the brethren within the bounds to discourage this unscriptural course by refusing the use of their churches, and generally by enlightening the minds of their people in the Scriptural nature of the gospel ministry."

Mr. Robb seconded the motion.

Mr. Armour said he was in the same position as Mr. White, it was true, and perhaps in a worse position, and this from the fact that they (the Sanday people) had four instead of one meeting, and were sorry that they had not more. (Mr. White—Hear, hear.) He did not shrink from taking his stand, and to vindicate the steps he had taken. As this matter had been formally brought up by Mr. Roy, and as he was pressing a motion on the presbytery to restrict him (Mr. Armour) in all matters in the future in regard to what he might consider his duty, he felt bound to make a statement—(Mr. White—Hear, hear)—in regard to the way in which he viewed the question. He believed he was quite agreed, and held as firmly as Mr. Roy possibly could do what was termed the Church's order in the matter, and what he had done was not in any way contrary thereto. The understanding in the Church was, that those who should preach the gospel, administer ordinances, and conduct public worship, should be such as were found qualified by the office-bearers of the Church, and set apart for the office. This was the order, and he did not differ from Mr. Roy regarding it, but on the contrary agreed with him thoroughly that they were bound to follow it, and that there was Scriptural authority as well as the arrangement of the Church regarding it. There was therefore no difference of opinion among them. Mr. White and he (Mr. Armour) held as strong an opinion upon that question as any of them could do, and he hoped the presbytery would not set them down as having doubts as to the order in the Church in regard to these matters. (No, no.) But there was an exception to every general rule, and he held the Church had given its sanction in regard to laymen speaking in public. (Mr. White—Hear, hear.) This was practised within the bounds of their own presbytery, and there was not a single whisper of disapprobation regarding it. (Mr. White—Hear, hear.) He thought they would be doing what was very wrong if they agreed to Mr. Roy's proposal, to prevent parties who had not been examined by the office-bearers of the Church from taking part in public ministrations. The Church was left in regard to laymen, to use her wisdom as to the liberty to be allowed them to address their fellow-men. He therefore hoped that to that part of the motion the presbytery would not agree. It would be presumption to do so. It was quite understood that every member of presbytery could object to laymen officiating in his church, but he thought it would be very unwise in the presbytery as a body to object to that in any case. It mattered not whether it was Brownlow North, or any other Christian layman who proclaimed the way of salvation. It would be observed the question narrowed itself to the fact that the individual who had spoken was a woman. It was not as to lay preaching, but as to a woman—a Christian woman—being allowed to tell them the way of salvation. It was not even as to female preaching, for in this case it had to be proved whether it would be right to call it female preaching. (Mr. White—

Hear, hear.) It was simply whether the presbytery was to come unanimously to the conclusion that female lips were never to tell the sweet story of the way of salvation. To carry this out—and if it was a good thing it should be done—the presbytery ought to agree that no female should henceforth engage in Sabbath-school teaching. The question therefore was, whether a Christian woman was to be allowed to tell sinners about Jesus. Was it Scriptural? It had been denied that it was so. He held that it was thoroughly Scriptural, thoroughly rational, and would glance at a few references to the subject in the Scriptures—

The Moderator—Let's hear your Scripture texts for female preaching.

Mr. Armour.—There was reference to females being led to open their mouths in public, and he found that often there was not the slightest disapprobation of females declaring the truths of the gospel. The prophecy of Joel, quoted by the apostle Peter on the day of Pentecost, presented the Scripture argument fully and explicitly for use in apostolic, and afterwards in New Testament revival times. Philip had four daughters who prophesied, and in the case of old Anna it was done in the very temple itself. In the 68th Psalm it was said a great multitude having received the word from the Lord were to publish it.

The Moderato having signified incredulity,

Mr. Armour proceeded—You may shake your head, Moderator. When you come to the epistles you have Paul, as in the 11th chapter of 1st Corinthians, referring to females not only praying but prophesying, which they understood to mean preaching or speaking in public, and he never exhibited the slightest displeasure at it, only prescribing that they should keep their bonnets on, and farther on in the 14th chapter of that epistle females praying or prophesying was not said to be wrong. It was talking in congregations, and nothing else, that was condemned. It seemed that in the church at Corinth women had got into the habit of asking questions at their husbands in the church and disturbing the congregations, and those who hinged the exclusion of females from declaring those things pertaining to our peace upon that chapter would require to amend their exegesis of it. Paul, when speaking in the last chapter of the Romans, of Phœbe, ordered them to help her in every possible way in doing good, a phrase which covered a great deal. He (Mr. Armour) was speaking of an exception, and as only to be looked upon favorably either by the apostle or the presbyter when there was evidence that the person was capable, and, as Mr. White had said, "sound in the faith." There was nothing objectionable regarding the way in which Miss Smiley conducted the services. She was not a blue-stocking—

The Moderator did not want to hear her character.

Mr. Armour would only say that her addresses were not only in accordance with the doctrines of the Free Church in reference to all pertaining to the way of salvation, but were admirably suitable—being full of tenderness and power. He would also say he would never forget the preciousness of those addresses—

The Moderator.—Would you really conclude?

Mr. Armour.—Miss Smiley had left her native country not to go over to England, Scotland, or Ireland, but to visit these Islands in the exuberance of her loving-kindness. He hoped the presbytery would think twice before restricting individual ministers in similar circumstances in any arbitrary way.

Mr. White said Mr. Roy had made a statement regarding him which was quite unwarrantable, and he demanded to know his authority. Mr. Roy stated he (Mr. White) objected to lay preaching all along. He would like to know when he heard him object to lay preaching? But with reference to the point whether it was a man or a woman that was employed he would give them his authority for all he had done, and he read a report by Dr. Candlish on the subject, which received the approval of the General Assembly of the Church.

The Moderator—You give that as your authority?

Mr. White said that was the authority of the General Assembly officially given, and from all he had heard of the lady referred to, he was prepared to act upon this declaration as an individual minister, and give his decision as to the suitableness of the lady in question for proclaiming the truth of the gospel to her fellow-men. He therefore begged to move the previous question.

The Rev. Mr. Sinclair said he should like to read a few texts of Scripture. The question before the presbytery was not as to lay preaching, nor as to the soundness in the faith of any individual, male or female, though of course to introduce into a church as a teacher any person heretical in doctrine was a great aggravation of the evil; but the question was, the lawfulness of a female, however orthodox, being admitted as a public teacher in the Church. All else was irrelevant, and the appeal must be made directly "to the law and the testimony." Mr. Sinclair then quoted a number of passages bearing on the question under discussion, and proceeded to say that he could quite understand, and would highly approve of a Christian lady gathering together some of her own sex, reading to them, speaking to them about their souls, praying with them, and the like—as was done, for example, in those "mothers' meetings" which were held in Edinburgh, and elsewhere, for that was not "usurping authority over the man," and was quite in accordance with Scripture precept and example. In conclusion, he thought their excellent friends, Mr. White and Mr. Armour, should frankly admit they had made a mistake, and say they would not do so again.

Mr. Wilson would have preferred that this subject had not been introduced, for if it was a mistake committed by two of their friends and brethren, it would, to his mind, have been better to have had it corrected privately, and that they should have come to a mutual understanding on the subject. He confessed their two brethren had done things quite unwarranted by the rules, and also contrary to the generally received and established opinion of the Church—doing that which was not only opening the door to confusion, but subjecting other ministers and other people to great annoyance. What Mr. White had read did not apply to the case at all. He did not believe the Assembly had any female preaching in view when they adopted the report.

Mr. White admitted that.

Mr. Wilson thought it was peculiarly necessary at present, when the Church had sustained so much injury through the preaching of unauthorized persons, that the brethren of the presbytery should exercise caution. If the ministry was to be properly upheld, ministers themselves must take care not to encourage those who were unauthorized to hold meetings, making it appear as if the presbytery were at sixes and sevens on the subject. He believed the women could do much more good in private in the family, and as Sabbath-school teachers.

Mr. Stuart (Kirkwall) was not aware he could add anything to the admirable remarks just made by Mr. Wilson. He had never listened to a speech to which he could have added Amen with greater cordiality. He (Mr. Stuart) would be sorry if there should be any implied censure in the motion before them, and he should like it to be distinctly understood that he only wished to have the practice discontinued. They had not dealt with their brethren in private, and he did not think they should come down upon them with a public censure. (Mr. White.—Hear, hear.) At the same time he most assuredly would stand up for some distinct intimation from the presbytery that it should not occur again. On that ground he supported the motion.

Mr. Roy said his friend Mr. Wilson, while very forcibly condemning the practice of female preaching or teaching publicly, as not agreeable to Scripture, stated that for his own part he would perhaps have liked that the matter had been spoken of privately. Mr. Roy then gave his reading of certain passages of Scripture which had been quoted. Could anything, he said, be plainer than the distinction of sexes there drawn, and the distinction of duties devolving on them? If men need stronger proof than these passages he pitied their understandings. The question was whether it was Scriptural or not. Two of their brethren said it was, others that it was not. Passing from the chief argument he would ask—Did the Society of Friends preach sound doctrines?

Mr. White—Yes.

Mr. Roy—And did Mr. White inquire whether this lady held all the fundamental doctrines of their (the Free) Church?

Mr. White was quite satisfied she did.

Mr. Roy—Does this lady hold the great doctrine of "imputed guilt?" If she did, he had to say that he found from the account of the Quakers in the Cyclopedia of Religious Denominations, given by one of the Society, that they did not believe that mankind was punishable for Adam's sin, or that we partake of his guilt until we make it our own by transgressions of the Divine law. Were they then to permit parties, especially females, to use their churches for the purpose, it might be, of in the end propagating their peculiar doctrines—doctrines opposed, as they thought, to the Word of God? He trusted this would not be permitted. He had been compelled, from a sense of duty, to bring that matter forward, but he hoped that Mr. White, Mr. Armour, and himself would still continue friends. ("Surely, surely," from Mr. White and Mr. Armour.) If it was agreeable to the presbytery, he would be satisfied with the distinct expression of opinion now given by brethren in opposition to female preaching, and would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Stuart, Kirkwall, would not object to this.

Mr. Robb said the motion could not be withdrawn without the consent of the seconder. Now he thought the question one of great importance, and as Mr. White and Mr. Armour seemed to treat the remarks of the brethren somewhat contemptuously, he could not consent to its withdrawal.

Mr. White protested against the proceedings.

The Moderator—Does any person second Mr. White's motion?

Mr. Armour—I do.

The roll was then called, when there voted for Mr. Roy's motion,—Messrs. Roy, Rose, Stuart, Wilson, Robb, Meason, and Seatter; and for Mr. White's motion—Messrs. White and Armour. Mr. Sinclair declined to vote, and Mr. Spence had left the meeting before the roll was called.

Mr. Roy's motion was thereupon declared carried.

Mr. White then craved leave to protest and dissent, for reasons to be given in due time, reserving to himself leave to appeal to the ensuing General Assembly should he see fit.

Mr. Armour joined Mr. White in his protest.—Scotsman.

[The above notice is one of various articles the insertion of which has been delayed by the space given to the proceedings of the First-day School Conference. In the Scotsman of Tenth mo. 16th appears the following paragraph:]

"The latest information from the Free Presbytery of Orkney represents the agitators for female orders as masters of the situation. The ministers who were recently censured for employing Miss Smiley in their pulpits, and who appealed against the sentence to the General Assembly, have announced their intention of not prosecuting the appeal, for the very intelligible, though rather startling reason that they mean to take the law into their own hands, and disregard the sentence. In the conclusion of a long document, defending the employment of female clergy as both legal and scriptural, they say—'Notwithstanding the threatened pains and penalties of which they heard, in the event of the judgment being disregarded, they refuse to be bound by any injunction of the Presbytery, which they conceive has no warrant either in the word of God, rightly interpreted, nor in the Standards of the Church.' This seems tolerably like insubordination; but the only notice the Presbytery seems to have taken of the rebels was to appoint a committee to answer them. Probably they are afraid to vindicate their authority by any stronger measures, in view of the extreme popularity which the female ministry appears to enjoy among the island population. For, as our ecclesiastical readers may have noticed from the statistics furnished a day or two ago by the Free Church clergyman of Delting, the demand for Miss Smiley's pulpit labors amounts to quite a furore. In fifty days she preached fifty-eight times, occasionally, when the churches admitted of it, drawing an audience of nearly 1500 people. This is interesting, not merely as a curiosity of local taste, but as the possible commencement of a considerable ecclesiastical revolution."

[It was our design to accompany this article with some remarks on the general question involved, but for this we can afford to wait. An earnest spirit of inquiry has been raised, and the honest inquirer, Bible in hand, will probably find unscriptural prejudices to fade, and may probably arrive at the conclusion that the Biblical argument against woman's preaching consists but in a superficial construction of a few texts, without reference to the local usages to which they have reference. Also, that the direct application of Joel's prophecy is conclusive, and that a well confirmed gift and call of the Holy Spirit, followed by such evidences as can be adduced in thousands of instances, ought not to be forbidden or withstood.]—Ed.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 8, 1870.

A Religious Revival the True Remedy for Worldliness.—How often the plaintive cry is heard that "the ways of Zion do mourn because the people will not come to her solemn feasts." In how many instances is it found that a congregation, and even a whole religious organization, appears stagnant—little or no growth in the vital truth, coldness, formality and spiritual sloth prevailing among the professors of the most worthy Name, and those to whom Christ is indeed precious oppressed by the lethargy around them, and almost forgetful that a Power exists, within access by prayer, which is abundantly able out of the very stones to raise up children unto Abraham. The cry is heard, "the Fathers, where are they?" as though those Fathers had inherent or unattainable qualities to uphold the Church—as though there were not materials lying around from which that qualifying Power can restore judges and counsellors sufficient for all the emergencies of the Church. In such a condition pastoral care is wanting, the flock stray on the mountains, and many a lamb falls into a pit on the Sabbath day. Alas, we cannot say, "Happy is the people that is in such case!"

There was a time in the reign of David when the message was given that when they should "hear the sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry trees," they were to go forward, accepting it as a sign that the Lord was with them. And when the rush was heard and the branches quivered, the people in reverential awe knew of a certainty that their Helper and Guide, the Strength of their life and their Portion forever, was going before them, and that their strength no longer consisted in sitting still. Even so it sometimes pleases the object of our worship to descend by his Spirit in a marked and peculiar manner, moving the light-hearted and careless ones who had been as leaves and branches tossing in the air, shaking the sturdy limbs and even the massy trunks rooted in the earth, thus making His power known. Well is it then to know His voice, to rejoice in His coming, and to be a willing people in the day of His power. "Jesus of Nazareth passeth by!" His arm is outstretched to help and save. He has granted the prayer that had so long, and, alas! so faintly and with so little faith ascended, and has revived His work in the midst of the years. Every Christian has desired a revival—many but vaguely, and as a hopeless thing. Are any alarmed now that it has come, and fearful that the adorable Author thereof will fail to conduct it with safety and discretion? Be it that there may be in some a degree of excitement attendant upon a transition from death unto life, upon a sense of sin forgiven, upon a joyous consciousness that the whole world is valueless compared with the newly-found pearl of great price. Has not this been ever the case, especially with certain temperaments? The soul just awakened sees men as trees walking, and the deep quiet, the calmness of a spirit settled in Him who is the Centre, is a farther advance than that of the ardent rejoicing child, thankful to the Father, running to do His will, and sometimes, in the sincere desire to serve, even running unsent. The child may stumble, but the loving and lenient Father holds him up, and in due time trains him to the steady gait of the young man and strong man. Praise and bless God for the revival! for the blessing of growth. If there be exuberance, the good Husbandman has a pruning hook. "The trees of the Lord are full of sap," and let all the trees of the wood rejoice. It seems as though the very air was redolent of mercy.

"All-moving Spirit! freely forth
At thy command the strong wind goes;
Its errand to the passive earth
Nor art can stay, nor strength oppose,
Until it fold its weary wing
Once more within the hand divine."

May all the churches, and all the people composing them, be wise enough to know the day of their visitation, and the things that belong unto their peace. Then will they not wait till the visitation of Divine revival has passed over, but be found workers together with God, and agreeing in energetic wrestling in prayer for conversion and for pardon, for the new birth unto holiness; and this for fathers and mothers, for sons and daughters, for the strangers within our gates, for all those for whom we feel the Spirit making intercession.

We hear of the children of Christian professors given up to worldliness, and indulging in novel-reading, theatre-going, card-playing and dancing. What do they need? Is the moral malady to be reached by logical discourses and treatises upon the evil and inconsistency of such an occupation of the precious, fleeting moments which ought to be spent to the glory of God? Do they not know all this? Is it knowledge that is wanting? They require that their hearts should be touched, (to quote a passage from our Correspondence of to-day,) "as with a live coal from off the holy altar of the stupendous sacrifice." Let them have the benefit of godly examples; let them feel the influence of devotional surroundings; let them experience (if we may so speak) the magnetism of praying hearts, of mighty prayers that draw down blessings. Let them know that their friends feel that their souls are precious, and yearn and plead for their highest good. The wound of our people will be but slightly healed by arguments for consistency, by urging the example of the Fathers and advocating the good old ways. The malady lies deep, and needs a deeper remedy. We were impressed by the recent remark of a Friend: "Nothing will meet the case but the convicting, converting power of the Spirit of the Almighty. If we are truly converted, we shall give up the world." A RELIGIOUS REVIVAL IS THE CURE FOR WORLDLINESS.

THE SOUL'S CRAVING.—As we penned the above paragraphs, the post brought us a letter from a beloved Friend fn Carolina, from which we venture to extract a passage consonant with our current of thought and feeling at the moment:

"My soul does long for the sure proof of the Divine call and unction to be more largely witnessed in our ministry, in the accompanying power and near access in prayer to our Heavenly Father, fully persuaded, as I am, of the efficacy of prayer, and that the Head of the Church, seeing the need among His people of a more efficient labor, would not be slack concerning His promise to even the two on earth who should agree as touching anything that they should ask. I have felt deeply exercised on behalf of our beloved Society, that there might be a coming, with one accord, to the throne of grace, in prayer for this special blessing, (while we plead for a sending forth of more laborers into the vineyard,)—a more lively unction. Then might we not hope in truth to witness vastly increased revivals of the Lord's work in the midst of these our years, confirming, cheering onward the faithful believers, stirring up those who hold the dim lights to fill and trim anew—shaking the dry bones—bringing the dead to life, the lost and wandering to the ark of safety. I know the people to be thus wrought upon are free agents, and without their part is done, the preacher preacheth but in vain; though Paul plant and Apollos water, the increase cometh of the Lord; and again, He knoweth all our needs before we ask Him. But it has been repeatedly brought to my mind, that, in our individual experience, and as a Christian Church, we have not enjoyed all the privileges of the Christian to ask and receive good through our Mediator. We have failed to gather spiritual wealth, because, as a dear friend said at our Select Yearly Meeting, 'we have prayed too much for everything in general and nothing in particular;' a spirit of unbelief existing, as to our being invited to draw near like little children, and make known our special wants, expecting, as do the trusting little ones, to receive that for which they ask, willing, too, to receive it just in His, the dear Father's, own way; who loves His children so well He will not upbraid them for this asking, neither deny them aught that is for their good or the promotion of His cause."

BOOK OF MEETINGS IN AMERICA.—Those who are possessed of this valuable manual (especially Correspondents and Mo. Meeting Clerks) will find it desirable to make in their copies the corrections and additions furnished by the publishers, whose care in this matter confers a benefit upon the Society at large.

DIED.

MONTGOMERY.—On the 15th of Eleventh mo., 1869, in her 25th year, Martha Montgomery, daughter of Job and Prudence Estle, after a lingering illness, which she bore with much patience and resignation; a member of Westfield Mo. Meeting, Ind.

SHAW.—Near Adrian, Mich., on the 11th of Eleventh month, 1869, Lewis Shaw, son of Nathan and Miriam Shaw, in his 23d year; a member of Birch Lake Monthly Meeting. He bore his sufferings with great patience and resignation, leaving to those about him a firm assurance that through adorable mercy he was prepared to enter the mansions of eternal rest and peace.

BATES.—At her residence near Smithfield, Jefferson Co., Ohio, Mary P., wife of Joseph D. Bates' in the 73d year of her age; a member of Smithfield Monthly Meeting. She was a true friend to the poor and afflicted, administering with her own hands and means, as ability was afforded, to their comfort and relief. Being in feeble health for the lest three years, she seldom had the privilege of attending meetings for public worship, yet she manifested a deep interest in the welfare of our religious Society, often lamenting the departure of some from its primitive principles. Her last illness was very short, but she evinced strong faith and hope in her blessed Saviour, and her friends have the consoling evidence that her end was peace.

GREGG.—Of pulmonary disease, at the residence of her father, West Milton, Ohio, on the 19th of 3d mo., 1869, Anna E., daughter of Smith and Rachel Gregg, in the 17th year of her age; a member of West Branch Mo. Meeting. Her end was peace.

THE ASSOCIATED EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF FRIENDS ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Will meet in PHILADELPHIA on Fourth-day, the 19th of First month, 1870, at 3 o'clock P.M.

The sub-committee on Education at 8 A.M. of the same day.

The Washington Committee at 4 P.M. of the day preceding. JOHN B. GARRETT, Clerk.

HOME FOR AGED AND INFIRM COLORED PERSONS, 340 S. Front St., Philadelphia.

This Institution, to which many Friends are contributors, will hold its Annual Meeting on Fifth-day evening next, First mo. 13th, at the Franklin Institute, Seventh below Market. All who feel interested are invited.

Twenty-five colored women, whose ages range from near 70 to 99 years, are now cared for in the Institution, and have, during the past year, been so favored with health that not a death has occurred.

The large number of applicants awaiting admission makes it very desirable that enlarged accommodations should be secured, and any who feel like aiding in this good work can forward their contributions to the Treasurer, SAMUEL R. SHIPLEY, 111 S. Fourth St.

INDIAN CORRESPONDENCE.

Indian Agency, near Fort Sill, Indian Territory.
Eleventh month, 14, 1869.

Your very acceptable letter of the 18th ult. was here when we arrived at this place one week ago to-day, about one o'clock, and it was a treat to us to read it, as we came in tired from our journey. How true was your mind's eye view of us, as we pursued our tedious way across the wide prairie at the rate of 25 miles a day. It was a slow way of going 400 miles. We were 19 days on the road, having travelled about 16 days. We camped out 16 nights, all but three. We saw many interesting things—buffaloes, antelopes, wolves, prairie dogs, rattlesnakes, wild turkeys, prairie chickens, etc., of the animal kind. It was an interesting trip, but one that we do not wish to repeat for a while. Did you ever see movers going out West in their wagons, looking dirty and wretched? I imagine that we looked a little like them, only there were not many folks to see us much of the way. Of one thing I am sure, we were very dirty. The road was very dusty, the most of the way, and the wind blew so that some days we were thoroughly coated, and the black stuff was hard to get off. And our clothes! What a time we had washing them last week! But we lived well; we laid in a good supply of provisions at Lawrence, and our men killed a good deal of game by the way,—chickens, ducks and squirrels. At Wichita, where we crossed the Arkansas River, a man gave us a quarter of beef, and two days after we got some buffalo and two turkeys of the Indians, and our boys killed two more turkeys. Farther on a return train gave us a piece of beef that they had killed the day before, and four days before we got through we killed a dozen wild turkeys and had one of them left when we got here. We laid in a good supply of bread when we started; stopped to bake twice before we got out of Kansas; and as we stopped two days on account of our mules, we did baking then, which took us nearly through.

The Agency here is built of sun-dried brick, plastered inside and outside; is one story high, and the main part about 90 feet long by 18 feet wide, divided into five rooms with a hall, and running back about 30 feet and 14 feet wide. There are fire-places in the two end rooms and the kitchen, and no chance to heat the others. As yet we are living in one family—altogether about 30 of us. Some are leaving; when all such have gone, there will be, I suppose, about 20 in the family. Several of our company came down to put up a steam saw-mill, which it was supposed would be erected some miles away, but they now intend putting it up within a mile; so all will remain here I suppose. Two women came from Iowa with their husbands to do the cooking. We are expecting to do our own cooking, but I hardly know how it will be. At present there are not stoves and vessels enough for us to have a separate establishment, and it seems to be preferred that we should board with the rest. Perhaps we may go to ourselves next month.

The house stands near a rather nice creek—Cache(pronounced Cash)—and on low ground; it is supposed to be in an unhealthy location. We cannot see much of the country from here—the prairies around are rolling, and a few miles to the west of us are low mountains—a chain 12 miles wide, and extending 60 miles to the west, they say, called the Wichita Mountains. Fort Sill is 3 miles N. W. from us. It is an encampment of tents with a few frame houses for the stores and officers.

When we came here a week ago the Indians were encamped nearly all around the house. I should think there were 50 or 100 wigwams in sight. The prairie was burning, and they had moved in here for safety. They have been going away for several days, and now are nearly all gone.

We had a pretty sudden introduction to the Indian mode of life. They have been all around us, peeping into the windows, watching what we are doing, coming into the house and squatting about, variously dressed in their moccasins, leggings, etc., with blankets, their faces painted, carrying their bows and arrows, and some revolvers, (though I guess they are minus the ammunition.) Some of them, I ought to say, are almost entirely naked, especially the children. It seemed indeed like being in a strange country and amongst a strange people, but we are trying to go on and attend to our own business and let them alone.

When we came, the room intended for us had an Indian family in it; the man was white, the woman Indian. They had only been there a short time. They went out the next morning, and we put in Second-day scrubbing it, which was a big job, as the floor was rough oak boards laid down when green, and there had been no cleaning done since plastering. Third-day we washed, and Fourth-day Mahalah ironed all day. In the meantime I was trying to knock up some furniture arrangements. Understand that we were turned into a bare room entirely destitute of anything of the kind. The first day I got the windows so I could raise and lower them, something after the style I did in your house last summer; next I made a couple of three-legged benches and put planks on them for our bed. Since then, as I have had opportunity, I have made a rough three-legged stand, (at which we are now writing,) and got out stuff to make a decent table and bedstead; I hope to get them completed this week. As for seats, sometimes we can get two chairs, and sometimes we sit on trunks and boxes. My seat now is the end of Mahalah's trunk. Only part of our things have come yet. Two boxes were sent around as freight to come with the saw mills, etc. There are said to be two cooking stoves, chairs, etc., coming with it also, wnich were purchased in Chicago. Maybe they will come soon, and maybe about Christmas.

We have been trying to get the run of, and help Lawrie some in his business. Having been absent so long, of course there is an accumulation of it. The plan is for Mahalah to clerk for him, and for me to clerk or help in the commissary department. I was over yesterday and saw them issuing rations to the Indians. There seem to be many difficulties about our taking hold of that work, and I doubt if we do. I expect that I shall have to go back to Washita River, 40 miles distant, this week, to measure some land that has been broken there this summer. It will be a long, lonesome trip. . . . .

First-day the 21st, 11th mo.

Third-day I made the trip alluded to, to the Washita River, to measure some land plowed there this summer. Dr. Upton went with me; we took the ambulance and two men. The wind was blowing a gale from the North, directly in our faces, and withal quite cold. We stopped with a man who went up along with us the most of the way from the Fort; this man has been living in this country with the Indians for seventeen years, and has an Indian wife, though she did not seem to live much at home. There were about 20 of us there that night, some Indians, some Mexicans, and some from several of the States. We took our provision, but he insisted that we should eat with them, which we did, and had a splendid supper and breakfast of meat, bread and coffee, having venison for breakfast. He had a small pole pen with a thatched roof in which they cooked and ate, and our sitting fire was a log heap in the yard. Perhaps some of them slept in the house, but not many, I guess. As for us we slept in the ambulance without taking anything off, and had hard work to keep warm with all our blankets. But still we slept on the banks of the Washita, to the music of a waterfall 300 or 400 yards distant. We got the land measured before noon, making 253 acres out of what he thought would be 500, and came home that night, I having the sick headache of course.

Our living, as perhaps you are aware, is the soldier's rations, that we draw at the Post Commissary at the Fort. We can get fresh beef every day at the butcher pen. If we want extras we can buy them at the sutler's store at the Post, or Lawrie can buy them at the Post Commissary at the wholesale prices that they cost the Government, which of course makes them very cheap, as cheap as they can be had at home. We have not yet settled whether we shall do our own cooking or not, but we want to if we can get the chance.

ELI JAY.

Kiowa and Comanche Agency, Fort Sill, Indian Territory, Eleventh month, 23, 1869.

My Dear Friends:—Eli has been engaged on letters to you off and on for some time. His regular work does not begin till next month, or rather the military authorities do not pass it over to Agent Tatum's care till then, so he has had some leisure for writing, amongst the jobs of work he has been doing. On the contrary, for me, the office work, which had got sadly behind hand, has been pressing ever since we got here, and I have had very little time for private correspondence. I got my pen and paper yesterday afternoon to write to you separately, but was scarcely commenced when a fresh set of work came on which lasted till bed time. So this morning I concluded I would write what I had to say to all of you together, as to-morrow is mail day, and I might not get any part in the letter if I deferred longer. Eli has told you the principal events of our journey; perhaps I can tell you the cook's part, which will be new. We got two little sheet-iron stoves, a mere box divided about in the middle, the front for the fire, the back part for the oven; the oven was double sheet-iron, with a space around the inside part for the heat and smoke to draw around. Our bread pans would hold nine small loaves like biscuits, and one pan was all the oven held; then there were places on top to set in our coffee boilers. We had, for cooking over a camp-fire, two frying-pans, and a camp kettle, and new pie-pans, and tin-cups for our dishes,—so were we equipped for the journey. Perhaps you would think it was fun to cook so, but fun may last too long to be funny,—to cook for seventeen people, with appetites keen from exercise in the fresh, cold air, was something of a job when we stopped all tired from travel, especially when we had biscuit to make, as it took from six to ten ovens-full for a meal, and we had to bake for dinner next day besides. Eli spoke of our stopping twice to bake. I would say we stopped for other purposes, and baked while the men got their things gathered up. One of these places was at T. Stanley's, where part of our company had gone on to; the other was at Meade's, twenty mlles from Wichita, our last contact with civilization. There the men laid in their supply of corn for the mules, and Lawrie went on to attend to business at Wichita, which kept him longer than the bread-baking did us, though two wagons staid behind till the bread was baked. It was the last time we got the use of a cook-stove; there were no women there, and they had no yeast, and we had none, or M. A. Tatum had a little, but she did not want it used before reaching the Agency, so one of the women and myself struck out to another house there was not very far off, where we had seen a woman at the door, for already a sight of a woman had begun to look particularly welcome. We found a family pretty much all sick, the woman fixed up in a chair to sit up awhile, and one or two daughters nearly grown, doing the work, and, what was to our purpose, we saw a large pan of dough, light and ready to bake, so I guessed at once we would find yeast, and after talking a few minutes with them,—(everybody scattered out this way seemed glad to see anybody, and asked no introduction to us nor we to them,)—I told our business, that we wanted yeast to make bread for our journey. She had her girl get me some at once, a generous parcel of nice dry yeast, and she would not take pay; "you will have enough of things to pay for," she said, "before you get through, without paying for a little yeast." So we made up dough that night, about seventy-five pounds of flour. They gave us the use of an out-house to work in, and our men who had no wagons made their beds there, and kept the dough warm round the fireplace, for it was a freezing cold night; and next morning between four and five, the news was that the dough was ready to make out; we kept their stove going from that till eleven and a half o'clock as hard as we could crowd it, and then had a nice chance of bread, and started to come up with the other wagons at Wichita. Besides the bread and crackers we started with, we had 250 pounds of flour, and some meal which we cooked on the road, having only a very little left when we got here. We had five bushels sweet, and two bushels Irish potatoes, which we used up, as well as quantities of fresh meat, and some other things,—but like true people of the plains meat was our great and principal living, and it continues to be,—fresh beef with little sauce or vegetables. We can have bacon, but of course do not prefer it. This country produces but few wild fruits, and we are too late for what little there might have been. One nice nut, the pecan, has been quite plentiful, and we get some yet. We can get dried fruit at a reasonable price from the Commissary at the Fort, and are having what we want of that. Our flour here has been nice, but it has been wet in the sacks in getting it here, so that we sift out great lumps, several pounds out of a sack, that are mouldy, and take them out as well as we can, our bread tastes musty, though it raises and looks very nice. We have pumpkin sauce and some pumpkin pies, but we have no milk, so they are not quite like what we are used to.

We have formed ourselves into a little meeting and have held it two First-days, and Scripture school in the afternoon. I have the teaching, or rather leading of the class, and then our two children want a class, and think I am the one to teach them, though I think their mothers could do it better, but the children have their way so far. We were going to have two Scripture classes, and our company voted Eli to teach one, and me the other; but Eli does not see the use of more than one class, and declined taking that; and, as some of our company have been writing or walking at school time, both First-days, the class is not so large. An Indian sat with us through one meeting, and showed at least he knew how to sit still. Two Indians were with us a part of our last Scripture school, but as no interpreter was present, we could not tell them what we were doing, nor teach them any. We feel it a great disadvantage not to be able to talk with them, and if possible, lead them to a knowledge of and hope in our Saviour. There have been a good many deaths among the Indians this Fall; some since we came. They mourn with piteous howlings, or cryings, night and morning, for the dead. While there were so many lodges around our house, we heard a good deal of noise. One old woman died since we came, who was, they say, a very good mourner, and since she is gone, they say they are so tired and worn out, they cannot mourn much. How I wish we could reach their dark souls with the glad tidings of the Gospel. It is a part of their duty, as they understand it, to kill, burn and destroy all the property they have at the death of one of their near relations, and they have come nearly naked and destitute; "My brother or my some-one died; I had to burn my things;" and so they want something given them. Lawrie told some of them in reference to a house which he is to build for a Chief, the Government furnishing the funds, that he hardly knew what about building it, for he supposed if any of his (the Chief's) relations died, it would be to be burnt down like their lodges. They will kill horses or anything they have, in case of death. They have lost confidence in their own doctors to a considerable degree, and are glad to get medicine of Dr. Upton. Yesterday a Chief got some eye-water from him for sore eyes; there were about a dozen other Indians in the office then, and when they saw what he had got, every one of them wanted eye-water too. Dr. told one of them he did not think his eyes looked very sore, but he said he wanted it for the time they might be, for it was a good ways to come, so the Dr. gave each one some eye-water.

BOOK OF MEETINGS.

In revising this work, the committee found it necessary to apply to some party in every Quarterly Meeting in the United States for information in regard to the Meetings within their limits. A printed circular, with a list of the Meetings in each Quarter, was sent to a correspondent, with a request that it be made correct and returned early to the committee. In most cases the committee are indebted for prompt and material aid—in others the circulars were unheeded, or returned without alteration—thus leading to errors in the work, only seven of which occurred through oversight of the committee.

During the past year many new Meetings have been established, and a few discontinued. A list of all these, as far as could be ascertained, is herewith furnished, which will enable those having copies of the book to make the needful corrections and additions.

As there is no other work of the kind published, it is of importance to clerks and correspondents, who have need of it, that it be correct; it is therefore requested that when errors are discovered, or changes made, notice thereof be sent to the Publishers, William Wood & Son, 61 Walker St., N. Y., or to the Editor of Friends' Review.

COPPER IN THE COLORING OF A BIRD'S WING.

The turaco or plantain-eater of the Cape of Good Hope is noted for the beauty of its plumage, and especially for the rich red upon its wings. This red coloring matter has been analyzed, and found to contain nearly six per cent of copper, which cannot be detected by the ordinary tests, nor removed from the red compound without destroying it. This coloring matter is, in fact, a natural organic compound, of which copper is an essential constituent. The name turacine has been given to this substance. Traces of copper had previously been found in animals, as in oysters, which, living in streams flowing from the neighborhood of copper mines, had assimilated certain salts of that metal. The copper apparently had no effect upon the health of the oyster, though it did upon the health of people who ate the bivalve. But in this case, as in all others of the kind heretofore observed, the presence of the copper was clearly accidental; while in the turaco the metal is a normal part of the coloring matter of the bird's plumage. Of course it must be obtained in minute quantities with the food, and stored up in this singular way in the system of the animal. In the very same feather, partly red and partly black, the copper is found in the red parts, but not at all, or the merest trace, in the black. If a few fibres from the red part be burned, the spectrum of copper is readily detected in the flame.

It is a curious fact that this red in the wing of the turaco is not a fast color. A pair of fine birds which were kept in captivity washed it all out of their plumage in a few days by bathing in the water which was left them to drink, the turacine being soluble in water. Except for the loss of their beauty, the birds did not appear to be any the worse for the change. It would seem, therefore, that we have here an instance of the elaboration of a chemical substance perfectly unique in its nature and containing a metal whose salts are usually regarded as poisonous to animals; and yet the sole purpose which, so far as we know, it serves in the animal economy, is one of pure decoration. How will those who take an exclusively utilitarian view of the plan of creation explain this?—Journal of Chemistry.

RIPENING GRAPES BY CUTTING AWAY THE LEAVES.

The August number of the Cosmos contains a paper on this subject by M. J. Comte, which was read at a meeting of the Agricultural Society of Agen. It appears to have been an old custom, and one still kept up in the South of France, to pull off the leaves of the vine so as to let the full sunlight fall on the grapes, which soon get an amber color and appear as if over-ripe. The author strongly condemns the practice. He states that the leaves, as arranged by nature, are absolutely necessary for perfecting the maturity of the grapes; in other words, for converting into grape-sugar a portion of the acids which are present in large quantity in the unripe fruit. This change is brought about by the addition of carbon to the acids, and this carbonisation (as Comte calls it) is effected by the leaves. Fully ripe grapes (of course, he is speaking of grapes which have a green color when ripe) should be of a pure green, and not of the yellowish shade exhibited by those which have been exposed to the light by stripping off the leaves. The taste of these yellow grapes is intensely sour, while that of the green-colored ripe grapes is sweet.—Scientific Journal.

OVER AND OVER AGAIN.

BY JOSEPHINE POLLARD.

Over and over again,
No matter which way I turn,
I always find in the Book of Life
Some lesson I have to learn.
I must take my turn at the mill,
I must grind out the golden grain,
I must work at my task with a resolute will,
Over and over again.

We cannot measure the need
Of even the tiniest flower,
Nor check the flow of the golden sands
That run through a single hour.
But the morning dews must fall;
And the sun and the summer rain
Must do their part, and perform it all
Over and over again.

Over and over again
The brook through the meadow flows,
And over and over again
The ponderous mill-wheel goes.
Once doing will not suffice,
Though doing be not in vain,
And a blessing, failing us once or twice,
May come if we try again.

The path that has once been trod
Is never so rough to the feet;
And the lesson we once have learned
Is never so hard to repeat.
Though sorrowful tears may fall,
And the heart to its depths be riven
With storm and tempest, we need them all
To render us meet for Heaven.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—Advices from Europe are to the 3d inst.

Great Britain.—Heavy gales prevailed all around the coast during the last few days of the year, causing many shipwrecks. The damage by the recent floods in England and Wales, it is stated, is estimated at nearly £500,000, about $2,500,000. In some sections the lowlands will probably be useless until Spring.

The recent receipts of wheat from America have been very large, and there is a great accumulation of that grain both at London and Liverpool. The Statistical Journal of London said on the 30th ult. that 74 more cargoes were afloat bound for England than at the corresponding period last year.

Ireland.—A violent gale at Limerick on the 31st uprooted trees, threw down chimneys and even prostrated some houses. Ten persons were known to have been killed, and many others were badly injured.

France.—The extraordinary session of the Legislative Body ended on the 27th ult. and the regular session commenced the following day. The former President, Schneider, was re-elected. The Ministry resigned on the 28th, their resignationa were accepted, and Emile Ollivier was requested by the Emperor to name persons to associate with himself to form a homogeneous cabinet, faithfully representing the majority in the Chamber, and resolved to apply in letter and spirit the "senatus consultum" of 9th mo. last. The Emperor declared that he relied on both Ollivier and the Legislature to aid him in putting into successful operation the constitutional regime. The list of the new Ministry was published on the 3d; two of the late cabinet, the Ministers of War and Marine, retain their positions, and Ollivier himself assumes that of Minister of Justice. As a member of the Legislative Body, he was formerly active as one of the Opposition but has gradually become more moderate and conciliatory towards the government. A statememt recently made by him of the political principles on which he purposed to act if made the head of the Ministry, includes peace abroad, and at home some reforms tending to greater freedom.

The Director General of Telegraph Lines at Paris has published in the official journal a declaration that his administration does not exercise any control over dispatches transmitted by the French Transatlantic cable, either from America or from any other quarter, except to take care that they are transmitted in the order of reception, without favoritism, and that none are sent clandestinely to avoid the tax due the government; that the conditions under which it exercises this control are without political intention; and that most of the dispatches received, especially those for the west of France, for Spain or England, reach their destination without passing through Paris. This publication was called forth by the remarks in the annual message of the President of the United States, relative to the terms of the concession of that company, and his suggestion of an international convention to establish reciprocity in cable telegrams. The concession, however, contains an express reservation by the French government of "the right of establishing such control over the service of the line as it may judge convenient."

Spain.—Zorilla, Minister of Justice, made a speech a few days since at Albaceta, in which he declared that if the government cannot find a king, they will throw themselves into the arms of a republic.

Italy.—The place of meeting of the Council has been changed from the Cathedral of St. Peter to the Quirinal palace, owing to acoustic defects of the hall occupied in the former building, which render it unsuited for the meetings. No account of any further proceedings has been made public. The correspondent of the London Times at Rome, asserts that the Pope's influence over the Council is perceptibly growing weaker.

Switzerland.—Victor Rueffy, President elect of the Federal government of Switzerland, died on the 28th ult.

Egypt.—A dispatch from Port Said, dated the 30th ult., says, that the steamer Sterling, for Bombay, passed through the Suez canal in 12 hours, on the 27th, and that several other steamers were following it.

Domestic.—The monthly statement of the public debt, for the 1st inst., shows a total amount, principal and interest, of $2,658,134,670; amount in Treasury, including sinking fund, $209,387,716.69; leaving the excess of debt over amount on hand, $2,448,746,953.31, a decrease within the last month of $4,812,781.92, and since Third mo. 1, 1869, of $76,716,306.70. The amount of bonds issued to the Pacific Railroads is $64,135,320; interest paid by the United States, $1,984,822.54 of which $1,861,089.71 has been repaid by transportation of mails, &c.

The Secretary of the Treasury has authorized the Assistant Treasurer at New York to continue the sale of $1,000,000 in gold and the purchase of $1,000,000 of bonds on alternate weeks throughout the present month, on account of the Sinking Fund; and also to sell $1,000,000 of gold and purchase $2,000,000 of bonds on alternate weeks, for the special fund; these sales and purchases alternating with those for the Sinking Fund, so that only one sale and one purchase shall take place each week.

The postage on letters to Great Britain having been reduced at the first of the year, the managers of the foreign steamship lines sailing from New York which had carried the mails, declined doing so longer at the reduced rates, but the Postmaster General has made arrangements with other lines, by which the mails will be carried as frequently and nearly as expeditiously as heretofore.

POPULAR IDEAS OF RIGHT.

We cannot but think that the adoption and diffusion of the doctrine of self-interest as the rule of right has lowered the standard of morality in this country within the last half century.

This theory of virtue is so nearly allied to the theory of self-indulgence, that nothing in the world seems more easy than to practice it. Accordingly whole classes of men, who know but little of abstract speculations on the origin of moral obligations, are insensibly led by the prevailing tone of argument on these subjects to slide into the Epicurean view of human duties. Mr. Mill may argue that the utilitarian system is of necessity identical with the highest precepts of religion and objective morality, and that the service of humanity "may acquire, even without the aid of belief in a Providence, both the psychological power and the social efficacy of a religion;" but the world does not take that view of the matter, and the results of his theory are quite different from what he would himself anticipate or approve. The desire of procuring and of spending wealth becomes intense, because it is the key to all the most alluring forms of enjoyment. In politics, fixed principles of right and duty succumb to the prevailing popular interest or impulse. In trade, there is a marked decline in a commercial good faith, provided success can be purchased, or ill success concealed, by dishonesty. In manufactures, any expedient is tolerated which will put a tempting surface on cheap productions. The respect for parental authority is weakened in England and extinguished in America. The reckless self-indulgence and prodigality with which multitudes of young men of the upper classes rush to ruin, denotes an enfeebled sense of duty and self-control. In the relations of the sexes and the decorum of female life, there is a striking change, which may be traced in a thousand indications of manners, literature, dress, conversation and art. Crimes of the deepest dye are defended as venial, and even hailed with popular applause, if they are attributable to political motives—a circumstance which, in truth, only aggravates the guilt of such offences. There is less veneration for the sanctity of an oath, because there is less of faith in that which gives to an oath its sacred character, not only as an obligation between man and man, but between man and God. We are living in what would have appeared to our forefathers a relaxed state of morality, and the reason is not far to seek.

The utilitarian system of morals consists in the substitution of a purely mundane, finite, temporal and limited rule of action for that moral law which rests upon the will of God and the order of creation. The one is the moral rule of Paganism, the other is the moral rule of Christianity. It has been justly observed by Prof. Maurice that Mr. Bentham, the founder of modern utilitarianism, "rejected a divine basis altogether for human society and for the life of the individual man." That is the essence of his system, though it had not been rigorously adhered to by all his followers. If there be no God, no hereafter, no conscience, and no soul, the principle of utility may serve indifferently well to guide men in their actions toward one another in this obscure and transient world. But the moment we admit the religious idea and a conception of the immortal destiny of man, the whole range of his moral obligations is enlarged. The direct mundane consequences of this or that action cease to be the true test of its worth. Actions in themselves the most contrary to human prudence or interest, become, on the contrary, the most virtuous and laudable. The real test to be applied to either theory of morals is, therefore, in our opinion, whether it rests on a conception of human interests or of divine law. The morality of Paganism was just as imperfect as the religion of Paganism, and the utilitarian doctrine of morals brings men back to precisely that point at which Paganism had left them before the conception of morality based on the religious idea had illuminated and regenerated the world.—Edinburgh Rev.

MEDITATIONS ON PRAYER.

By Hugh L. White, of Dublin.

There appears to exist among many in our day a jealousy and dislike of every exhortation to a believer's personal vigilance and exertions for the attainment and increase of holiness, as if all such exhortations savored of a spirit of legality, manifested a presumptuous desire to share with the Holy Spirit in the glory of the work of salvation, and tended to encourage a feeling of proud self-righteousness and dependence upon our own efforts. I cannot but fear this alarm at hearing the scriptural injunctions, "Watch, strive, labor, wrestle, run, fight," echoed and enforced, has tended very much to hinder the work of sanctification in many sincere believers. For if they are taught to regard every effort of their own (however humbly made in unqualified dependence on Divine Grace) as calculated to rob the Holy Spirit of the honor which is exclusively His due, this must manifestly have a tendency to lead them to relax those very exertions, with the faithful and persevering use of which it has pleased this Sovereign Dispenser of all grace to connect the promised aid and influence which He can alone impart. . . . . .

When the husbandman prepares the ground and sows the seed, does this argue an atheistical forgetfulness, that no matter how carefully he may plant or water, it is God alone that giveth the increase? Is he not perfectly aware that it is no power of his own, but exclusively the power of God, which makes the buried seed spring up and bring forth fruit to an abundant harvest? Then how is it more a denial of the Divine power, or an usurpation of the Divine prerogative, if, in hopes of an abundant spiritual harvest, the believer cultivates with unwearied diligence the field which the Lord of the harvest has committed to his care; provided in all his watchings and labors he ever remembers that even when a Paul plants or an Apollos waters, it is God alone who giveth the increase. And if from the analogy of Creation we turn to the testimony of Scripture, how loudly does it echo th call to exertion. Strive (literally agonize) to enter in at the strait gate; for the kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. Labor not for the meat that perisheth, but for that which endureth to everlasting life, which Son of Man shall give unto you. Watch! watch and pray, yea, pray without ceasing. Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do of His own good pleasure. Fight the good fight of faith. Run with patience the race set before us—yea, so run that you may obtain. Now combine with these and many similar expressions the plain purport of the parable of the sower, and still more of the two parables of the talents, and surely it is as plain as Scripture can make it, that while we ought each of us to feel and to confess and that we cannot take one single step in our heavenward journey, in our own unaided strength, yet we are to expect God's promised grace to help in every time of need and bring us safe to Heaven at last, not while standing still in slothful inactivity, under any pretext, but while watching—striving—praying—laboring—wrestling—running,—using a holy violence to seize on heavenly things—giving all diligenee to make our calling and election sure.

"Help I every moment need,"

TEXT CLUSTERS.

On the subject of "the Cross" a few very instructive texts may be put together. First, the narrative of the crucifixion of our Lord, —John xix. 17, 18. Some Bible classes may contain members ignorant of this history, and needing reference to other passages, to show the divine purpose of the coming and suffering of Christ on earth. Then compare his injunction, (Luke ix. 23,) "If any man will be my disciple, let him take up his cross daily and follow me." It is to be remembered that, at the time when this was said, the disciples did not well understand, even though announced to them, the coming death and resurrection of their Master. This taking up of the cross must have been then a hard lesson for them to learn, as it is now to us. Paul taught it, by example,—"dying daily." 1 Cor. xv. 31. Yet was it not, nor should it be, too grievous,—as "if we be dead with Christ, we believe we shall also live with him." Rom.

vi. 5–8; 2 Tim. ii. 11. But, to all, in their own strength, it is impossible, needing the constant help of the Almighty, (Daniel iii. 23–25; Ps. xxxiv. 18, 22; Philip. iv. 13;) the words of the last being, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." It would be easy to add to these texts others to the same effect; but it is desired merely to suggest and exemplify this simple method of instruction. Fitting remark may, with a qualified teacher, be made to aid its application throughout.

Another subject may be "Fear." In a number of passages of the Old Testament, the fears of the wicked are depicted, at which, one day, God shall laugh; as Prov. i. 24–27, x. 24, xx. 2, xxii. 13, and xxviii. 1. Also in Prov. i. 33 and Ps. xlvi. 1, 2 the safety of a refuge in God is shown. Jesus taught (Luke xii. 4, 5) whom alone we ought ever to fear, not men; as had been written of old, as the conclusion of the whole matter. Eccles. xii. 13. Yet, while the conclusion of all human experience is in favor of fearing God, this is but "the beginning of wisdom." Prov. ix. 10. For an account of its growth, in Christ, search the gospels and epistles; as Luke xii. 32. John xiv. 1 and xv. 15; Rom. viii. 28, 38; and especially 1 John iv. 18, 19: "There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear; because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love. We love him, because he first loved us." H. H.

ISRAEL BETWEEN THE PASCHAL NIGHT AND THE RED SEA.

The blood on the lintels had secured the first-born, and the Egyptian had then allowed Israel to pass out of the land. But the Egyptian himself was not yet destroyed, neither was Israel clearly beyond the borders of the enemy; till then, they are not at ease, nor have they any song of joy and salvation; the Egyptian has gone out after them, and they judge that there is nothing but death before and behind. They see the cloud, and they cannot but remember the shelter of the blood, and that they have in some sense left Egypt. But in some sense they judge themselves to be in a worse state than ever.

Such is often a stage in the history of a converted soul. Nay, is it not descriptive of the sorrowful condition of many who are indeed called out of darkness? They are quickened, they have risen up to go out of Egypt, the soul has suddenly taken a new direction, with some sense of the value of the blood of Christ. Still this quickening, this rising up, only leads the soul to judge worse of its own condition than ever. A new sense of death comes in. There is an apprehension of death in trespasses and sins, and no adequate assurance of the completeness of redemption. The soul can look to Jesus; the blood on the door-post has told of His love, and so it has glimpses of hope; but God has not been so apprehended as to give certainty and ease of heart; all the virtue of the cross is not known; just as Israel had not yet learned all the virtue of the cloud and the rod. For the cloud had virtue not only to lead the redeemed but to overthrow their pursuers. It could change its ground and stand between the two camps; and then while it was light to the one, it was darkness to the other. As the rod could make a passage for the one and bury the other in the mighty waters, the cross, in like manner, has its full and double value. It rescues the sinner and silences all his accusers.

The full victory of Jesus for the sinner, the double virtue of the cross, may be understood at once; for the Gospel publishes it without reserve. But till it be understood, the song is not learned; the redeemed one is on the Egyptian side of the Red Sea. Let, however, the cloud and the rod fully display themselves; let the cross of Christ publish all its virtue in the ear of faith; then Israel can sing their song and the believer can say, "If God be for us, who can be against us?" In the cross of Christ, the enmities are seen to be all abolished, the law is seen to have found its end, sin to have paid its wages; the great enemy is seen to have been overcome, death to have been abolished, and the flesh to have been exposed, condemned, and discharged. As the enemy is thus seen dead on the shore, the sinner sees himself to be fully rescued, to be accepted in the Beloved, happy in the adopting love of God, treated as in the spirit not in the flesh, safe in that hand out of which none can pluck, dwelling in that love which leaves no room for fear. Israel has passed the waters and is free; Egypt and its enmity are gone forever.—Witness.

WHAT ARE YOU DOING?

Dear fellow-Christian, you have perhaps learned by woful experience to pity those who, by a restless activity in what they call Christian work, are seeking to settle the unsolved question of their salvation. You have perhaps learned something of the order in which salvation and service are presented by the Gospel. By the grace of God you know that Christ is all our salvation. But it may still be asked, Are you sitting down, after the long, dark night of uncertainty and vain striving for salvation, merely to enjoy the thought of a salvation accomplished? We would ask not only what you are enjoying, but what are you doing? Are you glorifying Him in your body and your spirit which are His? You have no longer salvation to seek, but are you seeking His glory? You may dwell with rapture on His love, but does the love of Christ constrain you? Are you living not to yourself but to Him who died for us, and rose again? Assuredly He has not left His redeemed in such a world as this, merely to enjoy salvation. He has very plainly told us for what end He has left us here, and in view of this we ask, WHAT ARE YOU DOING?

It is most true that Christ's beauty seen, His love felt, and His words known are the springs of acceptable service. But what avails it if you can speak of all these, and yet they do not move you in His service? Do you hear His word, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me?" Do you visit the saints in their sickness and sorrow, and minister to the poor of your substance? Are you prayerfully and practically seeking the welfare of the Church of God? Do not say you can do nothing; for you are a member of His body, and He has given you a place of service. "Nay, much more those members of the body which seem to be more feeble are necessary." He has given you talents to use for Him, and has said to you, "Occupy till I come." Your blessing and spiritual growth will be hindered, as well as the Lord's name dishonored, if you are not occupied in service according to His mind.

Think also of the Gospel which He commands to be preached in all the world. Are you helping this forward by your prayer and substance? Are you preaching it according to your opportunities? If so, are you "steadfast and unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord?"

Consider the awful precipice on the verge of which so many are standing; and think how few of our relatives, friends, and neighbors truly confess the Lord Jesus! Think of the tens of thousands at our very doors, and the millions throughout the world, who do not know the only name given under heaven among men whereby they can be saved. Think of the multitudes within your reach who make no secret of their neglect of this great salvation: and can you be walking in fellowship with Him who came to seek and save the lost, who shed His blood for the ungodly, who wept over impenitent Jerusalem, if you are sitting at ease in the midst of these careless sinners over whom an awful doom is impending?

Once more, WHAT ARE YOU DOING? Can we say with Paul, "I am pure from the blood of all men?" Will the Lord, when He comes, say of you and me, as He said of that poor woman who loved much, "They have done what they could?"—Witness.

"FRIENDSHIP improves happiness and abates misery, by doubling our joy and dividing our grief."

INDIAN CORRESPONDENCE.

Comanche and Kiowa Indian Agency, near Fort Sill, Indian Territory, Eleventh mo. 21st, 1869.

Dear Friends:—We have not had a letter from you yet, but hope soon to get one. We wrote you before leaving Richmond, Ind. We left there the 8th ult., and reached Lawrence the 10th. There we were detained by various things for nine days, instead of coming on directly. The weather was pleasant all that time, but when we left on the 19th, it had turned cold, and was rather stormy, so that, for near a week, it was quite disagreeable, and we suffered a good deal. One week after starting, we reached Wichita, in the S. W. part of Kansas, where we crossed the Arkansas River. I wrote ——— a short letter from that place, which perhaps you have had an opportunity to hear, and from thence I will resume the account of our journey for your and for their perusal.

It was quite late when we got ready to start the next morning, one team having to be sent back to the village, (a mean-looking place of perhaps a dozen houses, with whiskey signs on them, and covered with sod for a roof,) to get some things, amongst which was a quarter of beef that a man had given us. Two of our wagons stuck in the quicksand in crossing the Arkansas, and we had to double teams. It was about 10 o'clock when we got safely over. We now bade farewell to civilization, taking the road opened by the Government the present year, for hauling supplies to the military and Indians in this agency. We had furnished ourselves with a table of distances and suitable camping places. As the country is all prairie, with only a very small skirt of timber along the streams, and the water in some of these streams too salt to use, it was necessary for us to know where to stop to get both wood and good water, as well as grass for our mules, as we had no feed for them but corn, and had to depend upon the grass for hay. Our agent, Lawrie Tatum, had passed over this road twice the past summer, but neither time under circumstances to make him notice it much, and none of the rest of the company had ever seen it. There was one advantage: there was no other road leading out of it, though sometimes there would be two tracks that separated, but came together soon. A good part of the way we might have traced the road by the carcases of oxen that lay about, near one thousand northern cattle that have been used in hauling supplies having died this summer. We passed several small trains that were waiting for help to go on, having been left there on account of the death of their oxen. One company of four wagons told us that they had already waited two weeks, and we met the help coming for them several days after. They had numbers of sick and dead oxen around them when we met them, and the men looked lonesome guarding their wagons on the banks of Kingfisher Creek.

Well, as I said, it was after 10 o'clock when we got across the Arkansas, and then, in order to make our campings come right for several days after, we must make thirty miles yet that day. About twenty-five had been our average day's journey. One wagon had to go a few miles out of the way, across the prairie, to a place which they did not know, to get a tent, which we had the promise of for our journey. Agent Tatum went with that team, and left orders that we should go on to State Creek, thirty miles off—we would know it by its being the third creek we came to—and there camp, and they would overtake us. Our loads were heavier than usual, having taken in additional feed, and the roads for several miles were worse than usual, so that by the time we had crossed the second stream, (a bad sandy one at which we doubled teams,) it was about an hour by sun, and twelve miles to make to our camping place. Here we left a team till the other wagon should come up, to help them across if necessary, and pushed on with the ambulance, containing the women and children, and the wagon on which were the provisions and cooking utensils. You may imagine that it was interesting travelling for about two hours after dark, over a road that none of us had ever seen, to find a place that none of us would know when we got there. The wolves made music for us as we went along, and as I happened to have the sick headache that day, and was exempt from driving, I lay back and slept when it became dark, which, I suppose, shortened the road for me. A little after 8 o'clock we came to some timber on the bank of a creek and camped. In about an hour, and after we had eaten our suppers, the other teams came up, and some of our company, especially the women whose husbands were behind, felt good at this meeting.

The next day our twenty-five miles took us to Bluff Creek, where we stopped near an encampment of Osage Indians, from eastern Kansas, now out on a buffalo hunt. A couple of them visited us, but did not trouble us, only to ask for "backy." As only one of our company uses the weed, and he moderately, having laid in only about a pound, of course they did not get much. We thought best, however, to tie up our mules, and keep a guard all night to prevent them from stealing, as they have the reputation of being great thieves. In the morning after we had started, some of them met us to trade buffalo meat for salt, and to beg more "backy." We took a little meat of them, but declined the "backy" business. This day we passed through several miles of prairie-dog villages, as they are called. The prairie-dog is an animal that looks and acts very much like a fat, young pup, about the size of a small cat. They burrow in the ground, and seem to have a great curiosity to see people as they pass by, and sometimes sit on their holes and bark at them. Their bark very much resembles the chirrup of a ground-squirrel. Travellers say that they can dodge a bullet, and that they cannot be hit when they are looking at the gunner; and it seemed very much so, for our men had several fair shots at them, at short distances, and made the dust fly just where they were sitting; but they invariably escaped into their holes, until one of our men got a shot at two of them that were busily playing, and did not notice him: he had a shot-gun, and killed them both. They seemed to be young ones. We afterwards passed through miles of these prairie-dog villages, I should think seventy-five or eighty miles in all, and they ceased to be much of curiosities. The land they burrow is very level, and apparently very poor, of a reddish color. I should think it would be a long time before any one would wish to take their lands from them. It is said that owls and rattlesnakes live with them in their holes, but that cannot be proven by me, for I did not see it.

We camped that night at Pond Creek. Here, until about two months ago, was Brinton Darlington's Agency for the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians. There were two unfinished log houses, sod-covered, standing there, but the Agency is moved one hundred and seventy-five miles farther west. The houses had been used by the cattle, &c., so we did not choose them for our lodging place, preferring the bank of the creek. We had, however, plenty of company, for there was a large encampment of Osages across the creek, within one hundred rods of us, though we could not see their tents. They soon gathered around us pretty thick, many of them sturdy, rough-looking customers. Our intercourse with them was principally limited to signs. They had a good many papers, ranging in date from 1812 to 1869, that they wished us to read, stating various things, some that they were good Indians, some commending them to the charity of those that they should meet, but not vouching for their honesty. We thought it best for our comfort, if not safety, to divide our small stock of sugar, coffee and molasses with them; then after we had eaten our supper, gave the remaining Indians, six or eight, privilege to eat up the balance, which they seemed to do with a relish. The next morning, when we went to gear up, two of our bridles were gone. After some ineffectual effort to get them of the Indians, or at least to buy one, (we had an extra one,) we made a rope bridle, and went our way. This day we crossed a stream that has a wide sandy bed, though there is not much water in it, called Salt Fork, the waters of which were quite salty, and had our first sight of buffaloes and antelopes. We saw a herd of the latter that scampered away in fine style on our approach. We saw a few scattering buffaloes that did not seem to want to give us a very near view of their majesties. After awhile we saw a small company lying down on the bank of a ravine; we stopped our wagons opposite them, and three men crawled down the ravine, got within about seventy-five yards of them and fired. They all jumped and ran, but two of them lagged behind and turned to see what was after them. One of them seemed to be hurt. They soon disappeared over the hill: the men reloaded and went after them. We soon heard them fire again, and now, of course, thought they had got a buffalo. So several of us started over to see about it, one-half or three-quarters of a mile away, and I recollect that I took the butcher-knife and hatchet along. When we got over, we met the men coming back; they told us the buffaloes were all out of sight. In about an hour after, we saw ten buffaloes quietly grazing beyond a hill along our road. The wind was from them to us, and we got within fifty rods perhaps of them without their seeing us. We stopped our wagons in a situation that they could not see them, and our two riflemen crawled up quite near to them; how near I do not know; but they might have got within forty or fifty yards, if they had not been afraid of them. They fired, and the buffaloes went off rather deliberately to our right. As the wagon drove on, they made a turn to the left, crossed the road before us, passed over to our left nearly opposite to us, and stopped. Our men kept loading and firing at random at them, two or three hundred yards off, instead of trying to get up to them. The buffaloes seemed to be daring us to hit them if we could. They passed on deliberately, crossed the road again behind us, and went off, half a mile to our right, where they parted, four of them going on and crossing the road ahead of us again, and the other six going to the west. We did not get near enough to them to shoot again. Thus ended our buffalo hunt. Our guns were not suitable for killing them.

That night, which was Seventh-day night, we camped at a creek called "Skeleton Creek," so called because the skeletons of some Indians, that died with the cholera, were found on it once. The next morning three of our mules were gone. Our first thought was that the Indians had followed us and taken them, but an examination of the road showed that they had taken the back track, dragging their ropes after them. We had turned them out to pick with long ropes on their necks, tying up our pony, supposing the mules would stay with him, but some of them were not well enough acquainted with him to do so. Our men tracked them back eight or ten miles, and then their trails left the road. After two days of fruitless search, we concluded to go on without them. We had but seven mules left for our four wagons, but, fortunately, the pony that we had filled a place, though he had probably never been harnessed before; by putting him and the best mule to the ambulance, we were able to go on, though it made our loads heavier, we having had before four mules to one of the wagons. While hunting for the mules, some of our company saw a great many buffalo, but I did not get the sight of a large herd of them. I did get a good view of a large wolf, while I was looking around by myself about two or three miles from the camp, for he jumped up out of the grass only forty or fifty feet before me.

The next day, Third day, we reached a small stream, Turkey Creek, twenty-five miles on, and the next morning, after going about ten miles, came to Red Fork, a salty stream with a large sandy bed. There was broken land, sand hills, on the north of it for a short distance, with some timber. There we killed about ten turkeys in about half an hour. As we had to double teams at the river, we took the turkeys and the spare folks over as the first load, and by the time we got the other wagons over, they had the turkeys dressed, a tub full of turkey, which, with two others that we killed a couple of days after, did us through our journey: and we had a whole one on hand when we arrived.

That night our camping place, to make twenty-five miles, came midway of a prairie twenty-two miles wide. We were told by teamsters that we met in the morning, that we would find water there, so we prepared ourselves with wood to carry along and struck out. The smoke of burning prairies was in sight all the afternoon, and about sunset we met the fire advancing towards us, though gently, as there was but little wind. We easily crossed the fire, as it was burning one hundred rods or so ahead, on one side of the road: and just there was some water; but the grass was all gone, so that we must go on for grass for the mules. I should think we went five or six miles, the fire burning all around us, before we crossed the back fire and came to the grass again. A couple of miles farther on we found water and camped. Though about two-thirds of the horizon was lit up by burning prairie, the night was so still, the little wind that there was blowing against the nearest fire, that we felt little fear, though surrounded by the tall grass.

We planned to go on next morning for breakfast to a spring, which proved to be about eight miles ahead, and so were up and started by six o'clock. The wind, by that time, had begun to blow from the north, and when we started, I could hear the fire crackling behind us. The wind increased, the fire advanced rapidly. Before we had prepared our breakfast at the spring, the fire had come up to us and passed by, the flames leaping and dancing on the hills around, devouring the grass in an instant. We were in a protected place with a branch on one side, the road on the other, and by burning off a corner of high grass before the flames came up, we were pretty safe, having a place of retreat in case the fire came upon us.

This day we crossed the North Canadian; reached the South Canadian, twelve miles beyond, about three o'clock, P. M., but as we did not know that we could find a camping place farther on, we stayed on the bank of that river all night. The next day we had a hard road over the sandy hills that separate the Canadian, a tributary of the Arkansas, and the Washita, a tributary of the Red River; we made twenty-four miles, camping on Sugar Creek near the Washita. Here we met some of our Indians, who were very friendly, four of them staying with us till bed time. They were Caddo and Wichita Indians, very quiet and peaceable. Here we came in sight of a fence and corn field again, the work of this agency. The next day we crossed the Washita and camped on Cache Creek, the stream that we are now on, within eighteen miles of this place. The next morning, which was First-day, after we had come five or six miles, four men from the Agency here met us with seven fresh mules to help us in. A man had come down from the Washita the day before, told them that we were coming, and that we had lost some of our mules. They turned out pony and four of our most tired mules, and we made the rest of the journey in quick time, and came in in fine spirits.

When we arrived, we found the Indians encamped all around, and the house full of a motley crowd, some of them Indians. I confess that the introduction to the Comanches seemed to me pretty sudden. For two or three days after our arrival, the Indians kept coming into our enclosure more and more, because the prairie was on fire, and they feared to leave the stock out there; but for ten days they have been going away to places where grass was more plentiful, and to hunt buffalo, until there is only one tent left, in which there are an old man and some sick women and children.

It is now First-day afternoon. I suppose you wonder what we do here. We have not all got settled down to our regular duties yet, so, in some sense, we hardly know what we are doing. Mahalah is to be Lawrie's clerk in transacting the general business of his office. She has been very busy the last two weeks getting the run of the business, and straightening up matters that have not been attended to in his absence the last two months. My duties are to be to attend to issuing rations to the Indians. The Government issues regular rations to the Indians of this Reservation, about six thousand, when they are here to get them. A large part of them are now away hunting buffalo. Generally they draw once a week, but some of them only once or twice a month. When they went away to hunt, some of them drew for two or more weeks before going. A large part of those away hunting, the wildest of the Indians, have been away two months, and have drawn no rations lately, so that the work is rather light now. Yesterday, the regular issue day, I was at the commissary two hours before dinner, but no Indians were there then. I shall probably take charge of the issuing the first of next month, and will then give you an account of the manner of doing the work.

As to our First-days, we have agreed to have a meeting for worship at ten A. M., and a Scripture School at two P. M. There are fourteen of us Friends that came down together, and a few others have been into the two meetings we have had. You may imagine that our meetings are precious times to us in this far-off, strange land. Think of us in our little gatherings, and pray that we may be comforted together, and that our strength may be renewed from week to week for our work.

A part of the Indians have been sowing wheat since we came. They have got about one hundred acres in,—all, I guess, they will sow this fall. Wheat has never been raised in this part, so that it is something of an experiment. Considerable breaking has been done this season,—two thousand acres perhaps. Corn does well, and a good deal will probably be raised next season. Others of our men have been arranging for putting up a steam saw-mill, that we hope will be here soon. It is intended to get that up and saw out lumber enough for a half dozen houses through the winter. Everything is new here, the post having been established only last spring.

. . . In love, your sincere friend,

ELI JAY.

"Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." In reviewing the manner in which the Aborigines of our country are being trained, there appears to be much need of improvement. From infancy to old age they are led to look upon woman as the proper person to perform all the drudgery and most of the hard labor, and in connection therewith they are nurtured from childhood to consider it degrading for a man to labor. The effect of this training is visible wherever we see them; the women are performing nearly all the labor, and many of them work very hard, while the men seem by their conduct to manifest that they have nothing to do but to direct—their hands being as soft as though they had never touched a tool. The men manifest energy and perseverance in hunting buffalo, but after they kill and skin the animal, the residue of the labor devolves upon the women; and it is surprising with what energy and power they perform their work, especially in dressing the robes. Warlike exploits and achievements are held up to their view as being the only way to greatness. This, too, is inculcated from childhood, and the child who gives early evidence of ability to perform some daring deed is patted and praised as being one of great promise. The query arises, Are Christian professors performing their duty towards these people? Are the Friends in the United States awake to their duties and responsibilities?

The President has opened the way for Friends to labor, and invited them to assist in civilizing and Christianizing them; but if we do nothing in the cause except what is paid for out of the U. S. Treasury, in my opinion we shall come very far short of performing our whole duty.

The important task of "training them in the way they should go," if ever accomplished, will be done by self-denying Christian laborers, the most of whom will have to be sustained by voluntary aid from those who are willing to sacrifice something for the cause. As to the manner of entering into this training, there will probably be some variety of opinion, and different tribes may require different management. I have thought that those of this Agency could be eminently benefited by having (in addition to the men who will be necessarily engaged in agricultural and other industrial pursuits) a few earnest and capable Christian women sent amongst them, such as are qualified to instruct the women in baking, cooking, washing, making clothing, &c., and to teach any branch usually taught in our schools. They should possess both the will and ability to lead mothers and children forward to a high moral and intellectual attainment, and at the same time should inculcate the precious principles and doctrines of the Gospel, enforcing them by an example of dedication and love. Will Friends furnish a few such laborers and provide for their comfort and support? I apprehend our Government will not do it.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 15, 1870.

THE PERFECT STANDARD.—We commend to thoughtful attention the views copied from the Edinburgh Review on "Popular Ideas of Right." It is well for Christians to place at every outpost a sentinel to give warning of the approach of each enemy that would hinder us from rendering unto God the things that are God's. It is an essential part of true allegiance that we give clear and constant recognition to the cardinal principle of Christian ethics, that the Divine Will is the standard of Right. It is in vain to say that an enlightened selfishness will bring to the same results, because our real interests are always in connection with right. Theorize as we may, self is man's dangerous enemy; and although our real interest must in every instance be damaged by any departure from right, yet that damage will be continually incurred if self be the motive and counsellor, and selfishness the standard.

Only One is perfect in goodness or in wisdom. The Creator of all the worlds, the Contriver of all the wonders of organism and mechanism, is the Author also of all laws and principles which govern matter and mind. He is Sovereign in the highest sense—sovereign of the universe. His will is necessarily law, and the basis of all law. Jurisprudence is valid or spurious according as it is in harmony or at variance with His will. Set up any other standard, and the resulting system will be a failure.

Let us settle it in our minds and hearts,—let the consideration regulate our life,—that the will of God is the test by which to try all rules and acts. That will is set forth in the inspired pages; it shines with celestial perfection in the golden rule; and, for our special and individual guidance, the attentive and dutiful disciple will find that will inwardly revealed by the blessed Comforter, the wonderful and sure Counsellor, whom the risen Saviour has sent to abide with His people and to teach them all things. Blessed be God, we have a standard which utilitariantsm could never have discerned, to which selfishness fails to resort, but which is so absolutely perfect that in all the lapse of ages it will never lead a soul to a false conclusion.

FAULTLESS.—"There is no man that sinneth not," said King Solomon; and he besought the Most High that the mercy of remission might be granted to the sincere penitent who should pray toward the house which he had builded, and which, in its highest glory, was a type of the perfect temple of Christ's body, which was made a sin offering for fallen man. "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God," said Paul, declaring in the same connection that no flesh shall be justified by the deeds of the law, but that every believer in Jesus may be "justified freely by His grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare His righteousness in the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God." And here the apostle reconciles the apparent contradiction, the possibility with God of what is an impossibility with man, the satisfaction of justice, yet the free pardon of the offender, who could not, by a life-time of good deeds, purchase his own ransom or wash out one scarlet stain of sin. "That He might be JUST and the JUSTIFIER of him which believeth in Jesus." And here the apostle, who had sinned even to the persecution of Christ and His Church, yet had been made perfectly whole and the recipient of unspeakable revelations, exclaimed: "Where is boasting then? It is excluded!"

Faultless!—"All we like sheep have gone astray." The beloved John declares that if we say that we have not sinned, we deceive ourselves and make Jesus Christ (whose blood cleanseth from all sin,) a liar, and His word and His truth are not in us. (1 John i. 8 and 10.) As no effort of ours, no work of supererogation, no absolution from men, can absolve us from a single infraction of the Divine law, if the transgression must remain forever uneffaced and the sentence stand unrepealed: "the soul that sinneth it shall die,"—how, in the "fearful looking for of judgment" the cry is extorted, "Oh wretched man that I am!" Debtor to a creditor of such majesty, if He offer terms of pardon, shall any sinner hesitate to accept them? If He condescend to speak to us: "Come let us reason together—though your sins be as scarlet, I will make them white as snow,"—if He say: "I will be merciful to your unrighteousness, and your sins and your iniquities will I remember no more,"—what a blessed message this to souls that shall receive it in faith, with the heart believing unto righteousness, and with the lip making confession unto salvation! Faultless,—because the infinite merit of the Intercessor who has paid the debt has wiped away our faults,—what peace and unspeakable joy must fill the soul that can adopt the words of David: "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us!" And well might the sweet singer of Israel both commence and end the Psalm containing such acknowledgment with the words: "Bless the Lord, oh my soul!" Faultless! Eternal redemption for a guilty world—for one guilty soul—could only be obtained by a faultless offering—by "the blood of Christ, who, through the Eternal Spirit, offered Himself without fault [marginal reading] to God." Peter, in contemplation of the awful accompaniments of "the coming of the day of God," exhorts the believers to "be diligent, that ye be found of him in peace, without fault and blameless." And John declared of those who were redeemed: "They are without fault before the throne of God." To be cleansed from all filthiness of flesh and spirit,—in short, to be faultless,—is essential to an entrance into that realm of holiness whence all impurity is self-repelled. For this, who is sufficient? We have a daysman, a Saviour—a Redeemer able and willing to "wash us whiter than snow." Without Him there were no hope. He is the only Way. Why then should any delay to throw themselves, with holy unreserve, into the waiting arms of "Him that is able to keep us from falling, and to present us FAULTLESS before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy?"

DIED.

COUTANT.—At her residence near Milton, on the 13th of Tenth month, 1869, Rachel, wife of Peter V. Coutant, in the 68th year of her age; a member of Marlboro' Monthly Meeting, N. Y. A mother in Israel, she was concerned for the welfare of the Church.

PALMER.—At his residence near Clintondale, on the 9th of Twelfth month, 1869, James Palmer, aged about 39 years; a member of Marlboro' Monthly Meeting, N. Y. Although suddenly taken from the active scenes of life, he was enabled through Divine mercy to realize that his peace was made with God. In his death, his family, the Society, and the community at large, have lost a valued member.

RANSOME.—Near Milton, on the 15th of Fifth month, 1869, Irving G., only son of Cornelius A. and Hannah G. Ransome, (members of Marlboro' Monthly Meeting, N. Y.,) in his 1st year.

GRIFFEN.—At the residence of his mother Phebe Griffen, in Clinton, Dutchess Co., N. Y., on the 17th of Seventh month, 1869, Elihu Griffen, aged 47 years. In the early part of his illness he passed through much conflict of mind, from an apprehension of unfitness for the approaching solemn change, but was brought, through redeeming love and mercy, to a state of peaceful resignation, and enabled to rest in an assurance of eternal happiness.

CHASE.—At Aquila Grove, on the 17th of Twelfth mo., 1869, in the 22d year of her age, Lydia Maria, daughter of N. G. and A. G. Chase; a member of Winneshiek Monthly Meeting, Iowa. Diffident, amiable, and possessed of traits which greatly endeared her, she gave promise of future usefulness. Evidences of Divine acceptance attended her close.

CHASE.—On the 26th of Eleventh month, 1869, Nathan G., son of J. E. and H. C. Chase, members of Winneshiek Monthly Meeting, Iowa, in the 4th year of his age.

MACY.—On the 29th of Eighth month, 1869, at his residence in Franklin Co., Iowa, Henry H. Macy, in the 69th year of his age; an Elder and member of Rocksylvania Monthly Meeting. As a peace-maker of sound judgment, he was often engaged in reconciling differences. He lived in the faith of the Gospel, and after a long and painful illness he passed away from this present life, rejoicing in the hope of a blessed immortality. During the last stage of his life, though utterance was difficult, he was much engaged in vocal prayer, and in communicating weighty counsel to those around him.

PYLE.—On the 18th of Eleventh month, 1869, at his residence in Iowa Falls, Iowa, of typhoid fever, Jehu H. Pyle, in the 56th year of his age. He was a member of Rocksylvania Monthly Meeting, filling acceptably the stations of Elder and Overseer, and an interested worker in First day Scripture schools. He gave evidence by his daily walk that he had "passed from death unto life." During his painful illness of over four weeks, he was an example of Christian patience and resignation, and not a murmur was heard to escape his lips. At one time he said, "I shall soon be walking the golden streets;" at another, when in extreme suffering, he repeated the passage, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless His holy name." He was often engaged in prayer for himself and family, and children who resided at a distance, and other relatives and friends. He gave repeated assurances to those around him "that all was well." When queried near his close as to the state of his mind, he said, "All is peace;" and just before he quietly breathed his last, he said, "Happy—happy—happy!"

THE ASSOCIATED EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF FRIENDS ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Will meet in PHILADELPHIA on Fourth-day, the 19th of First month, 1870, at 3 o'clock P.M.

The sub-committee on Education at 8 A.M. of the same day.

The Washington Committee at 4 P.M. of the day preceding. JOHN B. GARRETT, Clerk.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WEST BRANCH, Iowa, 12th mo. 26.

The Review is increasingly valued in the households to which it comes, and the good news it brings of late is cheering. We hear by other means, tidings of the Lord's work prospering, in Philadelphia, in Cincinnati, in Baltimore, &c.

Our own beloved meeting, largely attended this winter, has often been deeply solemnized under a sense of Divine o'ershadowing, and our First-day school, numbering about 120, is attended as among our precious privileges by old and young. I know no argument which I think could so dispel the doubts and fears of the doubting and the fearing about First-day schools, as for them to attend such a school as ours has been during the last six months, when, on almost every occasion, we have been drawn near together, in searching the "New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," and the precious evidence of his Spirit's presence has tendered and solemnized our hearts. It is not in boasting that I recognize this favor; but I believe much of it has come in answer to the increasingly earnest concern and prayer of the teachers, who hold regular teachers' meetings, to confer together and wait upon the Lord, seeking His blessing and His help.

We have a precious work this winter. Our large school (140) closely occupies us. We have a lovely band of scholars. We expect the dear English Friends to-morrow evening to spend a few days with us.

Affectionately thy friend, JOEL BEAN.

[The same Friend writes, on New Year's day:]

Our dear English Friends, Wm. Robinson and H. Binns, have just completed their visit to the meetings of Iowa Yearly Meeting, and spent a few days with us. Wm. Robinson gave a lecture on Astronomy to our school, very much interesting the pupils. We have had a delightful visit with them. They left us last evening for Chicago, leaving Iowa as the year closed, to proceed to another field—Canada Yearly Meeting. It is not their prospect to remain in this country to attend Canada Yearly Meeting, but to visit its meetings.

We highly value their services among us, believing they have been enabled "rightly to divide the word of truth," "in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power."

HAVERFORD COLLEGE, 1st mo. 6, 1870.

Dear friend Wm. J. Allinson,—An Editorial article in last week's Review alludes to "the opening of a fresh decade" as an event coincident with the opening of the present year. Allow me to object to this, not in a spirit of trifling, verbal criticism, but out of regard to that entire accuracy of statement always desirable in matters of this kind, and a neglect of which in similar cases has already introduced some confusion into chronology.

Such terms as century, year, decade, week, &c., are used to express definite periods or intervals of time; but when we speak of the century, the year, or of "the opening of a fresh decade," something more is implied—we mean a period beginning at a definite and generally recognized point of time. Now when does a decade properly begin?

Decade is a natural subdivision of century according to the decimal scale. Considering then the longer period as exactly made up of ten of the smaller periods, the first decade of a century must evidently begin with the beginning of the century.

Of the present century, the year designated as 1801 was the first, 1800 having been the closing year of the 18th, as the year 100 plainly was of the first century. A decade then properly commenced with 1801, a second with 1811, a third with 1821, and the present one, the 7th of the century, and now in its last year, with 1861.

In our dates the number of the year represents "the year current, not the years elapsed;"* and a similar remark may be applied to the number of the month and of the day of the month, but not to the hour, minute, &c. The date at the head of this communication signifies the 6th day of the 1st month of the 1870th year of our era: but 8.20 A.M. in a railway time-table does not mean the 20th minute of the 8th hour of the day, but a point of time 8 hours and 20 minutes subsequent to the conventional commencement of the day,—viz., the previous midnight. At first view this distinction might be regarded as a perplexing and useless irregularity, but good reasons may be found for it in the indefiniteness usually belonging to our references to the larger periods, as year or century, and the precision required in designating an exact point of time when we employ the smaller denominations of hour, minute and second.

About the beginning of the year 1850 there was much newspaper discussion concerning the time of commencement of the second half of the century. The correct statement plainly is that the latter half of the century commenced with the year 1851, as the next decade will begin with 1871, and the next century with 1901.

Truly thy friend,

SAMUEL J. GUMMERE.

[Thanks to our valued friend for his perfectly fair criticism—we saw the inaccuracy after it was too late to correct the proof. We are pleased that Prof. G. has taken the occasion to explain a very common misapprehension.—ED.]

LA PORTE, IND., 12th mo. 28.

We have a new meeting at this place. A few Friends from Little Egg Harbor came here many years ago. They have had no meeting till this winter. A very few of them have built a nice brick meeting-house in this city at a cost of about $3500. It is neat and comfortable, with seats to accommodate 250 persons. The meeting is held regularly on First-day at 10½ A. M. General attendance about 50. We are in the limits of Wabash Quarterly and Birch Lake Monthly Meeting, on Michigan Southern Railway, 58 miles east of Chicago. Friends travelling in the service of Truth would find a welcome with us. La Porte has a population of about 14,000.

FAYETTE CO., IND., 12th mo. 28.

[A Friend aged fourscore writes:]—It has been my privilege during the year now closing to attend all except one of the meetings in Ohio belonging to Indiana Yearly Meeting, and have visited 250 families of our large Quarterly Meeting, in which Quarter (the most eastern in our Yearly Meeting) there is a large increase both in members and in vital religion. It is deeply interesting to see old meetings that had been stripped by Western emigration now growing up, and larger than ever before. In Seventh month it was estimated that more than six thousand persons attended at Fairfield. Meetings were held in the house and at two places in the groves adjoining. Recently and for some time there was no minister in the Quarter, now there are ten recorded ministers and a number unrecorded. One Monthly Meeting that had been over forty years without a minister, now has two, and several unrecorded; with a membership of nearly five hundred, till the present month, when about thirty were turned over to the new meeting (Fairview) spoken of by J. H. Douglas in a late Review.

Committees of Fairfield Monthly and Fairfield Quarterly Meetings, Ohio, have for several years been holding meetings on the east side of Scioto River, in a beautiful valley of ten or fifteen miles in extent, where many members of the Society of Friends settled as early as from 1797 to 1801, and held meetings for worship in several places at private houses before any meeting-house for Friends was erected in the North-Western Territory. Where the first minister settled and died, a meeting-house was since built, but in consequence of Friends moving West, the meeting ceased to exist near or quite fifty years ago. In Seventh month last, part of our committee held several meetings in that desirable locality to very general satisfaction; and in the early part of this month, held nine meetings in the same vicinity, seven of them in the same house. The result was to a large extent encouraging. Many persons received our message of love kindly, and four persons gave their names for membership, and were received at our late Monthly Meeting, held some forty miles distant. The prospect is now very fair for soon opening a meeting there. Many persons are looking towards Friends there, as well as at many other places. Seven applications for membership were before our last Monthly Meeting, and three requests were made since.

I would say that those meetings held in the Scioto valley were strictly in the order of Friends, and seasons of much tenderness. Many there acknowledge our principles. Elgar Brown, Daniel Hill and John Henry Douglas, ministers of our Quarter, and Nathan and Esther Frame, from Indiana, were in attendance, and several elders and other members.

Rocksylvania, Iowa, 12th mo. 30, 1869.

Our little meeting has been greatly stripped by the removal of three dear Friends, but this has been followed by what, I trust, is a true revival of religious life. Many of our youth are brought to a deeper realization of their need of a Saviour, and have openly confessed their convictions. This is not confined to minors, but is manifest among the adults and the aged. Branches which before gave little evidence of life are now bearing fruit.

A MORNING IN A LONDON UNION HOUSE.

The Monthly Record (English) gives an account of the visit of several Friends (Ministers.) The inmates numbered 890. A large portion of the sick were Irish Romanists. Some of these were very near the close of life. The following extract will interest the readers of the Review. Ed.

Passing from ward to ward, and from one bed to another, we came at last to the gathered company at dinner in a noble room, used also as a chapel. It was not thought advisable to address the people collectively, as there were some very rebellious ones, especially among the younger women, so we endeavored to make use of such opportunities as presented, saying a few words to them in smaller companies.

A very strong desire rested on our minds to see the refractory young women just alluded to, and we were directed to a shed in the yard, where they were employed in picking oakum. Only four chose to accept the visit, and the demeanor of those four gave no promise of a satisfactory result. Laughter and wild songs assailed our ears on entering, and two of the four were almost defiant in their behaviour. Our feelings of pity and of love were strongly awakened, and they were addressed somewhat like this:—"Young women, cease your laughter; we come to see you because we wish to do you good, without any object or any expected reward but your happiness. Now listen. These bodies of yours must perish in the dust—the world around you must also perish, but there is in every one of you a spark that will never die, but live through all eternity, either in heaven or hell—mind, either in heaven or hell—only one or the other. And you may die to-night—where will you go if you do not repent? To the lake that burns with fire and brimstone; and you don't wish that, do you? Now, we love you, but Christ Jesus loves you better—so much, that He died to save you from that dreadful place; and we believe that He has sent us to tell you so. Let us read you a story."

And then we read the parable of the prodigal son, with a few words here and there.

Two of these unhappy young creatures, (and they were very young) broke down under this message of pardoning love.

The other two, one of them in particular, still tried to make a joke of it, and to laugh the others out of their convictions.

"You do desire a better life, and a happier state," were the words addressed to one of the latter. "I do indeed," was the reply. "Then don't let her, or any one, laugh you out of it; never fear, Christ is the Friend worth having, and He will give grace to endure the cross, and to bear all for His sake."

Then turning to the other, "Young woman, don't laugh! it is no laughing matter. Don't hinder others, but come yourself to that Saviour whose blood can cleanse from all sin. Oh! come, before it is too late."

She covered her face, as we supposed to conceal renewed laughter, but it was to hide her tears, which continued to flow like a blessed shower, where dew or rain had long been absent, and after solemn prayer, we left those poor children of sin and sorrow, in a sweet feeling of hope that, even if this remarkable visitation of Divine love should pass away now, it might be like the bread cast upon the waters, found after many days.

"With God all things are possible." In the casual ward there were no inmates, but a number of desperate looking men were picking oakum in the yard.

They were marked as the victims of drink almost to the last degree, and our kind guide told us the oft repeated truth, "'Tis the drink that does it." A large basketful of strips of torn clothing looked rather puzzling. Our companion pointed to it, and said, "Torn up this morning by casuals, in order to get a new suit, for which we commit them for a month, but they don't mind it."

Drink, drink, drink, meets us everywhere, with the conviction that the time is fully come when our Society, and society at large, must look this great question fully and fairly in the face. Let Christians cease to drink, and the thing must fall! To take no higher ground than policy, our drinking custom is national suicide. But if we take a moral and religious view of the question, we may well be horrified, and ask ourselves what share of the responsibility is ours.

They tell us we exaggerate. We don't, and we can't draw a picture anything like up to the reality of horrors, which we ourselves have seen, and which others might see if they would.

As citizens, let us legislate! and close that door through which so much of the best blood of our country enters, and is lost.

As Christians let us abstain! and no longer buy our paltry indulgence at such a fearful cost. Let us not retain on our own tables that which we know ought to be withheld from the weak and the tempted, many of whom have not our comforts to cheer them, and with whom the craving is all but irresistible.

"We therefore that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves; for even Christ pleased not himself." Rom. xv. 1–3. J. G.

DEEP-SEA DREDGINGS.

Men have ever been strangely charmed by the unknown and the seemingly inaccessible. The astronomer exhibits the influence of this charm as he constructs larger and larger telescopes, that he may penetrate more and more deeply beyond the veil which conceals the greater part of the universe from the unaided eye. The geologist seeking to piece together the fragmentary records of the past which the earth's surface presents to him, is equally influenced by the charm of mystery and difficulty. And the microscopist who tries to force from nature the secret of the infinitely little, is led on by the same strange desire to discover just those matters which nature has been most careful to conceal from us.

The energy with which in recent times men have sought to master the problem of deep-sea sounding and deep-sea dredging, is, perhaps, one of the most striking instances ever afforded of the charm which the unknown possesses for mankind. Not long ago, one of the most eminent geographers of the sea spoke regretfully about the small knowledge men have obtained of the depths of ocean. "Greater difficulties," he remarked, "than any presented by the problem of deep-sea research have been overcome in other branches of physical inquiry. Astronomers have measured the volumes and weighed the masses of the most distant planets, and increased thereby the stock of human knowledge. Is it creditable to the age that the depths of the sea should remain in the category of unsolved problems? that its 'ooze and bottom' should be a sealed volume, rich with ancient and eloquent legends, and suggestive of many an instructive lesson that might be useful and profitable to man."

Since that time, however, Deep-Sea Dredging has gradually become more and more thoroughly understood and mastered. Recently, when the telegraph cable which had lain so many months at the bottom of the Atlantic was hauled on board the Great Eastern from enormous depths, men were surprised and almost startled by the narrative. The appearance of the ooze-covered cable as it was slowly raised towards the surface, and the strange thrill which ran through those who saw it and remembered through what mysterious depths it had twice passed; its breaking away almost from the very hands of those who sought to draw it on board; and the successful renewal of the attempt to recover the cable,—all these things, were heard of as one listens to a half-incredible tale. Yet when that work was accomplished deep-sea dredging had already been some time a science, and many things had been achieved by its professors which presented, in reality, greater practical difficulties than the recovery of the Atlantic Cable.

Recently, however, deep-sea researches have been carried on with results which are even more sensational, so to speak, than the grappling feat which so surprised us. Seas so deep that many of the loftiest summits of the Alps might be completely buried beneath them have been explored. Dredges weighing with their load of mud nearly half a ton have been hauled up without a hitch from depths of some 14,000 feet. But not merely has comparatively rough work of this sort been achieved, but by a variety of ingenious contrivances men of science have been able to measure the temperature of the sea at depths where the pressure is so enormous as to be equivalent to a weight of more than 430 tons on every square foot of surface.

The results of these researches are even more remarkable and surprising, however, than the means by which they have been obtained. Sir Charles Lyell has fairly spoken of them as so astonishing "that they have to the geologist almost a revolutionary character." Let us consider a few of them.

No light can be supposed to penetrate to the enormous depths just spoken of. Therefore, how certainly we might conclude that there can be no life there. If, instead of dealing with the habitability of planets, Whewell, in his "Plurality of Worlds," had been considering the question whether at depths of two or three miles living creatures could subsist, how convincingly would he have proved the absurdity of such a supposition. Intense cold, perfect darkness, and a persistent pressure of two or three tons to the square inch, —such, he might have argued, are the conditions under which life exists, if at all, in those dismal depths. Certainly, even if we were disposed to concede the bare possibility that life of some sort may be found there, then certainly some new sense must replace sight,—the creatures in these depths can assuredly have no eyes, or only rudimentary ones.

But the recent deep-sea dredgings have proved that not only does life exist in the very deepest parts of the Atlantic, but that the beings which live and move and have their beings beneath the three-mile mountain of water have eyes which the ablest naturalists pronounce to be perfectly developed. Light, then, of some sort must exist in those abysms, though whether the home of the deep-sea animals be phosphorescent, as Sir Charles Lyell suggests, or how light may reach these creatures, we have no present means of determining.

If there is one theory which geologists have thought more justly founded than all others, it is the view that the various strata of the earth were formed at different times. A chalk district, for example, lying side by side with a sandstone district, has been referred to a totally different era. Whether the chalk was formed first, or whether the sandstone existed before the minute races came into being which formed the cretaceous stratum, might be a question. But no doubt existed in the minds of geologists that each formation belonged to a distinct period. Now, however, Dr. Carpenter and Professor Thompson may fairly say, "We have changed all this." It has been found that at points of the sea-bottom only eight or ten miles apart, there may be in progress the formation of a cretaceous deposit and of a sandstone region, each with its own proper fauna. "Wherever similar conditions are found upon the dry land of the present day," remarks Dr. Carpenter, "it has been supposed that the formation of chalk and the formation of sandstone must have been separated from each other by long periods, and the discovery that they may actually co-exist upon adjacent surfaces has done no less than strike at the very root of the customary assumptions with regard to geological time."

Even more interesting, perhaps, to many, are the results which have been obtained respecting the varying temperatures of deep-sea regions. The peculiarity just considered is, indeed, a consequence of such variations; but the fact itself is at least as interesting as the consequences which flow from it. It throws light on the long-standing controversy respecting the oceanic circulation. It has been found that the depths of the equatorial and tropical seas are colder than those of the North Atlantic. In the tropics the deep-sea temperature is considerably below the freezing-point of fresh water, in the deepest part of the Bay of Biscay the temperature is several degrees above the freezing-point. Thus one learns that the greater part of the water which lies deep below the surface of the equatorial and tropical seas comes from the Antarctic regions, though undoubtedly there are certain relatively narrow currents which carry the waters of the Arctic seas to the tropics. The great point to notice is that the water under the equatorial seas must really have travelled from polar regions. A cold of 30 degrees can be explained in no other way. We see at once, therefore, the explanation of those westerly equatorial currents which have been so long a subject of contest. Sir John Herschel failed to prove that they are due to the trade winds, but Maury failed equally to prove that they are due to the great warmth and consequent buoyancy of the equatorial waters. In fact, while Maury showed very convincingly that the great system of oceanic circulation is carried on despite the winds, Herschel proved in an equally convincing manner that the overflow conceived by Maury should result in an easterly instead of a westerly current. Recently the theory was put forward that the continual process of evaporation going on in the equatorial regions leads to an indraught of cold water in bottom-currents from the polar seas. Such currents coming towards the equator, that is, travelling from latitudes where the earth's eastwardly motion is less to latitudes in which that motion is greater, would lag behind, that is, would have a westwardly motion. It seems now placed beyond a doubt that this is the true explanation of the equatorial ocean-currents.

Such are a few, and but a few, among the many interesting results which have followed from the recent researches of Dr. Carpenter and Professor Thomson, in the hitherto little known depths of the great sea.—Spectator.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

THE EFFICACY OF FAITH.

The waves were dashing loud and high,
My child looked on with me;
"Father," she cried, "why may not I Trust God, and walk the sea?

"Was it not lack of faith alone
That made the apostle sink?
By faith, therefore, it may be done;
Father, what should I think?"

The Lord bade Peter go, my child;
And should He thee command,
Thy feet would on these waters wild
Be firm as on the sand.

But life has storms more awful yet,
Waves rougher than yon sea;
Then do not thou in these forget
That Jesus is with thee.

Care not what others have to do,
What may be or has been;
But in the path God calls thee go,
And use thy faith therein.

NAUHAUGHT, THE DEACON.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Nauhaught, the Indian deacon, who of old
Dwelt, poor but blameless, where his narrowing Cape
Stretches its shrunk arm out to all the winds
And the relentless smiting of the waves,
Awoke one morning from a pleasant dream
Of a good angel dropping in his hand
A fair, broad gold-piece, in the name of God.

He rose and went forth with the early day
Far inland, where the voices of the waves
Mellowed and mingled with the whispering leaves,
As, through the tangle of the low, thick woods,
He searched his traps. Therein nor beast nor bird
He found: though meanwhile in the reedy pools
The otter plashed, and underneath the pines
The partridge drummed: and as his thoughts went back
To the sick wife and little child at home,
What marvel that the poor man felt his faith
Too weak to bear its burden—like a rope
That, strand by strand uncoiling, breaks above
The hand that grasps it. "Even now, O Lord!
Send me," he prayed, "the angel of my dream!
Nauhaught is very poor; he cannot wait."

Even as he spake, he heard at his bare feet
A low, metallic clink, and, looking down,
He saw a dainty purse with disks of gold
Crowding its silken net. Awhile he held
The treasure up before his eyes, alone
With his great need, feeling the wondrous coins
Slide through his eager fingers, one by one.
So then the dream was true. The angel brought
One broad piece only; should he take all these?
Who would be wiser, in the blind, dumb woods?
The loser, doubtless rich, would scarcely miss
This dropped crumb from a table always full.
Still, while he mused, he seemed to hear the cry
Of a starved child; the sick face of his wife
Tempted him. Heart and flesh in fierce revolt
Urged the wild license of his savage youth
Against his later scruples. Bitter toil,
Prayer, fasting, dread of blame, and pitiless eyes
To watch his halting—had he lost for these
The freedom of the woods—the hunting-grounds
Of happy spirits for a walled-in heaven
Of everlasting psalms? One healed the sick
Very far off, thousands of moons ago:
Had he not prayed Him night and day to come
And cure his bed-bound wife? Was there a hell?
Were all his fathers' people writhing there—
Like the poor shell-fish set to boil alive—
Forever, dying never? If he kept
This gold, so needed, would the dreadful God
Torment him like a Mohawk's captive stuck
With slow-consuming splinters? Up in heaven
Would the good brother deacon, grown so rich
By selling rum to Indians, laugh to see him
Burn like a pitch-pine torch? His Christian garb
Seemed falling from him; with the fear and shame
Of Adam naked at the cool of day,
He gazed around. A black snake lay in coil
On the hot sand, a crow with sidelong eye
Watched from a dead bough. All his Indian lore
Of evil blending with a convert's faith
In the supernal terrors of the Book,
He saw the Tempter in the coiling snake
And ominous, black-winged bird; and all the while,
The low rebuking of the distant waves
Stole in upon him like the voice of God
Among the trees of Eden. Girding up
His soul's loins with a resolute hand, he thrust
The base thought from him: "Nauhaught, be a man!
Starve, if need be; but, while you live, look out
From honest eyes on all men, unashamed.
God help me! I am deacon of the church,
A baptized, praying Indian! Should I do
This secret meanness, even the barken knots
Of the old trees would turn to eyes to see it,
The birds would tell of it, and all the leaves
Whisper above me: 'Nauhaught is a thief!'
The sun would know it, and the stars that hide
Behind his light would watch me, and at night
Follow me with their sharp accusing eyes.
Yea, thou, God, seest me!" Then Nauhaught drew Closer his belt of leather, dulling thus
The pain of hunger, and walked bravely back
To the brown fishing-hamlet by the sea;
And, pausing at the inn-door, cheerily asked
"Who hath lost aught to-day?"
"I," said a voice;
"Ten golden pieces, in a silken purse,
My daughter's handiwork." He looked, and lo!
One stood before him in a coat of frieze,
And the glazed hat of a seafaring man,
Shrewd-faced, broad-shouldered, with no trace of wings.
Marvelling, he dropped within the stranger's hand
The silken web, and turned to go his way.
But the man said: "A tithe at least is yours;
Take it in God's name as an honest man."
And as the deacon's dusky fingers closed
Over the golden gift, "Yea, in God's name
I take it with a poor man's thanks," he said.
So down the street that, like a river of sand,
Ran, white in sunshine, to the summer sea,
He sought his home, singing and praising God;
And when his neighbors in their careless way
Spoke of the owner of the silken purse—
A Wellfleet skipper, known in every port
That the Cape opens in its sandy wall—
He answered, with a wise smile, to himself:
"I saw the angel where they see a man."

—Atlantic Monthly.

"No true prayer is ever lost—no right religious exercise is ever unfruitful—no struggle against evil ever unprofitable. These things may well encourage the feeble, fainting Christian to hold on, watch and pray."

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—Advices from Europe are to the 10th inst.

Great Britain.—The trigonometrical survey of the United Kingdom, which was commenced by Gen. Roy in 1783, was ended last week with the completion of the surveys in Scotland.

The prosecution of the directors of the Overend, Gurney & Co. joint stock company, resulted on the 22d ult. in the honorable acquittal of the defendants, the jury being absent from the Court less than ten minutes. An application for costs on the part of the prosecution was refused by the Lord Chief Justice, who expressed his entire concurrence with the verdict. The result was hailed with enthusiastic applause by a "vast crowd."

France.—The Rappel newspaper, one of the organs of the extreme Opposition, has been prosecuted for a violation of the law relating to the press, in publishing an article favoring political organizations among the soldiers. The two chief editors were sentenced to four months' imprisonment, and a fine of 1000 francs each, and one of them in addition, to four months' imprisonment and 1000 francs fine for having distributed among the soldiers an article calculated to foment insurrection. Official permission has, however, been given for the sale of the paper in the streets.

Count Daru, the new Minister of Foreign Affairs, has addressed a circular to the diplomatic representatives of France at foreign courts, announcing that the policy of the government will be absolutely pacific. Prime Minister Ollivier, in receiving the magistrates of Paris in a body, said in his address that he will maintain intact the dignity of the magistracy, and above all, will keep justice clear from politics, so that decisions will have the more weight. Permission has been given for the sale of all journals on the streets, and foreign journals will hereafter be distributed without examination by the Bureau of Censorship. The government has decided to allow Ledru Rollin and others to avail themselves of the amnesty recently granted.

An indication of the power of the new Ministry, it is thought, is found in the fact that Baron Haussman, Prefect of the Seine, under whose administration many changes, openings of new streets, and architectural improvements, have been made in Paris, has been displaced at their request, although the Emperor is understood to have wished to retain him in his position.

On the 10th, Ollivier addressed the Legislative Body, declaring that the Ministers considered it their first duty to communicate with the Legislature; that they had the confidence of the sovereign, and asked for that of the Chambers. They hoped that a policy of conciliation would prevail, and that all would aid in the work of establishing a national government adapted to the requirements of the nation, and likely to insure liberty without license.

Spain.—Gen. Prim, it is reported, asked of the King of Italy a positive assent or refusal to the candidacy of his nephew, the Duke of Genoa, for the Spanish throne, and that monarch returned a decided negative. All the Ministers, including Prim, thereupon resigned on the 4th inst. For some days much political agitation prevailed, and many conflicting rumors were current as to the probable course of the Cortes and the Regent; but on the 8th it was announced that the crisis had terminated, and that Rivero, President of the Cortes, had accepted the Ministry of the Interior, Admiral Topete that of Marine, and Sagosta that of State.

Italy.—The organization of the Council, it is stated, is completed, but it cannot yet promulgate decrees. The Committee on Dogmas has commenced its sittings. Some members of the Council have signed a petition to the Pope, asking him to present an opportunity for declaring the dogma of Papal infallibility, but he is said to adhere to the determination not to permit the introduction of the question unless success is certain.

Portugal.—An American company has secured from the Portuguese government, the privilege of landing an ocean telegraph cable on the Azores Islands. It is proposed to proceed from New York, without intervening land lines, directly to the Azores, thence to a point on the south coast of England near Brighton, and thence to have two branches, one to the French coast and the other to that of Holland, near the Hague.

South America.—The latest accounts received in Lisbon from Rio Janeiro, to the 15th ult., represented that Lopez had retired into Bolivia with his family, and the war was considered at an end. Ygustimi in Paraguay had been occupied by the allies without resistance. An agreement had been signed between Brazil and the Argentine Confederation, by which the former was to withdraw from Paraguay 14,000 men, and the latter its entire force.

Hayti.—The insurgents who have been for some time in conflict with President Salnave, have recently been so far successful that he was compelled to shut himself up in Port-au-Prince, declaring his determination to defend the place to the last extremity. The latest reports were that the insurgents had captured the city, but the fate of Salnave was not known.

St. Domingo.—It is reported that our government has effected a lease of the Bay of Samana, in this republic, for a naval station for U. S. vessels, and a treaty has been negotiated by President Baez and the American commercial agent at the city of St. Domingo, for the annexation of the republic to the United States as a Territory, the sum of $1,500,000 to be paid therefor, and to be devoted to the liquidation of the debts of St. Domingo, including the redemption of its currency; the treaty to be valid when ratified by the U. S. Senate and by a majority of the citizens of St. Domingo.

Domestic.—The Legislature of Missouri has ratified the 15th amendment, the Senate by a vote of 22 to 3, the House by 88 to 34.

The Supreme Court of Alabama has decided that there has been no property in slaves since 1863; and also that every judgment given by any of the Courts in Alabama from 1861 to 1865 is null and void, and that all the officers of the Courts and the Legislature during that period were mere usurpers.

The Legislature of New York has adopted resolutions repealing the ratification of the 15th amendment by the last Legislature, the Senate by 15 to 13, the Assembly by 65 to 56.

A Convention to propose amendments to the State Constitution of Tennessee, met at Nashville on the 10th inst. Seven Representatives of that State in Congress and one of the Senators have memorialized Congress, representing that the election held in the 8th month last for Governor, Legislature, &c., was conducted in disregard of the Constitution and laws of the State, that the character of the majority of the Legislature was determined by illegal votes, that said majority are passing and threatening unconstitutional acts, and that the election for the Constitutional Convention, ordered by that Legislature, was illegal; and asking Congress to protect the rights of the citizens of the State in this matter.

SUMMARY OF NEWS 351

LETTER FROM MARIA FOX.

LONDON, 24th of 4th mo., 1837.

To —— ——:

. . . "Thou mayst be assured, my dear, we feel for and with thee, under those exercises thou describest; but I infer from the tenor of the communication altogether, thy mind is at present in a state of excitement which it is safest for thee not to foster; for thankful as we ought to be, and I trust are, that thy attention is seriously turned to the consideration of those solemn truths which are of infinite and eternal importance, and on which the hopes of the true Christian depend, we should be sorry to see thee carried away by that current, which, though it may not always take the same direction, seems in the present day to endanger the deep, thorough, hidden work which must be carried on in every regenerated soul (and which is not the work of a day) before it can be prepared to bring forth mature, substantial and good fruit to the praise of the Great Husbandman. Far be it from me to give an opinion as to what may be thy future path; the great Head of the Church chooses His own instruments as it pleaseth Him; but even if it should be His purpose that thou should thus testify thy love to Him, He may show it thee, as he has done to many others, for years, before He calls thee to the public acknowledgment of it. I believe also that young converts—those who are newly awakened to the value and importance of religion—are very apt, in the ardor of their feelings, to imagine they are called to great things, and in the overflowings of that love to their Saviour which may be raised in their hearts, to believe they must, as thou expressest it, 'Speak His praise to those around;' but it does appear to me to be one of the very successful stratagems of our ever-watchful enemy, to persuade the young, as soon as they begin to walk in the right way themselves, that they are called upon to teach others, rather than to abide under that blessed teaching which would, if they had patience to endure its secret reproofs, and wait upon its many salutary though silent monitions, in due time make them much more capable to do so, in their daily life and conversation. I write to thee in great freedom, because thou hast asked it, and because, as one who has lived longer and has seen something of the insidious working of the cruel tempter, I feel it my duty so to do, being assured also thou wilt accept it as it is intended,—not to discourage thy progress in the way that is cast up for thee, whatever that way may be, but to show thee, if it may be, some of the dangers that surround the path of the young pilgrim. The longer I live, the more anxious I feel that the Lord may give me such a sense of the awful importance of the great truths of religion, as that I may always be fearful of substituting expression for experience, and that I may be more desirous to feed in secret upon the bread of life than to talk about it to others. Let us remember, my dear, that stillest streams are the deepest, and that it often pleases the great Sanctifier, Enlightener and Comforter of the people of the Lord to carry on His work in their souls after a very hidden manner. I would therefore rather encourage thee to diligence in the duties of the closet, to private reading of the Scriptures, to close self-examination, meditation and secret prayer, than to suffer thyself to be drawn forth into much conversation, or writing on thy spiritual concerns. If thou look to the Lord Jesus, and desire to be His sincere, humble follower, He has promised, such 'shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life;' and there is no teaching like His teaching." . . . .

TRUTH MADE SIMPLE AND CLEAR AS DEATH APPROACHED.

Caroline A. H. was of a lively, frank temper and good understanding, but disposed to enter into the pleasures of the world with all the avidity natural to youth. She partook, for a time, of its vanities with all the enjoyment they are capable of affording: but it pleased the Lord early to stain this beauty in her-view, and by the influence of his blessed Spirit on her heart, to awaken her, in the fifteenth year of her age, to higher pursuits and more substantial enjoyments, even the peace which is the reward of obedience to His will. After passing through many conflicts, she yielded to what she believed was required as a religious duty, and in a few months after joined the Baptist Church in Philadelphia. But not feeling quite satisfied, she afterwards became an Episcopalian, and an attentive, useful member of St. Paul's Church in the same city; diligent in the performance of the various duties which she thought would tend either to her own advancement or promote the good of others. She belonged to a Bible class, and was a teacher in the Sabbath-school under the care of that church, and actively employed in benevolent associations for assisting the destitute and afflicted. She also undertook the charge of an infant school, and continued for some time in that useful but arduous engagement. The companions to whom this state of mind attracted her were of a correspondent character; some of them, her intimate associates, were experienced in the Christian path, and were a means of encouraging and strengthening her. With these she was in the practice of meeting for social prayer, and on returning home it was her custom to retire immediately to her chamber, that the sweetness of heavenly good of which her soul had partaken might not be dissipated by joining in frivolous conversation. Although subjected by the peculiar texture of her mind, and the snares of an unwearied adversary, to many temptations, yet the Divine Witness never left her entirely to herself, and did not forsake her in the bitterest stages of her life. Her example of early dedication exerted an extraordinary influence on the minds of her less serious relatives, by which, under Providence, they were led to abandon many of the vain customs of the world and adopt more profitable pursuits.

Often, during the time of her best health and prosperity, she would call to mind this early visitation of Divine love, and express her gratitude to God in that he had snatched her "as a brand from the burning." At the age of twenty-four, she was married to Dr. H., and they settled in Burlington, N. J. Happy in herself,—happy in an amiable and most affectionate husband who knew how to appreciate her—whose welfare and comfort she made her study—and an infant son whose opening mind she watched with maternal love—she was cheerful as the morning, social, affable, kind-hearted and ready to assist those who required her aid. She soon became known and beloved in the neighborhood.

Bnt this is not the place of our rest. In the spring of 1837, she was attacked by what appeared to be inflammatory rheumatism, which deprived her of the power of using much exertion, and she felt, as she expressed it, "like a cumberer of the ground." Throughout the whole course of the disease, which terminated her existence in the morning of her life, she was blessed with the continuance of Divine mercy to support and sustain her, and which, we have every reason to believe, crowned her in the end with immortality and eternal life. The disease, from its insidious approach, was not discoverable until within two months of her decease, when she was subjected to medical discipline. A friend, in the early stage of it, sitting with her, was struck with the quiet and calmness with which she said, in allusion to a recent spell of pain, "I thought I should not recover!" Soon after, in the hope that change of air might be beneficial, her husband took her to Philadelphia, but fully aware of the dangerous nature of her disease, he thought it right to inform her mother, who had gone for a few months to a distant State, and showed the letter to Caroline, who approved of his sincerity and added a page or two.

After their return, her husband called in further medical aid, and she was confined to her bed, submitting with great patience to her painful complaint and all the remedies prescribed. Conversing with him freely on the nature of the disease, and of the prospect of eternity and the awfulness of death, she observed that at one time she had lived in the more full enjoyment of religion than subsequently, and that she regretted her backsliding, and the mistakes she had made, in which she had missed her way, but for which she now hoped to receive forgiveness.

Although she manifested resignation to the Divine will, yet her heart, at seasons, felt reluctant to leave the world and those who were most dear to her, more especially her husband and child, grieving, not on her own account, but for the bereaved condition of the former, saying, at one time: "My dear husband! how can I close my eyes forever on my husband!" asking him to give her up. In this early part of her illness, she expressed great anxiety about her mother, greatly desiring to see her, that it would make her so much more comfortable to have her at home at a time like this. A friend observing that "it was not new to her—that she knew to whom to look for help;"—"Yes," she said, "I try to keep as still as I can:" afterwards adding, He (the Lord) had been her help and support all her life, and He would continue to be so to the end; He would not fail: He had promised to "those who seek:" she had earnestly sought Him, and she knew that He would carry her through.

Her sister, who could not conceal her emotion when convinced that her recovery was hopeless, she gently reproved for grieving, saying, "why L., I am only going a little while before you," endeavoring, by the most persuasive arguments she could think of, to reconcile her to the parting. Through the whole of her illness, her trust was alone in Jesus, often adverting to the weakness of her heart, and that she could not save herself by anything she possessed—that her right hand could not save her, and she trusted for salvation alone in Jesus. When under deep suffering, she often exclaimed, "My Saviour has passed through the dark valley before me:" she would cast herself upon him. She repeated her desire to see her mother, as she had much to say to her—replying to a proposal to write anything she would dictate, "No! it was for herself; she had said what was on her mind to her husband, and knew more of his than she ever had known before." Her advancement in the path of Christian refinement became an object of intense interest to the friends who were round her. Having always attended the Episcopal Church, during her residence in Burlington, (from her skill in music she was one of the choir,) some of the clergy and other serious individuals visited her; but of these she said they could do but little for her, though acknowledging their attention and kindness. In time, she was made willing to leave all things to the will of her Divine Master, who knew best what was best for her, and ceased to be anxious about her mother, whom she said she might never see. Rising one day, she said to her husband, "I have now no wish to see my mother! I have given her up!" and expressed great thankfulness that the Lord had given her strength and so much resignation. "I have now no desire for her to come." Her absence, she said, would spare her feelings: it would be too great a trial for her mother to witness her sufferings, and her presence would only have a tendency to call her mind back to the earth. This seemed like the Lord's doing, and marvellous in our eyes, so contrary to her strong inclination. Her mind was now in a state of peaceful quiet, in which nothing seemed to have power to disturb her—all fear of death was taken away from that time: "Oh! death!" she exclaimed, "where is thy sting! Oh! grave, where is thy victory! I am going to a happy home. Oh! L., if you knew how happy I am, you would not wish me to stay." Afterwards, fears of her own state arising, she asked her sister if she thought she was deceiving herself, fervently praying that if so she might be undeceived. On one occasion, when under great suffering from an accumulation of water on the chest, and unable to lie down for several days and nights, being told by Bishop Doane that "the Lord chasteneth those whom He loveth," she expressed a willingness to endure all her pain with patience and resignation to His will, and during the same opportunity, she asked him "if he thought it wrong for her to wish to be taken away?" His answer was, "if she was willing to abide the Lord's will." She said, "Yes, yes." During one interview, she told him the ground of her faith and her entire reliance on her Saviour, but that this did not satisfy her; she desired to feel an evidence that she possessed the spirit of Christ. This, he said, could be only partially attained; he had believed her to be making progress, and reminded her of the promises of the Gospel. Affected by her child-like state of resignation and willingness to be taught, he acknowledged that it was a lesson to him, and ought to be to all; observing to her sister that they ought to rejoice and not to mourn. On bidding Caroline affectionately farewell, she desired him to "give her dying love to his wife;" and a friend who was sitting by, impressed with the solemnity of what she had said, afterwards observed to her that she "had preached to the Bishop." She answered, "though I am young, I wish to be useful." She said it not by any means boastingly, but she thought something might be learned even from the young. Having partaken of the living substance, she felt an insurmountable objection to receiving the outward bread and wine, which she was solicited to do in the sacrament of the supper, and in which she had been accustomed to join. After a conflict, which cost her many tears, she now wholly declined it. Expressing a strong desire to be made useful to others in the little time she had, and believing her disease to be unusual, she said if the physicians wished to make a post mortem examination, she was quite willing. The suffering now, from pain and difficulty of breathing, was very great; and though enduring it all with husband and child, grieving, not on her own account, but for the bereaved condition of the former, saying, at one time: "My dear husband! how can I close my eyes forever on my husband!" asking him to give her up. In this early part of her illness, she expressed great anxiety about her mother, greatly desiring to see her, that it would make her so much more comfortable to have her at home at a time like this. A friend observing that it was not new to her—that she knew to whom to look for help,—"Yes," she said, "I try to keep as still as I can;" afterwards adding, He (the Lord) had been her help and support all her life, and He would continue to be so to the end; He would not fail: He had promised to "those who seek:" she had earnestly sought Him, and she knew that He would carry her through.

Her sister, who could not conceal her emotion when convinced that her recovery was hopeless, she gently reproved for grieving, saying, "why [illegible] going a little while before you," endeavoring, by the most persuasive arguments she could think of, to reconcile her to the parting. Through the whole of her illness, her heart was alone to Jesus, and that she could not even herself by supplicating the throne—that her right hand could not save her, and she trusted for salvation alone in Jesus. When under deep suffering, she often exclaimed, "My Saviour has passed through the dark valley before me;" she would cast herself upon Him. She repeated her desire to see her mother, as she had much to say to her—implying to a friend, "and I would write anything she would wish, for I know it was for herself; she had sent word on her mind to her husband, and knew more of his than she ever had known before." Advancement in the path of Christian refinement became an object of tender interest to the friends who were round her. Having always attended the Episcopal Church, during her residence in Burlington, (from the early age of the music she was one of the choir,) some of the clergy and other serious individuals visited her; but of these she said they could do but little for her, though acknowledging their attention and kindness. In time, she was made willing to leave all things to the will of her Divine Master, who knew best what was best for her, and ceased to be anxious about her mother, whom she said she might never see. Rising one day, she said to her husband, "I have now no wish to see my mother." I have given her up!" and expressed great thankfulness that the Lord had given her strength and so much resignation. "I have now no desire for her to come." Her absence, she said, would spare her feelings; it would be too great a trial for her mother to witness exemplary patience, yet, when its violence drew from her a groan or sigh, she would say, "Oh! if you knew what I suffer, you would not wonder if I am impatient." She frequently expressed her preference for religious visits unaccompanied by the regular forms practiced on such occasions, and acknowledged the satisfaction she had felt from the visit of a female minister in the Society of Friends, whose testimony was in unison with her own feelings, and had been comfortable and consolatory to her.

That lively Faith, which is the substance of things hoped for, being richly given her, and leaning with full confidence on her Saviour, she would say to those about her: "Oh! trust Him! do not distrust Him! He knows that we are only dust, and He has promised that those who seek shall find! A death-bed is no time for repentance! Oh! do not put it off!" A cloud would sometimes obscure the brightness of her view. After this, she asked a friend who sat by "if she thought she should be saved if she were then taken away?" Her friend asking her "if her prospect was not then as clear?" she said, "No," and was reminded that experienced Christians had had these doubts. The clouds passed away, and the sun of righteousness again shone forth. "There," she said, pointing to her little son who had come into the room, "there is my strongest tie to earth, but I can give him up!" Having great faith in the precept, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it," she strongly felt the responsibility of a parent and a concern to bring him up "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

It appeared to be more than an ordinary tie that connected her with her husband and child; but those she gave up, that the Lord's will and work might be fulfilled in her. She now very freely conversed with a friend of hers, living in the country, on the unsettled state of a neighboring church. Her friend having been urged to connect herself with it, and comply with the requisitions by receiving baptism and the Supper, she advised her "not to be in haste, but to wait and seek Divine counsel." Expressing a great desire to be released, if it was the Lord's will, she said to a friend: "I am afraid I am too anxious—is it right to be so anxious?" adding, in reference to one who had just breathed her last in peace, "I am afraid I envy her." At another time, speaking of the terrors of death, she said, "She had none. Oh! death, where is thy sting! Oh! grave, where is thy victory!" Again, "Saviour, Saviour, haste thy speed! haste thy speed! come and take me to thyself!" A letter arriving from her mother excited much tender feeling. Having it read to her repeatedly, she afterwards asked to hear it once more, and placed it under her pillow. On being asked if she would have her son brought in to see her, "Oh no!" she said, and, much affected on his account, wept. But her husband, who was most anxious that her mind should not be disturbed at so late a period, telling her that he hoped it was but a minor consideration to her, she wiped away the tears from her eyes, and recovering her fortitude, said, with great serenity of countenance, "It is only a little nature come up, but the Lord will give me grace sufficient to put it down." On the 23d of Seventh month, she had an interview with Samuel Aaron, a minister of the Baptist Church, with whom she was well acquainted, and in whose Christian humility and integrity she had undoubted and well-placed confidence. She told him she had always felt great terror of death until the day before, and that now she felt so perfectly free from that state, that she was afraid it was a deception of the heart —that she had prayed, at a very early age, that she might not have any fear of the terrors of death, and it seemed that God had fulfilled His gracious promise to her and answered her early prayer. She then asked him "what were evidences of the reality and of her not being deceived:" she wished "indubitable evidence." He suggested to her, in reply, that the very fact of her having doubts of herself was to him an evidence that she was not deceived, as she did not depend on her own works, but on Jesus. To this she answered "Yes." Other interesting conversation took place, in which she set forth the emptiness of the profession which many were making of religion, and that as regarded herself, she had been long dissatisfied. The interview excited in him much tenderness of feeling, in which he acknowledged a deep and humbling consciousness of his own weaknesses. During the course of her illness, she never appeared to suffer her mind to be carried away for a moment by the delusive hope of recovery. On Third-day, the week before her decease, she was so much revived as to hold considerable conversation with individuals; her mind was alive to the comfort of every one, and she was able to give minute directions in domestic concerns. During this interval, a friend of hers from Philadelphia said to her: "Your health, Caroline, has been so variable, and you are now so much better, I think there is hope for your recovery." She answered that "she was more sanguine than anybody else about it; but," she added, "I do not wish any hope entertained of my recovery, for I shall be disappointed if I do—it is not my wish." Her friend then asked if she would not be pleased to recover provided she should enjoy good health? She replied, that if it was the Lord's will to spare her for some useful or wise purpose, she would be satisfied, but she had no will of her own—"not my will, but thine, O Lord! be done." It gave her no pleasure to hear that she looked better; her heart and affections appeared to be in Heaven, and she longed, as she expressed it, "to go home." "Do not sigh," she would say to her sister, "you do not know how it hurts me to hear you sigh; if you knew how happy I am, you would not wish to keep me back,"—desiring them all, when she observed them weeping, "not to mourn for her." The pain and suffering returning with increased violence, she seemed disappointed on each returning morning to find herself still here, observing to a friend, who came in to see her, "I had hoped to be at home—I am afraid of sin." Her friend saying "that suffering is allotted to us while we continue in these bodies"—"Yes," she said, "but rest will be the sweeter, we shall enjoy it the more." It was not, she hoped and trusted, for the sake of escaping from suffering that she desired to be gone; repeating—"not to escape from suffering."

She had expressed that she felt "not the raptures which some had described, but quietness and sweet peace! How trifling," she added, "everything in this world appears. I am now able to give up husband, son and mother—all into Thy hands, O Lord! I resign them all—it is finished! the work is done! I am ready!" Turning to two members of the Society of Friends, who sat by her bed, she asked them "if she might be permitted to be buried in Friends' burial-ground," adding: "I am a stranger, but I shall occupy but little space." Although the request was unexpected to them, believing her to belong to another Society, yet she was assured that "there could be no doubt of it; she might make her mind quite easy on that point." An Episcopal friend present, apprehending she had not considered that the usual burial-service could not be performed in that ground, reminded her of this at another time; she replied, "and what is that to this poor body? It is all nothing!" She gave directions regarding the funeral, requesting that everything in relation to it might be very plain and consistent. She desired that her thanks might be given to Bishop Doane and others for their kindness during her illness, and observed how dear the Society of Friends had become to her, and how differently she now estimated them from what she had heretofore done. At a time when her departure appeared very near, she repeated, "Sister spirit come away," and afterwards added: "Oh the pain! the bliss of dying." "Come Lord Jesus! from Calvary's mount, conduct me through the dark valley and shadow of death! Farewell, dear friends"—thanking them affectionately for all their kindness. She said to her husband, "Remember, my dear, what I told thee, plain and simple;" observing to one of her friends that she would have a sad office "to inform my mother of all!—tell her everything;" again requesting them not to mourn for her, and tenderly recommending her sister to leave the room if she felt unable to bear it. The night was one of extreme restlessness and pain. On being asked if she suffered much: "Yes," she said, "agony of body." Even then she could give particular directions for what she thought would add to her husband's comfort. Affection for him seemed to survive every earthly feeling—desirous for the moment to arrive, she would frequently ask him how near he thought it was. His answers were always candid, with his hand on her wrist, telling her how long he thought it probable she might last. He asked her if the time had now come, what would be her last concern? With her hand on her heart, she pointed to him—having before said: "Seek—seek to follow me." He asked her if the same bright prospect still continued. She said, "Yes." Her sister observing that "her head was clearer than her own," she said she had early prayed that her reason might be preserved in the hour of death, "and you see how it has been fulfilled!"

There was in her chamber a feeling of sweet solemnity and peace, which seemed to forbid the voice of mourning. Her mind, throughout, was perfectly clear, and her conversation generally animated. Her departure was now at hand; she sent to desire her sister not to put on black for her, and with tender consideration for the friend who was supporting her head, gently removed her hand, and laid her own arm upon it, telling her "she would wear herself out!" Soon after, she broke forth as follows: "My husband!" and then after a short pause proceeded: "Husband, I have none! child, I have none! mother, I have none!" thus intimating that the Lord was her husband, her child, her parent, and her all. It corresponded with the Scripture. "Those who have husbands shall be as those who have none," &c. Presently after, at 5 o'clock in the morning of the 4th of Eighth month, 1837, her redeemed soul was sweetly at rest in Jesus. She died in the 28th year of her age.

The naturally sweet expression of her face still remained, and the serenity of her soul seemed written upon it in death. She was laid, agreeably to her request, in Friends' burial-ground in Burlington, and a holy solemnity was felt by those who were there assembled, while the dust was committed to its kindred dust, and the Divine language was repeated: "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; over him the second death shall have no power!" THE TRUTHFUL USE OF CHRISTIAN LANGUAGE.

There is a striking difference between a people just entered upon a career of Christian civilization, and one whose Christianity is reckoned by centuries. The new forms of thought and feeling in the case of the former are indeed imperfectly expressed, but they are fresh and direct. The Christian culture of our day, on the other hand, transmitted as it has been from past ages, is encumbered, to a great degree, with formal and mechanical phraseology. It has been objected against the French language, that it contains so many expressions all prepared for the use required, that a simpleton, with their help, can appear for a considerable time quite profound. This, however, is not peculiar to the French; in that language the degrading process has only been more rapid than in others. The same complaint comes from England, and in Germany the symptoms of similar confusion and corruption of language, springing from excessive refinement and the lack of naturalness, are evident to every serious observer.

Even in the literature and religious language of the church, this mechanical phraseology extensively prevails. The rich treasure of pious discourse in which the deep emotions of our ancestors once found utterance, is appropriated by the merely worldly preacher, and used without any true thought of what it expresses. In the beginning he is conscious that the words and thoughts he uses are exhortations to himself not to cease to strive after the divine life which they express. But the mind, by abuse, becomes more and more insensible to the difference between the use of words with a full recognition of their meaning, and a careless employment of them as mere phraseology, and thus the man falls into a mechanical and merely habitual repetition of the noblest terms. His use of religious language is accompanied with no corresponding thoughts. His real life runs in another channel. How great the danger that the progressive estrangement between his life and his words will issue in the transition from an unconscious divergence to conscious hypocrisy.

We would not be understood as maintaining that one may not use a term, the full meaning of which is not at the moment present to the mind. On the contrary, it is characteristic of the deepest thoughts, that they are always accompanied by a certain striving of the soul to reach the fulness of the terms in which it has chosen to clothe them. But, then, this conscious striving is never to be neglected. It is only when it really exists, and the imperfection is not only felt, but true efforts made to diminish it, that the difference between a ripe word and an unripe life is tolerable. It is only then that the words, especially the sacred words, which we take upon our lips, elevate the soul in its weakness, and bear it into a higher atmosphere.—Theol. Eclectic, 1863. SPIRITUAL GUIDANCE.

A comparison between the following extract and those confessions of faith in the immediate and perceptible guidance of the Spirit, with which the readers of the Review are familiar, will serve to show the spiritual oneness of true believers. The extract is from a recent volume by E. M. Gouldburn, on Progress in Holiness; and is especially noteworthy from the fact that the author is one of the High Church party in England.

When language so befitting the lips of Fox, of Story, of Grellet, or of any well-instructed Friend of this or any age, comes from such a source, it must recall us forcibly to the divine principle of charity in judgment. While thankfully commending such a persuasion of truth in others, may we daily stir each other up with the warning, "Let no man take thy crown!" J. P.

"The principles of all right conduct, and of all right sentiment, are, no doubt, laid down with perfect clearness in the Holy Scriptures; but we need for the conduct of daily life something more than this—it is necessary that we should see the right application of these principles to the ever-new and unforeseen openings for moral conduct which are continually presented to us. And this cannot be done by any outward rule, written and printed on paper, however perfect. It can only be done by submission of the will to what is called 'the Law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus;' that is, by compliance with the instigations which on such occasions the Spirit of God makes in the hearts of those who are sincerely and singly desirous of pleasing Him. . . . . As a man increases in earnest love to Christ, a delicate tact grows up within him, a spiritual instinct, which teaches him (without any book) what he ought to say and do, and what he had better avoid, in each par-

THE TRUTHFUL USE OF CHRISTIAN LANGUAGE.

There is a striking difference between a people just entered upon a career of Christian civilization, and one whose Christianity is redeemed by centuries. The new forms of thought and feeling in the case of the former are indeed imperfectly expressed, but they are fresh and divine. The Christian culture of our day, on the other hand, retains for it a great degree, with formal and mechanical phraseology. It has been objected against the French language, that it is not possible to express all proposed for the use required, that a simplicity with their being can appear for a considerable time to prevail. This, however, is not peculiar to the French; in that language the degrading process has only been more rapid than in others. The same complaint comes from England, and in Germany the symptoms of similar confusion and corruption of language, arising from excessive refinement and the lack of natural ness, are evident to every serious observer.

Even in the literature and religious language of the church, this mechanical phraseology extensively prevails. The rich treasure of pious discourse in which the deep experiences of our ancestors once found utterance is appropriated by the merely worldly professor, and used without any true thought of what it expresses. In the beginning he is conscious that the words and thoughts he uses are extorsions to himself and to cause to strive after the divine life which they express. But the mind, by abuse, becomes more and more insensible to the difference between the use of words with a full recognition of their meaning, and a careless employment of them as mere phraseology, and thus the man falls into a merely literal and merely habitual repetition of the hallowed terms. His use of religious language is accompanied with no corresponding thought. His real life runs in another channel. How great the danger that the progressive estrangement between his life and his words will issue in the transition from an unconscious divorcence to conscious hypocrisy.

LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN.

Do not, as you value your soul, be excusing your acknowledged worldliness by urging this or that reason, such as your situation, your temptations, your connections. Cut all reasoning short by these inquiries: What does the Bible say? by what rule will the Judge of all proceed, when He sitteth upon the throne of His glory? Put these questions fairly and honestly, and you will be convinced that conformity to the world is but another name for ruin. Yield to conviction, and ask grace from the Lord that you may be one of His separated people. A Christian should be satisfied with nothing that will not satisfy God. You will say that worldly pleasures are both innocent and necessary. Try their innocence while I am asking you the following questions: Have you any authority for expecting that the grace and blessing of God will sanctify them to your soul? Do you actually find the cheering presence of the Lord with you while partaking of them? Can you, in the society with which you then mingle, speak of the glorious Gospel, of a Saviour's love, of the costly price of redemption, of a Christian's joys and sorrows, of a believer's inheritance and crown? Can you and do you retire from these amusements with a spiritual mind suited to prayer and praise, disposed to hold fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ? Do they prepare your soul, by cherishing holy and heavenly affections, for the joys and songs of the spirits of just men made perfect? If they do not, oh, how worthless! Would you have no objection whilst joining in worldly pleasures, to meet the stroke of death, or to hear the solemn summons to come to judgment, and stand before the Son of man? Now, my dear young friend, answer these questions solemnly, honestly, as in the sight of God, and then they will be answered honestly; and say whether the pleasures and amusements are innocent or not. In proportion as the heart is filled with them, there is no room for God. Oh, we have no time to waste in frivolous follies, nor do they suit our perilous condition here. Enemies are encamped against our souls—enemies within and without. Their power is great and their name legion. Yet a little while only is the light with us. Death is near—eternity at hand. Our business is not to trifle, but to prepare to meet our God—to watch and pray—to be humbled before God——to be trusting, loving and serving Christ—pressing forward towards the crown of life—seeking an abundant entrance into the everlasting Kingdom. Oh, be not conformed to the world; it can furnish no solid, abiding joy. God reconciled in and through Christ is the only happiness of the soul of man. Look for happiness, then, where there is no disappointment, for the God whom you seek will be the fountain and guardian of your joy for ever and ever.—Robert Houseman.

WALKING IN THE LIGHT.

It was the privilege of the priests to feed in God's dwelling-place, upon the offerings which represented the expiation of the sins of Israel and formed the ground of their worship. But when a priest sinned, he could not draw near as a worshipper until he had offered a sin-offering for himself; and this he was commanded not to eat, but to burn with fire. This is designed to teach us that the believer is brought into the light of God's presence by the atonement of Christ; and there it is his privilege to abide, feeding with God upon the sacrifice, delighting in the unspeakable love and the divine righteousness which it displays. Yet if he sins, he cannot enjoy communion until he has come to God for cleansing. He has forsaken the light, and he must confess his sin in the terrible character in which it is revealed by the suffering of God's Holy One, before he can enter into communion. To confine the results of the death of Christ to salvation from wrath, manifests carelessness about sin, and leads to hardness of heart. To profess communion with God while we allow sin and uncleanness, dishonors the most precious death of Christ, on whom we profess to feed in fellowship with a holy God.

The Scripture does not say that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin if we walk up to the light; for that none do: nor if we walk up to it as far as we can: but absolutely, if we walk "in the light," having no other standard, honestly walking in the light "as God," who sees all according to His holy nature, "is in the light." The light shows sin in its true color, but also shows how completely the blood cleanses us from all sin. To walk after the manner of other Christians, making their approval our standard, is not walking in the light. Surely it is not necessary to add that indulgence in worldliness, unmortified tempers, or self-pleasing, is not walking in the light. If we walk thus, and say that we have fellowship with Him, we lie and do not the truth. We may know the truth, but we are not doing it; and honest dealing with ourselves will discover darkness and death instead of life and grace.

A Christian often complains that he has not more enjoyment; and yet he is all the while giving way to pride or selfishness, or evil-speaking, or ungoverned tempers. He tries perhaps to settle himself more firmly on gospel ground; but what he really needs is to confess his sins, to come to the light, to know that the blood, which is God's only adequate judgment of the sinfulness of sin, will not give him fellowship with God while he is walking in darkness. People almost seem to think that the blood of Christ was a provision to enable God to make men happy in sin, instead of a provision to bring men out of darkness into light.

The believer who walks humbly with God blesses Him for the light, and rejoices in a salvation which not only delivers him from wrath, but reveals God in His holy and blessed nature. Such a one would not have his failures excused; for he has been made a partaker of the divine nature, and, as he walks in fellowship with God, he hates even the garments spotted by the flesh. He feeds with God upon the Sacrifice; and instead of merely knowing its virtue to deliver from judgment, he becomes daily more acquainted with its infinite perfection as seen in the light of God, and grows in fellowship with the Father and the Son. The more he is in the light, the more he will value the cleansing blood; holiness of life will increase his sensitiveness to the evil of sin, and will thus enhance his appreciation of the atonement. By the blood we come into the light, and in the light we know the value of the blood—Witness.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 22, 1870.

THE DWELLING PLACE.—Regarding with tender love the many precious souls to whom the word of salvation is sent, and who, having been through mercy joined to the Lord, have tasted and do taste of "the good word of life," those who "pray for the peace of Jesusalem" cannot but earnestly crave that these may "dwell in the secret place of the Most High," and "abide under the shadow of the Almighty." "Thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations!" exclaimed the man of God to whom the earliest history of our race was revealed. Intelligible and dear to the class alluded to is the injunction and gracious invitation of Him in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead: "ABIDE IN ME."

In the year 1684, Geo. Fox, in the holy sense of oneness which no sectarian organization could impart, addressed those whom he could adopt as "dear Friends and brethren in the Lord Jesus Christ,"—entreating all "who are of the seed of the promise, children of the kingdom of God and of the new covenant of light and life, to walk in the same and worthy of the same, to the glory of God." He exhorted those who profess the "primitive, pure and undefiled religion," to "show it forth in life and practice."

In that day there was a large brotherhood who could be thus addressed. And to-day, among the readers of the Review, there is, we thankfully believe, a band of believers, "followers of God as dear children," to whom the following passages from the address alluded to will be comforting and edifying:

"And now, dear friends and brethren who profess and possess that which is above all religious ways and worships in the world; our desire is that you may always outstrip and exceed the world in virtue, in purity, in chastity, in Godliness and in holiness; and in modesty, civility, righteousness and love. With that you may overcome the evil; and with the good overcome the bad; so that your moderation and holier life may appear to all, and answer that [which is] of God in all. That so the fruits of the Spirit may show themselves forth in meekness, kindness and humility; from the holy understanding and the pure heavenly wisdom, and the Word of life and patience, by which all things were made. In that you will be able to bear all things, and endure all things, through Him that strengthens you.

"And whatsoever things are lovely, decent or comely, and honest and of good report, that answer the Truth in all, THAT mind and practice; that God Almighty may be glorified in His Seed that serves him: in which Seed [Christ the Seed] all nations are blessed: which bruiseth the head of the serpent that brought the curse. In which Seed no enmity nor strife can come: in which Seed, Christ Jesus, your heavenly unity and fellowship is preserved. And whatever storms or tempests should arise in the world, keep in the Seed CHRIST JESUS your Sanctuary, who was before the world was; who is your Saviour that destroys the destroyer; in whom you have all life, peace, rest, safety and salvation.

"In Him, who is the Amen, the First and the Last, farewell: and from Him the blessings of the Lord rest upon you."

Those who have the evidence that they have been grafted into Christ, the Vine, have abundant cause for peace and joy, always with humility, godly fear and faith. "If the root be holy," saith the Apostle, "so are the evil-speaking, or ungoverned temper. He tries perhaps to settle himself more firmly on gospel ground; but what he really needs is to confess his sins, to come to the light, to know that the blood, which is God's only adequate judgment of the sinfulness of sin, will not give him fellowship with God while he is walking in darkness. People almost seem to think that the blood of Christ was a provision to enable God to make men happy in sin, instead of a provision to bring men out of darkness into light.

Such a one would not have his failures excused; for he has been made a partaker of the divine nature, and, as he walks in fellowship with God, he hates even the garments spotted by the flesh. He feels with God upon the question; and instead of merely knowing its virtue to deliver from judgment, he becomes daily more acquainted with its infinite perfection as well as the light of God, and grows in fellowship with the light, the more he will value the cleansing blood; holiness of life will become his sincerest desire to the evil of sin, and will thus enhance his appreciation of the atonement. By the blood we came into the light, and in the light we know the value of the blood.—Ibid.

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 22, 1884.

THE DIFFICULTIES—Regarding with tender love the many precious souls to whom the word of salvation is sent, and who, having been through mercy joined to the Lord, have tasted and do taste of "the good word of life," those who "pray for the peace of Jerusalem" cannot but earnestly crave that these may "dwell in the secret place of the Most High," and "abide under the shadow of the Almighty." "Then hast been our dwelling-place in all generations!" exclaimed the man of God to whom the earliest history of our race was revealed. Intelligible and dear to the class alluded to is the tojnation and gracious invitation of Him in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead: "ABIDE IN ME."

In the year 1684, Geo. Fox, in the holy sense of oneness which no sectarian organization could impart, addressed those whom he could adopt as "dear Friends and brethren in the branches." They are safe—but conditionally so. How impressive the warning: "Thou standest by faith—be not high-minded, but fear." "Towards thee, goodness—if thou continue in His goodness—otherwise thou shalt be cut off." "Take heed, lest He also spare not thee."

The pardon of sins that are past is a kingly act. It is perfect. A burden has been rolled off, with the weight of which pressing upon him, the pilgrim was despairing, knowing that he could not be saved in his sins. But the pardoned sinner has acquired no righteousness save that of Him who gave the pardon, —and he is only safe whilst he shall "continue in His goodness." "Patient continuance in well-doing" is essential.

But this consideration does not render insecure the disciple who leans upon Jesus' bosom. "By faith ye stand." Even Peter began to sink the moment his faith in Christ was supplanted by distrust. The power which could wipe away transgression and render the guilty soul faultless, which was able to sanctify and justify, which is competent to keep that which was committed to Him even to the final day—is faithful to the inestimable trust—is able to keep the soul from falling and to present it, faultless still, before the throne, and within those gates from which the smallest remaining taint of sin would be an inevitable exclusion. The power of God is "unto salvation,"—is sufficient to "make perfect, strengthen, stablish, settle." It is amply sufficient to free from the power of sin. The Psalmist saw that this condition was attainable, when he was inspired to pray: "Let not any iniquity have dominion over me!" And Paul, addressing those who "yield themselves to God as those that are alive from the dead," was bold to declare: "Sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under the law but under grace." The experiences of Fox, Penington and other early Friends, (whose writings see,) illustrate that complete sanctification, in other words, the Christian perfection so emphatically enjoined in Scripture is attainable.

And yet if angels left their first estate, surely the awakened soul has need to cling closely to the Saviour, "always to pray and not to faint." In such filial position "that wicked one toucheth him not."

> "The soul that on Jesus has leaned for repose,
> He cannot, He will not desert to its foes."

"He that hath the Son hath life." "He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son."

James Naylor, when in company with George Fox, had a presentiment that one of those two should fall. The honorable Elder, being preserved in the constant realization that Christ was all and that he was nothing, was favored with a calm conviction that he should "never fall." Indeed, how could he, or any one, whilst abiding in Him that is able to keep from falling? But if James Naylor experienced the desolate state of the branch fallen off, he also, when he ceased to be "high-minded," realized the blessed assurance that "God is able to graff them again;" and being made free from sin and become a servant of God, he had his fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. (Rom. vi. 20.) Filled with the Spirit which "bears no evil in itself," and has for its ground and spring "the mercies and forgiveness of God," the heavenly breathings with which his soul passed into "eternal holy life," are scarcely surpassed by any words of human eloquence.

The Same Power.—A beloved Friend of Indiana Yearly Meeting, in a private letter, gives comforting assurance that "the Lord is visiting His people in many parts of the vineyard." He tells of several meetings held in remarkable life and solemnity, and of new witnesses for Jesus being raised up; also of successive appointed meetings in one neighborhood, the house being crowded to its utmost capacity—some of the members being afresh awakened to a new life, and a considerable prospective addition to the membership.

This ought not to surprise any one. Is the Lord's arm shortened, or His ear grown heavy? Truly His power is the same as when he added to the Church daily such as were saved. And are not His mercies new every morning, and His offer of free salvation still extended? Never was there stronger reason for old men and children, young men and maidens, to bless Him for His goodness and wonderful works, or greater need than now to flee to Him for refuge. Never did the free payment of our debt of sin, the ransom and the intercession of our Redeemer and Mediator, possess more power than now to melt the heart in tenderness and love to Him who first loved us. The Psalmist put unto himself the searching query, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits toward me?" He finds nothing to render but simple acceptance, and he immediately answers his own question: "I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the Name of the Lord: I will pay my vows unto the Lord now, in the presence of all His people."

"I fear," says our dear Friend, "if Friends do not improve the offer, now that the waters are troubled, it may be a long time before the angel will visit us again with such power."

May the work go on, in the love and the fear, in the liberty and the restrainings of the Divine Master, and regulated by "the peaceable Spirit and wisdom of Jesus."

PEACE.—Our friend W. G. Hubbard gives an interesting account of abundant labors in the cause of Peace in the States of Iowa and Indiana, the peaceable message having been received with remarkable favor by many who had not previously seen the wickedness and folly of war.

He has presented the subject and introduced Dymond on War and other Peace documents to sundry colleges, to the University of Indiana, and to many ministers of religion, and other persons of conspicuous and influential positions.

We rejoice that a doctrine so essential to true civilization, humanity and religion should claim the attention of thinking men. We remember the case of a military officer who sat down to the perusal of Dymond's treatise for the purpose of studying it and exposing the flaws which he was sure must exist in his argument. He read it with candor and intensity—and finding nothing which he could controvert, he pursued the course of an honest man—he threw up his commission—enlisted under the Prince of Peace, and became a valiant testimony-bearer against all those lusts from whence come wars and fightings.

On another page will be found a fresh essay from W. G. H.

ANONYMOUS LETTERS.—The editorial on page 264 had no reference to any thing that had been received by the Editor. Our correspondents have been uniformly kind and considerate.

IMPORTANT MEETING.—On page 351 will be found notice of a Meeting which we trust will be largely attended.

MARRIED,

At Friends' Meeting, Plainfield, Ind., on the 12th of Eighth mo., 1869, CHARLES ALBERT JOHNSON and MELISSA E. NORDYKE, both of Plainfield.

At a meeting appointed at the house of the bride's father, near Hesper, Iowa, on the 24th of Eleventh month, 1869, JOHN I. TAVENER to CAROLINE W. FAWCETT.

DIED.

COLE.—At his residence in Jackson, Maine, on the 3d of Fourth month, 1869, after a severe illness of three days, Reuben Cole, aged 71 years. We believe his end was peace.

WINSLOW.—In Burnham, Maine, on the 22d of Fourth month, 1869, Noah Winslow, very suddenly, in the 69th year of his age.

ROBINSON.—In Brooks, Maine, on the 30th of Third month, 1869, Ira Robinson,—all members of Unity Monthly Meeting.

GOUGH.—At Ellenville, N. Y., on the 14th of Tenth month, 1869, Sarah Gough, in the 73d year of her age; an esteemed member of Marlborough Monthly Meeting. She was an accredited minister of the Gospel more than thirty years. During a long life of peculiar and varied trial, this dear Friend maintained her fidelity to her Saviour, recognizing in all life's discipline His loving hand guiding and sustaining. Those who knew her most intimately can testify to the richness and fulness of her religious experience, growing out of her constant walk with Jesus, her daily life reflecting in an eminent degree the blessed image of her Divine Master. Her enlarged Christian charity greeted as fellow-heirs of eternal life all who love the Lord Jesus, of whatever name, and while with Christ-like love she yearned for the conversion of sinners, her prayers were frequent and fervent for greater spirituality in the professors of the Christian name.

BOWLES.—At the residence of his son David Bowles, Jr., near Redfield, Dallas Co., Iowa, on the 17th of Third month, 1869, Daniel Bowles, Sr., in the 86th year of his age; a member of Bear Creek Monthly Meeting. He was a native of Pascotank Co., N. C., and was one of the pioneer settlers at Richmond, Ind., in 1807. During the greater portion of his long life he was an active member of our religious Society, and an able supporter of its principles and practices. His close was easy and peaceful, marked by entire resignation to the Divine Will, and a well-grounded hope in the mercy of the Redeemer of men.

ROBERTS.—At New Durham, N. H., on the 31st of Seventh month, 1869, Thomas Roberts, in the 79th year of his age; an esteemed member of Dover Monthly Meeting. In early life he was brought to feel the necessity of bearing the cross, without which he said—after he had reached the age of threescore years and ten—it had always been his experience that there was no crown. He manifested a deep interest in the attendance of all our religious meetings, where he was frequently engaged to bear testimony to the Truth as it is in Jesus. During his last illness, on being asked if he felt that the Anchor was sure, he replied, "Firm as far as has been tried;" and when the summons came to depart, he was sustained by an unfaltering trust in Him in whom he had believed.

EATON.—At the residence of her father Richard Williams, on the 25th of Tenth month, 1869, Mary Albina Eaton, wife of Hiram Eaton,—an exemplary member and a successful First-day school teacher of Ypsilanti Mo. Meeting, Mich. Few have fairer prospects of lengthened life and increasing usefulness than this Friend, or are more highly prized and beloved than she was in the large family connection of which she was a member. Sudden and awful was the final summons, yet she expressed with calmness and confidence "that she had tried to live a Christian; and though sensible of her failings, she could now trust in Jesus, and the prospect before her was bright."

HILLSBORO', ORANGE CO., N.C., 12th mo, 22, 1869.

The Trustees and many of the colored people have been here to see me this evening. Poor creatures, they want counsel and help. They are in terror and dismay from outlaws abroad, and in famine and starvation from poverty at home. One of the Trustees, and an intelligent man, too, said that there would be "many people in this country who would starve to death this winter," and that they "had never known such a time since the surrender." ALFRED H. JONES, Supt.

JAMESTOWN, N. C., 12th mo. 22, 1869.

Last year I hoped a single cry might not be heard at this time from the freedmen, but the drought of last summer has been terrible, as thou art already aware. Many of our colored, as well as white people, had planted patches of cotton, in addition to their corn crops, hoping to spend the long winter evenings in spinning to make cloth and clothe themselves, but cotton will not grow even in the South unless the season proves favorable; hence they have succeeded in neither, and are now, many of them, quite in want of clothing and of food. Even here in our little neighborhood application has been made to us for bread for 28 persons to-day, who were in actual want of bread,—not all colored persons, but all members of the same body; and it is indeed painful to say, all were not supplied; we could not do it. These are not idle vagabonds either, but hard-working, industrious persons, all who are of sufficient size and strength. . . . .

DANVILLE, N. C., 1st mo. 10, 1870.

I am sometimes astonished at the extent and severity of the suffering with which we are surrounded, not only in the town, but in the country for many miles around. Hordes of poor, half-naked, famishing suppliants, with want and despair depicted upon their countenances, despoiled by the drouth of a summer's toil, come to us:—"Please, sir, will you give me a little meal to keep my children from starving;" or, "Please, sir, will you give me something to clothe my children, to keep them from perishing—shirts, or coats, or any thing, good master, you's pleased to give us." "We's mighty glad to get any thing you's mind to give."—"We's mighty hard scuffle." —"Seems like we can't get nothing, no way." —"We done jus' ready to perish." Not less than two thousand have applied at our Mission for help since the setting in of cold weather." . . . A. H. JONES.

RICHMOND, VA., 1st mo. 19, 1870.

In my last I spoke of the gloomy prospect before the poor freedmen during this winter on account of the failure of their corn crop by the drouth. Our Heavenly Father, who disposeth all things, has opened the way for their relief very remarkably, by flour being so plenty and low in price, and by the great demand which has opened for their labor at remunerative wages in the cotton-growing States. Thousands are availing themselves of these offers and going thither; thus making their own condition and that of their friends they leave behind greatly improved. The Southern people have become used to the labor of the negro, and really cannot well do without them; hence, when the demand exceeds the supply, it will ensure better pay and treatment. That this state of things will soon be reached in this State is now quite hopeful. I do not write to disguise the fact that there is real suffering here now, and of a character which calls loudly for relief.

We have received from private sources—from two, $15 each, and from one, $50, especially for the sick and aged,—the donors wishing, doubtless, that their "alms should be in secret." These sums are placed in the hands of my dear wife, who finds plenty of worthy subjects for this charity. The aged in distress, with the sick and afflicted, should ever claim our warmest sympathy. The mental culture of the children of this long oppressed race should not be forgotten by the private sympathy or public enactments of our country. We can report the schools under our charge in excellent condition, with about 2000 pupils enrolled the past month; in each case the freedmen sharing a part of the expense, and doing it with commendable promptness. In most cases this amounts to the full board of the teacher and the supply of books; but in some localities, on account of the drouth, they only buy the books. This is generally done by subscription on the part of the parents, making the school free, as it ought to be, to every child within its limits.

It is to be hoped Congress will increase and extend the educational work in the South for years to come, as no government can afford to tolerate such a mass of ignorance within its borders. It is well known that, in Virginia alone, there are at least 500,000 of the population (including the whites) who cannot read or write. With the efforts put forth thus far, it is safe to say that 100,000 of the colored people have learned to read and write, and many of them have added to this other branches of learning within the past five years.

SAMUEL H. JONES.

PENNSYLVANIA, 12th mo. 31st, 1869.

Now that among various denominations instrumental music is considered an essential accompaniment of public worship, I have reflected how foreign it is from the precepts and practice of our Saviour, and that the custom was ushered in with the deterioration of Christianity. At the present time I believe that its tendency is not found to promote spirituality. That still small voice uttered in the secret of the soul is easily checked by anything of a sensuous character. The Holy Redeemer of our fallen race declared that God is a Spirit, and that they who worship Him must do it in spirit and in truth. Is not the question a pertinent one: Are sweet sounds to gratify the Divine or the human ear? The melody made in the heart is that which is regarded by Him whom we adore.

PEACE PRINCIPLES AMONG THE LEARNED AND LEARNERS.

It is said that Napoleon's playthings, when he was a child, were little drums and guns. He had a small brass cannon mounted in the yard, the use of which, together with other similar articles and habits of childhood, must have had much influence in developing the dispositions in him that in after years resulted in the slaughter of nine or ten millions of his fellow creatures. Tennyson, the poet, says:

"I am a part of all I have met."

If the Swiss people are bold and rugged in character, like the mountains amid which they are reared—if the hordes of Northmen, that overran the Roman Empire, were savage as the monsters and heroes they had worshiped—if a butcher becomes brutal, (England once prohibited butchers from sitting on juries,) so that he is disqualified for judgment in criminal cases,—may we not well conclude that—not only in the case of Napoleon—the war-habits and dispositions of warriors are largely owing to the influences of early training? The histories, classics, and even school readers are full of eulogies upon the bloodiest men of the world. Why should we wonder then, if a man reaps what he sows, that our nation has expended eighty per cent. of its whole revenue in time of peace in military purposes? The nations of Christendom spent, in the year 1869, about three hundred times as much on their military systems, as they spent on benevolent and missionary objects. There are now more than five millions of men belonging to Europe's standing armies, and these men are suffering a bondage worse than the slave of South Carolina or Alabama ever knew.

But these are the natural fruits of the seed we sow and have sown. We might as well expect to gather corn from briars, as to expect nations to live peaceably while the child is rocked to sleep by the war-song; while the poet sings the warrior's fame, the orator extols his virtues, the historian records his glory, and the professed minister of the Prince of Peace, with a strange and subtle transformation of the Gospel, accords to him full salvation from the field of blood.

But it is not the intention to give here a treatise on this subject. The humble writer of this brief article has just visited and lectured on peace at Mt. Union College, Ohio. This college is beautifully situated, well organized, under the control of the Methodists, with religious teachers—patronized by Friends and others representing various denominations, and from sixteen different States of the Union. We were kindly received by Dr. Hartshorn, the president, and found it delightful to be in the presence of and converse with this man of learning and travel. We were informed by him that the college had turned out, in the past twenty years, about five thousand teachers. What a fountain for good or evil? There is no whiskey sold in Mt. Union, and the tone of instruction seemed moral. This is encouraging, and we conclude that the institution does as good work as any of its neighbors in Ohio, many of which I have visited. But here, as elsewhere, no definite knowledge is received by the students on the great theme of peace, or the terrible evils and folly of war, "which has absorbed half man's energies, and caused half his woes."

Can instruction on peace be given at such institutions as this? To answer this question I write this article. Truth readily commends itself to the thoughtful. So at this institution, where a lecture on peace had not before been heard by either students or professors, the truth met a warm reception. Nearly all of the twelve professors, and a large number of students, listened attentively for an hour and half to arguments upon the subject of peace; and many expressed themselves pleased even with the high grounds the speaker took in favor of the inviolability of life. The students expressed a desire to investigate the subject further, and were furnished with appropriate books and documents.

Although education will not convert or save the soul, yet there is latent in man a gentle feeling the reverse of barbarism, that may be developed into civilization. Reason may be so developed, and the feelings so cultivated, that the savage custom of adjusting difficulties by war will be counted among the barbarisms of the dark ages. Train our students in the doctrines of peace, and war will cease with the next generation. Shall they have the light? We have done much to abolish slavery—much to check the tide of intemperance; but what have we done to stop war, the worst system of bondage in the world, and the most fruitful source of intemperance?

Then if the learned and learners may be reached with the principles of peace, the sad history of the past, and fearful forebodings of the future, demand that this should be done.

CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE UPON THE INDIANS.

An Indian trader writing to a Baltimore merchant, (not a Friend,) gives the following testimony to the services of the devoted men, our agents, and to the success of the peace principles under which they act. K.

"The Arapahoe and Cheyenne Indians are drawing rations here. They number about 3,100. The Cheyennes are a fine-looking set of men, tall, strapping fellows. The squaws, with few exceptions, are ugly and squalid in appearance, and do all the drudgery of the camp, but are not quite as dirty as their neighbors, the Arapahoes.

The Indian agent is a Quaker, B. Darlington, of Iowa. He is a very fine man, and will do every thing on the square. He is doing wonders among the savages. A few days since, while on a hunt, the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Comanches, Osages and Kiowas met on friendly terms and shook hands, as an emblem of their sincerity as individuals and as tribes, all of which is accredited to the exertions and influence of their agent. He has called forth the utmost confidence from the most treacherous tribes. All on the plains feel the great benefit of the Friends' agencies, and great deeds are yet looked for.

RELIGIOUS REVOLUTION IN MADAGASCAR.

Burning of the Royal Idols.—Idolatry gives place to Christianity.

A remarkable religious revolution has taken place in Madagascar. We learn from a letter from Rev. W. Pool, dated from the capital on the 23d of September, and published in a weekly cotemporary, that the Queen has had the royal idols publicly burned, that she and her aristocracy have embraced Christianity, and that the whole province of Imerina, in which the capital is situated, has followed the example of the Government. The Queen embraced Christianity early in the year, and has all the summer been building a chapel royal. Meanwhile, the wooden fence around the Temple of the great national idol had been pulled down, and the priests assumed a threatening aspect, even hinting that their god had medicine which would avenge him on the heretic sovereign.

On the 8th of September they came in force to the capital to claim their rights as nobles. A council was called, and it was decided to send the Chief Secretary of State and other high officials to the sacred village, seven miles from the capital, and burn the idol before its keepers returned. They set off the same afternoon, and by an authority from the Prime Minister seized the idol's house. The wood of the fallen fence was collected, and a fire was made, and the contents of the temple were brought out to be burned. First, the long cane carried before the idol in processions was thrown in; then twelve bullocks' horns from which incense or holy water had been sprinkled; then three scarlet umbrellas and the silk robe worn over the idol by the keeper who carried it. Then came the idol's case—the trunk of a small tree hollowed and fitted with a cover; and last of all the idol itself. Hardly any of the present generation had seen the god, and great was the surprise when he was produced.

Two pieces of scarlet silk about three feet long and three inches wide, with a small piece of wood about as big as a man's thumb inserted in the middle between them, so that the silk formed as it were two wings, was the great god of Madagascar, whose touch was sanctifying, and whose nearness was preservative. "You cannot burn him, he is a god," said the people. "If he be a god he will not burn," said the officers; "we are going to try," and held it on a stick in the fire, that the people might see it as it was consumed. The victory was complete. Next day four other idols shared the same fate, and the rest followed. One was a little bag of sand; another consisted of three round pieces of wood united by a silver chain.

The people looked on in wonder, and when the process was over, seeing that they had now no gods to worship, they sent to the Queen to ask what they were to worship for the future. The Government, says the English Independent, adding to the information contained in Mr. Pool's letter, thereupon appealed to the native Christians to send Christian teachers, and they at once responded. It was found that of 280 towns and villages in Imerina, 120 already had Christian churches, and teachers were at once found for all the rest. This movement, which is remarkable for its purely native origin, is another proof that in certain stages of civilization, nations may be converted by authority. The conversion of Madagascar has been accomplished developed into civilization. Reason may be so developed, and the feelings so cultivated, that the savage custom of adjusting difficulties by war will be counted among the barbarisms of the dark ages. Train our students in the doctrines of peace, and war will cease with the next generation. Shall they have the light? We have done much to abolish slavery—much to check the tide of intemperance; but what have we done to stop war, the worst system of bondage in the world, and the most fruitful source of intemperance?

SATAN'S REVENUE.

The New York Star very properly designates the money squandered by moderate and irregular drinkers for intoxicating beverages as "the devil's revenue." And an immense revenue is derived from this source; enough to pay the ordinary expenses of all the governments on the face of the earth, with several millions to spare. Think of it, you who are daily wasting your substance in riotous living—you who are hastening your steps to the grave, destroying your prospects here and hereafter, and weighing down your families with poverty, wretchedness and shame—think of it, and pause while there is yet time. Add not another cent to the "devil's revenue"—withdraw your name from his tax list. Look at the yearly amount to which each of you contribute. Says the Star: "One billion four hundred and eighty-three million four hundred and ninety-one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five—that is it. The price of happiness, peace, hope, aspiration—in short the value of the American retail liquor sales in a single year. More than all the product of gold and silver from American territory for twenty years, and ten times the value of our whole church property. These are encouraging statistics, truly. Forty-three dollars for every man, woman and child in the country! Most of the money thus devoted to his Satanic majesty comes from the pockets of laboring men, who, getting one foot at a time into the whirlpool, go down inch by inch, with unconscious rapidity. It is a common mistake of laborers that liquor is necessary to sustain their strength under exhausting conditions. Careful examinations prove this a fatal fallacy. The effect, gratefully exhilarating on a small capital at first, wears off quickly, and the succeeding doses, to be felt, necessarily grow larger. But the superficial strength obtained in this way disappears all the more rapidly at last for its constant renewals. The drinker—moderate drinker, he may think himself—dies when he should be at the most powerful period of his existence—dies from fever, or consumption, or 'visitation of God'—but, whatever it is called, dies from something which has its root in this unhappy habit."

Every word of it true. Here is food for reflection—a short but excellent temperance lecture, which we trust may impress itself deeply in the minds of the thousands of otherwise good (and might be useful) men who are on the broad road to ruin, drinking themselves into dishonorable and untimely graves. —*Delaware Co. YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

WILLIE'S SIGNAL.

At twilight, in old Hospital St. Luke,
The smiling eyes that watched grew wet with crying,
And kind lips kissed away, with love's rebuke,
The cruel anguish of the sick and dying.

In the fourth ward, a boy with broken bones
Lay dreading what the morrow should betide him,
And sobbed and talked by turns, in faltering tones,
With little Susie in the cot beside him.

For he had borne the knife, that day, and strain
On his weak limbs of surgeon's cord and splinter,
Till he had fainted with the weight of pain—
Too great for one just through his seventh winter.

And, oh! to wait the rest!—'twas worse, he said,
To lie and tremble at the doctor's warning—
"I think 'twere better, Susie, to be dead,
Than bear the hurt that's coming in the morning.

"They say that every night the loving Lord
Comes here for some of us, in watch or slumber,
And I have prayed that when he walks our ward
To-night, He'll take me, too, among His number.

"I hope He'll know I want Him—and I've planned,
For fear I may be dreaming when He sees us,
Above the bed clothes—so—to prop my hand,
And hold it there to be my sign for Jesus."

At midnight, in old Hospital St. Luke,
While lamps burned low o'er lives yet lower burning,
And angel sleep, aloof at pain's rebuke,
Tempted pale eyelids, going and returning,

Who saw the Son of God, with countenance bland,
In pity sweet His glory all concealing,
Come at the beckoning of that lifted hand,
And smile his answer to its mute appealing?

The arm grew weak that held it—Faith's good will Stayed up the tiny sign of supplication
Full long, and when it quivered and grew still,
It pointed up from sorrow to salvation.

'Tis morn at last. The nurses come again,
And see that child-like token where it lingers, Erect and cold, above the counterpane,
With resignation in its helpless fingers.

From sight of fear and sound of parting hope,
And curses wrung from sufferers unforgiven,
The soul of wounded Willie had gone up,
Led by that little lifted hand to heaven!

Why wait for death, O spirit sick with sin?
Faith now-may imitate the child's behaviour,
And from the wounds of penitence within,
Stretch forth her signal to the healing Saviour.

COMMERCIAL INTERCHANGE.

"Give to the North the products of the Sun,
And blend the ungenial climates into one."

There arrived in Chicago the other day two tons of silk-worm eggs in transit from Yokohama, Japan, to Lyons, France, via steamer to San Francisco, rail to New York, and thence again by steamer to Havre. They reached Chicago in good condition. The eggs rest on small pieces of card-board, several millions being upon each. These pieces are laid upon shelves arranged in boxes. A special agent in charge of them kept a stove in the car to regulate the temperature, which had not varied five degrees since the shipment of the eggs from Japan. He was confident that he would be able to reach Lyons in safety with his charge. This is the third experiment made to ship silk-worm eggs from Japan to France, two others having failed. The first shipment was made via San Francisco and the Isthmus, and the second via the Suez Canal, both cargoes having perished when the voyages were half completed. If the present undertaking proves successful, a large business will be done, it is said, in this way, the silk producers of France being desirous of securing other species of worms for propagation and production. It is certainly a novel undertaking.—Press.

For Friends' Review.

[The enclosed lines were written by a young woman Friend in England in the summer of 1838, and I believe have never been published. I well remember enjoying that glorious sunset, as I was riding alone through the beautiful rural district of Hertfordshire, between Hertford and Hitchin. It was the subject of general remark that evening amongst loved ones, many of wham have since passed away to realize the fruition of their faith; but there are others in whom these lines will touch a chord of pleasant memory and prove a grateful souvenir of other days.—T.]

THE SUNSET LAND.

My Father, why is it I seem,
When the sun is slow sinking to rest,
To see by the light of his beam
A glorious land in the west?

I watched it to night, and descried
A city most fair to the sight,
In a vale with a mountainous side,
On the banks of a river of light.

There was nothing but light in the sky,
That gleamed upon turret and spire;
And the dark mountain hovering nigh
Showed more bright the celestial fire.

It was strange, passing strange, to behold;—
Now fading, now bright'ning its glow;—
When the hills, awhile burnished like gold,
Were changed to the whiteness of snow!

And whilst sinking the glorious sun,
Behind clouds of a silvery hue,
The towers grew faint, one by one,
And faded away from my view.

My Father, oh! tell me much more
Of this distant and glorious strand;—
I only can gaze on its shore,
And call it the sunsetting land!

It cannot indeed be the clime
Where the spirits of blessed ones go;
For none on that country sublime
May look while here walking below.

My son, thou hast fondly surveyed
A city thou callest most fair;—
A city by fancy portrayed,
And wrought from a phantom of air.

The clouds which the setting sun drew,
And the summer wind bore on its wing,
These gilded, appeared to thy view
That beautiful, glorious thing.

In thy journey through life thou wilt find
The things that look brightest below,
As fleeting as clouds on the wind,
And their gleam but a sunsetting glow!

And when to the west thou shalt gaze,
And the fanciful city is there,
Called up at His will, who doth raise
All the wonders of earth and of air,

Look by faith to that city above,
Wherein is no "need of the sun;"
Transcendent in brightness and love,
Which mercy for sinners hath won.

For the things that are seen are soon past;
They vanish away from our sight;
But those which we see not shall last
And endure in immutable light!

IMPORTANT MEETING.

The Baltimore Association of Friends, deeming it very desirable that their Schools in North Carolina should be continued, as well as their efforts to promote the Agricultural improvement of the neighborhoods where Friends reside, wish to present to Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, statements of the present situation and prospects of the work in North Carolina.

A Meeting will accordingly be held at Arch street Meeting-house on Fourth-day, the 2d of Second month, at 7½ o'clock, P. M., at which our Friends Francis T. King, Joseph Moore, and Allen Jay, the present Superintendent of the Schools, expect to be present.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

Foreign Intelligence.—Advices from Europe are to the 17th inst.

Great Britain.—It was announced on the 15th that a working arrangement had been agreed upon between the Anglo-American, the Atlantic, the New York, Newfoundland and London, and the French Telegraph Cable Companies. It has been settled between the Directors, but requires to be confirmed by the shareholders. The receipts of the cables will be placed in a joint fund, and divided in the proportion of 36⅔ to the French and 63⅓ to the other three companies. Should any of the cables or the land lines connected therewith, be at any time interrupted, messages will be sent by the route which is open, without regard to the company which may have accepted them.

A plan for an international workmen's exhibition, to be held in London next summer, was matured on the 10th at a meeting at which Gladstone presided.

John Bright made a speech to his constituents at Birmingham, on the 10th, in response to a vote of thanks to the Ministry for its general policy, especially in regard to the Irish Church. Catholic grievances, he said, were extinguished, and Irish grievances only were left. He asked Parliament now to do something for Irish non-Catholics and for land reform. Land in Ireland has few owners, while half the population are tenants at will. The industry, home and life of the tenant are at the mercy of the owner and his agents. Irish proprietorship is really confiscation, the result of conquest. To this wrong, penal laws have added greater ones. Parliament is now called on to give rights to tenants, yet save the property of owners.

The Ministers are preparing measures of reform, and serious popular consideration is invoked for them. Their plans of pacification may fail, but it is hoped not. They propose a new conquest of Ireland without shedding blood; the only weapon will be frank and generous justice, potent to reunite nations long separated by oppressive neglect.

France.—An order has been issued permitting the free return to France of Ledru Rollin and others in the same position. Some conspirators against the life of the Emperor, banished in 1864, are included in the general amnesty. Great excitement was caused in Paris by a tragical event on the 10th inst. Prince Pierre Bonaparte, a cousin of the Emperor, having been bitterly attacked in the Marsellaise, a new paper edited by Rochefort, addressed him a note apparently intended as a challenge. Two of the editorial staff of that journal visited the Prince on behalf of another who had written the obnoxious article, and who assumed the responsibility of it. An altercation ensued, during which the Prince twice fired a pistol at his visitors, killing one of them, Victor Noir. He afterwards surrendered himself to the authorities, and was imprisoned, and a decree was issued convoking the Chambers for the purpose of bringing action against him before the High Court of Justice, in which charges against members of the imperial family must be tried. Rochefort in the Chamber denounced the murder, and demanded that the murderer should not be allowed to escape punishment, and another member proposed that members of the imperial family be rendered amenable to the law. Ollivier, in reply, promised justice, but intimated that, if necessary, power would be exerted to prevent disorder. The office of the Marsellaise was subsequently seized by order of the government, and a demand was laid before the Chamber for the arraignment of Rochefort for outrages against the Emperor, and exciting to disorder and violence. On the 17th, this question was debated in the Legislative Body, and by a vote of 226 to 34 the demand was granted. Great crowds gathered in the neighborhood during the debate, and when the result was known, popular demonstrations were made in favor of Rochefort.

On the 14th, Ollivier, in a speech before the Council of State, urged that offences against the press laws should be submitted to juries, and the next day a project to that effect was introduced in the Legislative Body. It was said that judgments in matters of the press would be deferred until a vote was taken on the subject; but the government had announced the intention to prosecute for violation of those laws certain journals which had of late violently attacked it.

Italy.—More than 300 members of the Council refused to sign the petition in favor of a declaration of Papal infallibility, and many others returned evasive answers. The opposers of the project, it is said, intend preparing a counter petition.

Spain.—Castelar has introduced in the Cortes a proposition to exclude forever the Bourbon family, and all its branches, from the Spanish throne. The Duke of Montpensier has been nominated as a candidate for the Cortes from Oviedo.

Prussia.—The negotiations between the Prussian government and the Chinese embassy of Minister Burlingame were concluded on the 17th inst.

Africa.—A dispatch dated 2d of Tenth mo. last, from the U. S. Consul at Zanzibar, has been received by the State Department, saying that a letter had arrived there from Dr. Livingstone, bearing date 30th of Fifth mo., 1869. He had then reached Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika, where he had found supplies forwarded from Zanzibar. He was in good health and spirits, and announced his intention of travelling to the windward of Tanganyika until boatmen and further supplies, for which he sent, should arrive at Ujiji. In a previous letter, which has been published, he expressed his belief that the true sources of the Nile are in latitude 10° to 12° S. in the region which he had been traversing, and his desire to connect the explorations which he had made with those of the discoverers of Lakes Victoria Nyanza and Albert Nyanza.

Domestic.—The Legislature of Minnesota has ratified the 15th Constitutional amendment, and the Senate of Ohio has done likewise. The House of Representatives in that State has not yet definitely acted. The Mississippi Legislature has ratified both the 14th and 15th amendments.

Gen. Reynolds, commanding in Texas, has informed Gen. Sherman that he has issued a proclamation declaring the State Constitution adopted, and naming the members of Congress and of the Legislature elected; that he has organized a Provisional Government with the candidates elected, Davis and Flennagan, as Governor and Lieut. Governor, and will at once convene the Legislature by proclamation. Gen. Sherman has approved his action.

The railroad connecting Salt Lake City with the Pacific Railroad was completed on the 9th inst.

A violent tornado occurred at Cave City Station, on the railroad south of Louisville, Ky., on the morning of the 17th, by which many buildings were destroyed, eight or ten persons killed, and several injured. A number of families were made homeless. At Louisville, hailstones of the size of walnuts fell. On the same day, heavy rain, accompanied generally by lightning and in Cincinnati by hail, visited central and southern Ohio, extending as far east as Pittsburg, Pa., and causing an unusual and rapid rising of the rivers, by which much damage was done. A similar visitation, the previous evening, was reported from St. Louis and Chicago. At many points, a great and sudden change of temperature followed the storm. At Chicago, the thermometer stood at 42° on the evening of the 16th, and the next day was at zero.

Congress.—This body reassembled on the 10th inst. In both Houses the admission of Virginia was taken up. The Senate discussed its bill at every session during the week, and on the 17th laid it on the table and took up that of the House, the discussion on which was continued on that and the next day, without disposing of it. In the House, the Reconstruction Committee reported a bill restoring Virginia to representation in Congress, on the fundamental conditions that no person shall hold office in the State unless he can take the test oath or has been relieved by Congress of disability, and that the constitution shall never be so changed as to abridge the rights guaranteed by the existing one. This was considered on successive days until the 14th, when, by yeas 98, nays 95, a substitute was adopted, in the form of a joint resolution, declaring that the people of Virginia having adopted a Constitution, republican in form, and having conformed in all respects to the act of Congress authorizing the submission of the Constitution to the people, the State is entitled to representation in Congress. This was finally passed by a vote of 142 to 49. The Senate Finance Committee reported a bill as a substitute for all the various propositions relative to the national currency, which had been referred to it, but no action was taken. A bill passed the Senate prohibiting retired army officers from being assigned to duty which would entitle them to full pay. A number of bills were introduced in both Houses.

The Ministers are preparing measures of reform, and serious popular opposition is involved for them. Their plans of pacification may fail, but it is hoped not. They propose a new conquest of Ireland without shedding blood; the only weapon will be GOLD and generous justice, potent in reuniting nations long separated by oppressive conduct.

PARIS.—An order has been issued permitting the free return to France of Ledru Rollin and others in the same position. Some conspirators against the life of the Emperor, banished in 1864, are included in the general amnesty. Great excitement was caused in Paris by a typical event on the 10th inst. He afterwards surrendered himself to the authorities, and was imprisoned, and a decree was issued prohibiting the Chamber in the purpose of bringing action against him before the High Court of Justice, on the charge against him of murder. Public excitement ran high at this decision, and demonstrations were made in front of the Prince's residence, and in other parts of the city. The funeral of Victor Noir took place on the 12th inst., and was attended by an immense concourse of people, estimated at from 100,000 to 500,000 persons. The procession was headed by the widow of the deceased, and the body was followed to the grave by the Deputies of the Left, and by a large number of the Republican leaders. All the shops were closed, and the streets were filled with people. The funeral passed off without disturbance, and the excitement has subsided.

SPAIN.—The Cortes has been engaged in discussing the Constitution, and the Ministry have been sustained by large majorities. The Republican party is divided, and the Carlists are gaining strength. The Government is preparing to meet the latter with vigorous measures.

PORTUGAL.—The Cortes has been dissolved, and the Ministry have resigned. The new Ministry is composed of Liberals, and the elections will be conducted by them.

ITALY.—The Pope has issued a bull excommunicating the Italian Government, and all who have taken part in the seizure of the Papal territory. The Italian Government has issued a circular to the Bishops, forbidding the publication of the bull, and declaring that any violation of the law will be punished by fine and imprisonment. The Bishops have been summoned to appear before the Courts, and the Government is prepared to enforce its decrees. The Pope has also issued a bull excommunicating the Italian Government, and all who have taken part in the seizure of the Papal territory. The Italian Government has issued a circular to the Bishops, forbidding the publication of the bull, and declaring that any violation of the law will be punished by fine and imprisonment. The Bishops have been summoned to appear before the Courts, and the Government is prepared to enforce its decrees.

GREECE.—The Legislature of Minnesota has ratified the 15th Constitutional amendment, and the Senate of Ohio has done likewise. The House of Representatives in [illegible] has not yet acted. The Mississippi Legislature has rejected both the 14th and 15th amendments.

GEN. RAYMOND, commanding in TEXAS, has issued an order declaring that on the issuing a proclamation declaring the State Constitution adopted, and naming the members of Congress and of the Legislature elected; that he has organized a Provisional Government with the candidates elected, and will at once convene the Legislature by proclamation. This was suspended on the 18th, by yeas 98, nays 37, a substitute was adopted, in the form of a joint resolution, declaring that the people of VIRGINIA having adopted a Constitution, republican in form, and having conformed in all respects to the act of Congress authorizing the submission of the Constitution to the people, the State is entitled to representation in Congress. This was finally passed by a vote of 143 to 42. The Senate Finance Committee reported a bill as a substitute for all the various propositions relative to the national currency, which had been referred to it, but no action was taken. A bill passed the Senate prohibiting United States officers from being assessed to any political purpose, and from being required to duty where they [illegible] to hold [illegible]. A number of bills were introduced in both Houses.

LUCY FOWLER.

Died at Cannes, First mo. 20th, 1869, Lucy Fowler, of Tottenham, a minister, widow of Thomas Fowler, aged 66 years.

She was born in 1803, and was the daughter of Nicholas and Anna Waterhouse. Her parents were much esteemed members of Liverpool Meeting, and were concerned to bring up their large family in the fear of the Lord: and her father in particular set a bright example, by maintaining a high standard of Christian uprightness in the midst of extensive business engagements. In 1826 she was married to the late Thomas Fowler, of Tottenham, with whom she cordially united in his benevolent efforts to alleviate distress: he being eminently distinguished for his readiness to counsel and assist any who were in trouble, and particularly exerting himself with others during the distress in Lancashire in 1842, and in Ireland during the potato famine of 1846–7.

After a union of twenty-five years, Lucy Fowler was left a widow in 1851, and ten years later was recorded as a Minister, by Friends of Tottenham. Though not engaged to travel from home in that capacity, she was diligent, wherever her lot was cast, to proclaim the Gospel message freely and fully. In this work of faith, and of love to Christ and His cause upon earth, it is believed she was concerned in a large measure "not to reason, but believe;" and to wait on the Lord, for the secret intimations of His will, in simplicity and a spirit of ready obedience. Of her peculiar and very humbling line of service under such impressions of duty, striking instances are known. The remembrance of this confirms in the minds of some of her friends, and those who knew her best, the humble belief that, through the grace of God, she is now one of that blessed company, who have forever joined the army of the Lamb, and of whom it is said, "they that were with Him were called, and chosen, and faithful."

To quote from a minute of Tottenham Monthly Meeting, respecting her public ministry, "her communications were generally brief, but clear; giving no uncertain sound in the doctrine of redemption by the Saviour of sinners, and enforcing His own teaching, 'Ye must be born again;' as well as setting forth the work of the Spirit in the heart, and the fruits thereof. Her invitations to 'behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world,' are fresh in remembrance. She was also frequently and weightily engaged in prayer and supplication with thanksgiving." Lucy Fowler was warmly attached to the principles professed by the Society of Friends; but much enjoyed assembling under her hospitable roof Christians of different denominations, to hear from them, often from a returned missionary, what the Lord was doing in distant parts of the world.

The state of her health induced her to undertake frequent journeys on the Continent. On these occasions, she endeavored to influence for good those with whom she was brought in contact, while she always sought out those who were laboring in her Master's cause. In the Eighth month of 1868, she left England to winter on the shores of the Mediterranean, and in the course of this journey, a visit to Milan was a subject of weighty concern to her mind. Having, in her wide sympathy with all the followers of Christ, visited Pastor Turin of the Waldensian church, and manifested no small interest in the Evangelizing of Italy, —she was solicited to meet the people of his congregation in the evening, at their usual week-day meeting. This she declined, but afterwards sent a donation in aid of their schools. Her refusal to meet the company, however, gave her much uneasiness; and in a few weeks, when the weather had become somewhat inclement, she returned to Milan, as is related by herself in the following letter:—

Hotel Beau Séjour, Cannes, 15th of Twelfth month, 1868.

"My beloved Sister,—I wrote to thee from Nice, that I thought I should have to go back to Milan, but I seemed almost too poorly to do it, and I thought I might venture to go on to Cannes. When I was at Milan, I had some interesting intercourse with Pastor Turin and his wife, of the Vaudois church, and they earnestly invited me to go to their meeting. Not having thought of it, and believing I should be expected to address the meeting, and that I might not have much to say, I shrunk from it, and declined; and went on my journey. But God greatly troubled me. He opened the door, and I refused to enter in. 'Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee, that it may be displayed because of the Truth.' It matters not whether it be much or little that a man hath: God wills that he be found faithful. Distress came upon me, which greatly troubled me: I could not say what it was. I believe I may humbly say the truth in the Psalmist's words: 'I have set the Lord always before me: because He is at my right hand, I shall not be moved.' But God did not make me stand in the battle. I fled before my soul's enemies. I felt as though I should be slain,—when in condescending mercy the veil was again lifted, and I looked towards Milan. I could no longer doubt: to do so, I felt would be tempting God.

"My doctor first tried to persuade me from going; but finding I was decided, he did all he could to help me, and found me a courier, for I had discharged the one I had before, who would not have answered on this occasion. . . . I left this place on the 30th of last month for Nice, not knowing but I might cross that night to Genoa; but the doctor discouraged my doing so, as I was only just recovering from a somewhat severe cold. So I went on board the next morning in an open boat. We were landed at Genoa in the same way after dark, making our way among the small boats and ships in the harbor. On the previous day, when I parted from my doctor at Nice, I felt that God has His people everywhere: it was touching to me to hear him ask God's blessing upon me and the undertaking.

"We lodged at Genoa. The country from thence to Milan was mostly covered with snow. At Milan it was extremely cold: colder to the feelings than in England, for they only have wood fires. When arrived, I sent my card on to Pastor Turin. I explained why I had returned. He seemed struck, and was very kind. I found the usual meeting was the next evening. I asked if they would have their ordinary service, and if I felt it best, I could express what I had to say afterwards. It was a great conflict to me; but I was not permitted to have one misgiving thought, or doubting feeling. Roto, the courier, who is a Roman Catholic and an Italian, asked if he might go to the meeting. He came afterwards, and thanked me most gratefully for speaking to his country people. He was very glad to join in our reading and family worship. I stayed two days in Milan; and spent part of the last evening pleasantly, and I trust profitably, with the Turins.

"I returned with the deepest feeling of thankfulness to my Heavenly Father, that He had not permitted me to remain in rebellion and hardness of heart: not that I thought I had done any great thing; but simply I had offered the sacrifice of obedience, accepted for Jesus' sake, our dear Redeemer. How prone we are to want a clearer evidence! something more than the still, small voice of God's Spirit in the secret of the soul:—forgetting that the walk is by faith, not by sight, that it is by little and little the soul gains light and strength. 'Walk in the light, while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you,' are solemn words.

"We retraced our steps to Genoa on Seventh-day: but had to wait one or two days, going by night to and fro, as before, in open boats to the vessel,—arriving at Nice at five, and at Cannes at eight o'clock, A. M. . . . . The courier was most attentive. . . . Amongst comparative strangers, I am bound to acknowledge I never was so tenderly, so assiduously, and so earnestly cared for. Dear sister, did not the Lord provide? If the query were put, 'lacked thou anything?' I could indeed say, 'nothing, Lord: Thou hast done exceeding abundantly for Thy poor worm of a servant, above all I could ask or think.' Blessed forever be the name of our God!" . .

The congregation at Milan were much struck with this instance of obedience to the Spirit's guidance. "She told us," observes the Pastor, in a letter relating the circumstances, "that God speaks in two ways to His children:—by the written word, and by His Spirit. She earnestly exhorted believers to follow implicitly the inward directions of the Spirit, and to watch carefully that they might never stifle His voice. We were deeply moved. The idea that an elderly lady had not hesitated to come hundreds of miles in such cold weather, to discharge a duty which others would have thought of little importance, . . . greatly impressed us, and held us for a short time in solemn silence. . . My congregation and we all, on hearing afterwards of Mrs. Fowler's death, felt that God had spoken to us that evening, by the voice of one who was on the borders of the grave; and whose words, evidently so Scriptural, deserve our special attention."

Nor should we omit, in this sketch, to notice another earnest pleading made by Lucy Fowler,—also as from the verge of eternity,—with her professing Christian sisters of every name, to resist the tyranny and extravagance of fashion in the article of dress. "I feel it in my heart," she says, "to entreat every Christian woman, to manifest by her example moderation in this respect, and thus seek to stem this wave of a great flood of evil, that covers our land." Treating the subject as a violation of correct feeling and of good taste, as well as in its religious aspect, "This prevailing folly," she says, "is not only, I believe, an awful sin, directly contrary to the spirit and precepts of the gospel, but it brings our womanhood into great contempt. . . . . It would seem as if many were not contented to wear Satan's chains within, but that these chains must be hung outside, that the wearers might be known to be his captives." Quoting several passages from the New Testament, she adds, "From these texts we learn that this practice of self-gratification is contrary to God's revealed will. . . . Surely a solemn responsibility rests on professing Christian women, to avoid in this thing the sin of disobedience." She urges her entreaties as "a service for God;"—"neither in self-restriction on the one hand, nor in self-indulgence on the other, but in the liberty which Christ gives;"—"and for the sake of that meek and lowly Saviour, in whose footsteps we are invited to walk, and whose yoke we are called upon to bear,—whom to know is life eternal."

Though Lucy Fowler's health appeared to be somewhat recruited by her sojourn in a more southern climate, her removal was very sudden. On the 20th of First month, she enjoyed the spectacle of a beautiful sunset; and after tea, read the Bible with two of her little grand-daughters. It was seldom, if ever, that her family reading closed without her engaging in solemn prayer: and on this occasion her prayer struck those present as particularly sweet. She retired as usual, but soon called her attendant, and shortly after midnight, the attack of illness being only of about an hour's continuance, she calmly expired.

MADAGASCAR.

Letter from Louis Street.

Antananarivo, 10th mo. 17th, 1869.

My dear friend Joseph Dickenson:—Very often during the past month have our thoughts wandered far away over the vast expanse of sea and land which lies between us and our dear friends at Richmond, for we have not been unmindful of the time of Friends' annual assembly there, when so many whom we have long loved and honored come together, whose deliberations ever have for us a special interest. Two months or more ago, the doctor's report concerning the state of my dear wife's health was so unfavorable as to induce us to believe that we should very soon be obliged to leave the scene of our labors in this country and return to civilized society and the companionship of our friends. Although we cannot at this time report a complete recovery, (as her cough still lingers,) yet our apprehensions concerning her are not of so serious character as two months ago, and we have quite banished all thoughts of leaving here at present. The quite unlooked-for statement made by our physician at that time, very naturally brought into solemn review the entire subject of our mission to Madagascar, and the responsibilities resting upon us in regard to it. We had the strong conviction when we left our native land, that the Lord himself was calling us, who was then our strength and stay, and from that time to this we have never had any doubts about the rightfulness of our coming hither. Hence we were able to commit the prospect of our leaving into His hands also, although it seemed at the time in no small degree mysterious.

Since I last wrote to America there has been, by order of the government, a general burning of idols and charms throughout this part of the country, comprising many thousands. In the midst of a beautiful grove on the crest of a long oval mountain, about five or six miles east of Antananarivo, is a populous town esteemed sacred by the idolators, which has long been the home of the great national idol called "Kely Malaza." The idol itself was a small stick of wood four inches long, fastened transversely in the middle of a strip of red silk three feet long and three inches wide, with a small silver chain sewed on each end. This paltry thing has been the time-honored trust of thousands of the Malagasy, and at one time its keepers received half the revenues of the country arising from custom dues. Recently its keepers visited the Queen in a body, to lay before her their cause. They assured her that their idols were the lords of the land, and were above all human power and influence. As their keepers, they demanded special favors from the government, and a restoration of the privileges which they have hitherto enjoyed. The queen replied that they must remain in waiting a little while, and she would give them her final decision. In the meantime, she hastily despatched a body of several hundred armed men on horseback to burn "Kely Malaza" with all his appurtenances. The keepers, who were in waiting for the Queen's answer, heard what was in contemplation, and made a hasty retreat to save their treasures. But the queen's messengers were too quick for them, and the whole were consigned to the flames without the loss of a single life; no one daring to resist. If the keepers had gained the town first, the probability is that the idol could not have been destroyed without fighting and bloodshed. This act was followed by a stringent order of the government for a general burning of all idols and charms of every kind. Without some knowledge of the peculiar state of the country, this demand on the part of the government may appear to be of questionable expediency. But when it is remembered what deceit and fraud these idol keepers were practising upon the superstitious fears of the people, to extort contributions of money to protect them and their families from disease, as well as charms to secure their houses from lightning and their rice fields from hail, the peremptory demands of the government seem to be more plausible. Although this has been in no sense brought about through the direct instigation of the missionaries, it is unquestionably the indirect result of the influence of the little band of Christian men who have brought the Gospel to this country, and, as the former trust of the people has been so thoroughly destroyed, an increased responsibility rests upon them to substitute the truth in its place.

The distant outlying districts, some of which are very populous, are the greatest sufferers, from whom have come over two hundred applications from as many different towns for teachers to come and tell them what Christianity is. They say they have destroyed their idols, and ask the government to tell them in what they are now to trust. In most of these places there is probably not a single individual who has any idea what Christianity is; while in a great many others, which are not included in this list of applicants, the people are but little better off, who meet together on the first day of the week in large congregations, to sing and pray, not one of whom is able to preach, nor is any one of them able to read to them from the Bible. In company with one of the missionaries, I have, during the past month, visited many places along the western boundary of the Hova territory, and seen some of this destitution, though these are by no means the least favored districts, lying not far away from Antananarivo.

The visit has been one of unusual interest to me, since it was to a part of the country but little known, and, excepting a few of the nearest places, appears never before to have been visited by any foreigner. Some of the farthest towns we reached are supposed to be about 80 miles nearly directly west of Antananarivo. Our first day's journey was a long and fatiguing one, from early in the morning till late in the afternoon, only halting at a small village during the middle of the day long enough for our palanquin bearers to eat their rice.

On arriving at our destination in the evening, we found the inhabitants of the surrounding district at a great idol burning. Our sudden arrival in the midst of the operations was as unexpected to the people, as it was to us to find them thus engaged. The crowd was around the four sides of a hollow square, with the idols blazing in the midst, most of which were of the most paltry character, such as small sticks of wood tied together by a cord, crocodiles' teeth, little bags of earth or dust, small stones, strings of beads, etc., etc., all of which were supposed to be possessed of supernatural power.

We listened quietly to the speech from the messengers of the government, and then to an old man who made the customary reply on behalf of his tribe, in true native style. He danced like a madman from one side of this hollow square to another, while he flourished a great cane over his head which he grasped in the middle, and the greater the warmth of feeling as he advanced with his speech, the faster he made his feet fly. He declared the idols to be utterly unworthy of trust—that the true God was the God of the Bible; and exhorted the people to look to Him for protection and blessing. Then pointing to us, he declared we were the friends and people of the Queen, and had come to visit them to give them the Holy Spirit:—that seeing us was like seeing the Prime Minister himself, etc., etc. When he was through, they asked us to address them, and although we urged the lateness of the hour and our own fatigue as well as theirs, they insisted on hearing something then and there. I first spoke on the nature and attributes of the true God, and the evidences we have of His love and mercy, and of our duty towards Him—of the ignorance and blindness of the nations who have not the Holy Scriptures to enlighten them, alluding also to the various forms of idolatry among different nations, including their own—of the nature of Christianity and the change it works in the hearts of all true believers, prompting them to acts of love and benevolence, etc.—dwelling particularly upon the history of the early missionaries of this country by way of illustration, and of the sacrifices they endured to give this nation a knowledge of the Gospel. My companion followed, who called their attention to the fact that we were all sinners and had need of a Saviour, speaking of the love of God in sending His Son into the world to die for us, and urging on them to embrace these offers of mercy which we have before us in the Gospel, that they might obtain forgiveness for their sins and inherit everlasting life in the world to come. As our meeting was prolonged till late in the evening, the clear, bright moon shining above us lighted up a scene of touching interest not soon to be forgotten. The next morning we held a large meeting in a building which they use temporarily for a chapel, when my companion addressed them on the subject of church organization and fellowship, and I expounded, verse by verse, part of the sixth chapter of Luke, beginning with —"Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you," etc.

We then set out on a long ride directly westward, to a town which we reached late in the afternoon. Here we held another meeting, with nothing of very special interest to remark, and after a refreshing night's rest, set out the next morning in a direction a little south of west, arriving about noon at a large town, which had more marks of thrift and prosperity than are seen in many of the Malagasy villages. The streets and yards were swept very clean, and everything seemed so exceptionally tidy as to make the place quite attractive. A company of Christians, clothed in their spotlessly white "lambas," came to the gates of the town to meet us, who conducted us to a comfortable house, the floors of which, as well as the ceilings and walls, were all lined with fine native matting, which was of a light straw color, and skilfully woven to fit the room.

At this place my companion left me to hold a meeting with the people, while he went forward to a place of very different character at some little distance over the mountains. I had much pleasant intercourse with the Christians here, both in public and private, and early the next morning set out to join my friend. On arriving near the place where he had lodged, the town seemed swarming with little children, and the place bore abundant evidence of indescribable heathen darkness.

Great crowds assembled around us, all anxious to get a look, as we were the first white men they had ever seen. They expressed a great desire to learn to read the Bible, and we have taken measures to have a teacher go from the place where I had slept to instruct them. One little boy among the crowd of children could read well, who had been elsewhere taught, and whom we rewarded with some of the illustrated Malagasy hymns brought out by Helen Gilpin, as well as some "Teny Soas."

We then proceeded forward to a village where the people were mostly slaves, held in bondage by some great man at Antananarivo, among whom we had a large and interesting meeting.

Our route throughout the day lay through a very mountainous country, the valley being narrow, and precipices very steep, along the sides of which were our narrow footpaths. In the afternoon we passed near a large market, which, according to the custom of this country, is held weekly in the open air, and generally on an open plain, where buyers and sellers meet by thousands to exchange their various commodities. On drawing near the place, there seemed a great commotion in the crowd, and it was pretty soon manifest that we were the cause of it, when the great concourse of buyers and sellers rushed pell mell towards us by thousands, each eager to look at the white men. Our palanquin bearers, knowing how uncomfortably close such companies sometimes collect around us, did their best to avoid them, and scampered away to the brow of a mountain hard by, on descending which a little way we found a path running its entire length. Our pursuers arranged themselves in a row along the top, whence they could see us very well at a respectful distance, and gave a prolonged shout as they were obliged to relinquish the chase. In the evening we arrived at a town on the top of a very high mountain, from which we had a magnificent view of the surrounding country. Here the people seemed of a better class of natives, having much around them which told of thrift, and were very desirous to learn about the Bible, though as yet they are surprisingly ignorant of the truths it contains. They have a school taught by a boy of about twelve years of age, from near Antananarivo, who also reads to them from the Bible on the First-day, and has made some attempts at preaching. On account of his superior knowledge, he was treated with great respect, and it was most curious to see such a child the ruling spirit of a large congregation. In the evening we held a crowded meeting in their chapel, and another the following morning, after which we again set out on our journey, accompanied by the boy-preacher, who proposed to cross lake Itasy with us, near the shores of which is this village. The lake is a beautiful sheet of water nearly as broad as long, and we thought it to be about fifteen miles across. Not far from the centre is a little island on which is a small village. The wild rocks and beautiful foliage as seen in the distance, drew us to the spot, where we ate our dinners under the shade of a large rock.

Water-fowls, in great variety and seemingly countless numbers, were peacefully swimming on the placid waters of the lake, quite undisturbed by the approach of our little canoes until we came close upon them. In the afternoon we regained the opposite shore, where we found many Christians assembled to welcome us. They conducted us a little way to what no doubt seemed to them a very comfortable house, as it was the best their village afforded; but so many fowls and pigs had to be turned out before we could get in, that we told them we preferred to sleep in their chapel, where we made ourselves very comfortable.

The next day being First-day, a large company came together, many more than their chapel could contain, when my companion preached from the text—"I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth," &c. The subject of my own discourse was the love of God, preaching from 1 John iv. 10: "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." We found the professing Christians in this village very destitute, no one being able to read intelligently, and the congregation is entirely dependent on passing native strangers to preach to them. When none of these happen to pass that way, they are able only to sing a few hymns and pray.

Soon after the meeting we continued our journey further westward, among lofty mountains, amid evident traces of extinct volcanic action. Black scoria and pumice were very abundant, and in some places in such quantities as quite to blacken the whole aspect of the country. It was barren in the extreme, and the fierce rays of a tropical sun, while passing through such a desert, made our ride a very exhausting one. On arriving at our halting place, we found a populous town, and a large congregation of people already assembled in the chapel. But they were a most ignorant and heathenish-looking company, though very eager to hear what we had to say. I first addressed them on the subject of Christianity in general, contrasting it with heathenism,—of the inability of man to grasp eternal things without a written revelation from God,—of the love and goodness of our Heavenly Father in furnishing us with the Holy Scriptures to be our guide in life, and which also set before us a glorious hope in death,—of our consciousness of being sinners before God, and need of a Saviour.

My companion followed, preaching at considerable length from the text, "At the name of Jesus every knee shall bow," etc. We found in this place only one man who seemed a decided Christian, though a large congregation meet weekly to sing hymns, and hear this man read to them from the Holy Scriptures. The following day we passed through what was once a populous and flourishing district, but is now a vast unpeopled waste. After the revolution in 1861, when the late Queen Rasoherina succeeded her guilty husband to the throne of Madagascar, the populace were very slow to believe that Radama had been secretly put to death, and as a consequence were unwilling to acknowledge their allegiance to the new Sovereign.

Many rumors were afloat that he was still alive, which seemed mainly to come from this district, and which produced a very unsettling effect throughout the country. This induced the Malagasy Government to send a detachment from the army to chastise the inhabitants, which deliberately put to death all the men in the district above twelve or fourteen years of age, except such as took timely warning and fled into the Sakalava territory for protection. Since then the women and children have been scattered from different causes, and their once happy homes are now only heaps of crumbling ruins. We had often heard, at the Capital, accounts of this uncalled-for destruction of human life, but had no idea of its extent till we saw for ourselves this fearful waste. Towards evening we arrived at a little town where the inhabitants have commenced to build a chapel, though they seemed very dark and ignorant. Here we held a meeting in the open air under a large tree. The people seemed so ignorant, that we doubted whether they comprehended much of what was said to them, but on being questioned, they assured us they did; and in order to allay our suspicions, one man repeated over the substance of our communications, showing that he at least not only had understood, but had paid very strict attention. Only one man in this town is able to read. At the base of the mountain on which it stands, flows a beautiful stream of water, which drains Lake Itasy, and here forms one of the finest perpendicular waterfalls I have seen in this country. The height of the falls appeared to be from 80 to 100 feet, and the breadth of the stream about 100 feet. Even at this dry season of the year, when there is comparatively little water in the river, the effect is very fine, which must be greatly enhanced when the stream is swollen by the floods during the rainy season. Several of the succeeding days were spent in visiting various large towns, which until recently have been wholly given up to idolatry. We met with but comparatively few people who could read, but had everywhere crowded congregations of eager listeners. Yet wherever we did find persons able to read, they came to us begging for the Holy Scriptures, and it was often very painful to be obliged to assure them that the strong probability is that they will have to wait still another year before they can get the New Testament. Many thousands of people are now learning to read, and the loss to the Malagasy, during this time of general awakening, for the want of New Testaments, is very great. If we had some copies of the Gospels bound together without the Epistles, in a very cheap way, or even separately, which would be better still, to circulate in these very dark districts, they would be a great blessing to the people. The ignorant Malagasy are so apt to commence troubling their heads with difficult passages in Revelations or Romans, as soon as they are able to read the New Testament, that a decided advantage would be gained by putting the Gospels first into their hands, in addition to the pecuniary matter connected with such a circulation.

After having visited thus from village to village, directly west and south-west of Antananarivo, still keeping near the western boundary of the Hovas, we went 30 or 40 miles directly north to a very interesting town and country, where we found a large population governed by a princess, who is a near relative of the queen. When we arrived, she was away down in the valley giving a feast to some of the Sakalava tribe, who were on their way to Antananarivo, to acknowledge their allegiance to the Government. On hearing of our arrival, she hastened back, and received us with the greatest hospitality. She is an exceedingly interesting character, being tall in person, commanding in presence, and very graceful in her movements. She was clothed in a lamba of fine white cambric, and moved about with a dignity becoming her high station in life. On account of the great respect which the Sakalava tribe have for her, she has often been called upon to act as mediator between that nation and the Hovas. Christianity was first introduced here a little more than a year ago, through her influence mainly, and they have now a large congregation of Christians, many of whom are able to read, and others are learning. None of them had the Holy Scriptures, and they were all begging of us the New Testament. The only Bible in the place is one of the version made in England during the persecution, and which was presented gratuitously by the London Missionary Society, which thus furnished one copy of this version to each congregation.

After our visit to this district, we set out for Antananarivo, which was full two days' journey or more distant; and as it was Seventh-day, we did not know exactly where we should spend the morrow, having only heard that there were Christians near the terminus of our day's ride. Towards evening, we made many inquiries for a place of worship, and about 5 o'clock in the afternoon came upon a town where the people had not as yet been in the habit of meeting, but were busily engaged in finishing off a new meeting-house, which they intended to have opened for the first time the following day. Word had gone out near and far for the people to come together, and they were very glad of our arrival, as they had no preacher, except a native from Antananarivo, who happened, like ourselves, accidentally to be passing that way. Our palanquin-bearers also engaged to help them out with their singing, and taught them some simple tunes. On the following morning so many came together, that the new meeting-house would not contain the congregation, and as there were many more outside the house than within, they concluded that it was best for all to go out and hold the meeting in the open air. We had a vast concourse of very crude material before us, many in the company having never before heard the Gospel. My companion preached from the parable of the Supper, and I from the words of the Saviour: "This is life eternal, that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent."

Some of the Sakalava tribe chanced to be there, on their way to Antananarivo, who said they could understand us very well. They inclined to be friendly, and had many questions to ask, and still more to answer, for they were the first persons whom we had met from their part of the island. After our meeting, one of them, who had been at our lodgings the previous evening, came back to have further conversation. He told us the Sakalavas are a nation ever fleeing from death, of which they have the greatest horror. When a person dies in one of their villages, all the inhabitants immediately flee from it and make a new one, which is in turn forsaken when a death occurs. Thus they are a wandering and restless nation, who can have no permanent dwelling place. To this I replied by reading and explaining Heb. ii. 14, 15: "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also, himself, likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil: and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage." We told him we had heard the Sakalavas were a very treacherous nation, who would certainly rob and kill us if we went among them. But he said it was the cruelty of the Hovas that had made them a nation of robbers and murderers, but they would be friendly with us. He said that he would like to be a Christian, and thought the people where he lived were quite open to receive the Gospel; urging us to go and see for ourselves, assuring us that there was no danger to be apprehended, and that we should find a very healthy and populous country.

I have thus written a long letter, and what can I say more but ask a continued interest in the prayers of all our dear friends to Him from whom the "increase" comes. For the Divine blessing is everything in such work as ours,—without it all our most labored efforts are as so much loss, but with it our feeblest efforts are a grand success. In this thought is there not encouragement both for you and for us? That God is just as able to bless the weak things, as he is the strong. For there is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few.

With love, thy friend, very truly,

FRIENDS' REVIEW.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 29, 1870.

The presence in this city of the Associated Executive Committee on Indian Affairs has been attended with a quickened circulation of the love of the brethren. The presence of these dear Friends has been most acceptable and cheering. The attendance comprised all the members except four.

Whilst the active working devolves upon those who, as committees, agents, &c., have been detailed for this service, a large sympathy should be extended by all. It is one of those fields of Christian mission-work in which the Lord of the harvest calls for laborers. May each know and faithfully perform his individual duty, whether that be personal labor, bestowment of money, or prayer, as qualification is sought and received, for the strengthening of our committees and agents, and for the well-being of those races who are dwindling under the effects of accumulated wrongs, whom we are bound to regard as brethren, to whom, for the sake of our common Redeemer, we owe a debt of cherishing love.

The conference of the committee on this occasion has been important and satisfactory, but we are not prepared to insert a competent report of the proceedings in this number. Our valued Friend, the general superintendent, was present, with full information respecting his responsible charge.

SPECIAL PUBLIC MEETINGS AT THE TIME OF QUARTERLY MEETINGS.—Under this caption the British Friend records the decision of the Quarterly Meeting recently held at Gloucester, to hold, in connection with its stated sessions, special meetings for Divine worship, to which the public should be invited. This is the practice in various parts of America, and was formerly, we suppose, universal. The assemblage of Friends from a considerable district of country four times in the year, to transact what might be called the secular business of the Church, and to investigate the condition of the congregations represented, is proper and comely. The devotional pause before entering upon business is generally, may we not trust always, a season of edification, in which the Saviour's presence and the comfort of the Holy Ghost are known. The coming together, for a religious purpose, of so many persons, devolves a serious responsibility upon them that are spiritual, who ought certainly to wait upon their gifts and be attentive to Divine openings, with a deep and weighty concern that the association, social and religious, might be ordered aright, to the benefit of souls and to the glory of God, so that in the retrospect it might be said with comfort: "The Lord hearkened and heard it." We have sometimes thought that if those to whom a dispensation of the gospel has been committed, were duly careful to "abide under the shadow of the Almighty," it would more frequently occur that meetings for public worship would be appointed, and souls would be edified and accessions made to the company of believers. The kindly intercourse of Friends who meet at these stated gatherings, is in itself good and to be cherished: but the Church does not call her children together from distant localities for the purpose merely of social re-union. She ought, like her Divine Master, to have compassion on the multitude, and not send them empty away. If the fathers and mothers, the judges and counsellors are careful to maintain the life of God in the soul, and if the younger persons are willing to yield to that which would solemnize the spirit, many times of refreshing and renewal of strength would be experienced. But the action of "Western Quarterly Meeting," held at Gloucester, England, last month, is profitably suggestive. It is right for the Church to yearn for the spiritual well-being of the community, and if a similar arrangement were to be made by every Quarterly Meeting, under the sanction and constraining love of the Head of the Church, it does not follow of necessity that vocal preaching and prayer would always be heard, but the Minister of ministers would be present, and the wrestling seed would not seek His face in vain.

The General Meeting for Scotland was held at Glasgow on the 27th ult. The two months' meeting was held at Edinburgh on the 25th. The intervening day was First-day, when there was a full house in the morning, and in the evening the public were invited. These several gatherings were seasons of encouragement and of favor.

James Owen.—By our English exchanges we learn that our friend and countryman, having concluded his service in Scotland, was engaged through last month with labors in England, holding numerous public meetings. He was at Swarthmore meeting on the 19th: the latest account was up to the 28th ult.

Australasia.—At latest date our dear Friend Joseph J. Neave was about starting from Sydney for New Zealand, believing it right to perform this mission alone. Surely many American Friends will bear him in their hearts, desiring for him the preserving power and qualifying grace of Him, who, when he sends forth his disciples without purse or scrip, suffers them not to lack any thing. And in our aspirations upon his behalf, let his friends intercede that the ground may be prepared for reception of the seed of the Kingdom in the hearts of the savage people of this interesting and remarkable group of islands, where cannibalism and infanticide so recently prevailed. May the Lord make the place of His feet glorious in these remote volcanic islands, and cause the joyful tidings of salvation to spread up the mountains, over the plains, beside the beauteous cascades and along the rivers of New Zealand!

Madagascar.—The letter from L. Street cannot fail to excite deep interest. It is gratifying to learn from the London Friend that 3000 copies of the Gospel of Luke were to be shipped early in the present month to Louis Street and J. S. Sewell; also that "The British and Foreign Bible Society are sending by the same vessel copies of the whole Bible, New Testament and Gospel of Luke in the Malagasy language for the London Missionary Society," &c.

Bee Hive Sewing School.—A report is before us of this praiseworthy charity. The school (which is for colored children) is held on week-days in the Locust St. Mission building. The average attendance during the year has been sixty. They are instructed in the elementary branches and in sewing and knitting—the aim being to instruct only the most ignorant. The numerous garments thus made have all been sent to destitute colored children in the South, thus doubling the work of mercy and strengthening the valid claim of the association for generous support. For the salary of assistant teacher and other necessary expenses they are dependent on the kindness of their friends, and this, we feel confident, will not be withheld. It is a good investment of money, for a small sum given will yield a liberal per centage of benefit to a most necessitous class whom we "have always with us"—"and whenever we will we may do them good."

Subscriptions and donations may be sent to the Treasurer, M. A. Collins, 150 N. 7th St.

Maria Fox.—Four valued Friends, living remotely from each other, have sent for insertion copious extracts from the instructive Memoir of this Mother in Israel. For some of these passages we shall hope to devote a portion of our space. Meanwhile the simultaneous desire of judicious correspondents warrants us in calling attention to her writings, and recommending a thoughtful perusal. If the full memorial be unattainable, the abridgment, issued in this city by Friends' Book Association, will be sent by mail on receipt of an order accompanied by 50 cts., by H. C. Russell, 109 North Tenth St. The preface says:

"In following the footsteps of Maria Fox, the reader can scarcely fail to be impressed with the remarkable completeness of her character, in which is presented a beautiful combination of womanly delicacy, intellectual culture, and earnest piety. Her writings abound with thoughts and feelings which so strikingly illustrate, not only her daily life, but the motive which prompted the scrupulous fulfilment of duty, that it has been a task of no small difficulty to decide what to omit in her husband's carefully compiled volume; yet it was believed that her example, exhibiting so strongly the union of self-denial and submission to the Divine will with the culture of the affections and the intellect and the rich enjoyment of the beautiful in nature, might be profitably placed within the reach of all. It is of rare occurrence that we are permitted to contemplate a character of such excellence, in which an abiding watchfulness over word and act, a holy zeal for the promotion of Truth, and love unfeigned for the brotherhood of mankind, are so conspicuously manifested. Truly may it be said, she "purified her soul in obeying the Truth." And it was felt that such an exhibition of Christian principle was greatly needed in every family. This little volume is the result of this conviction. As a watchful, judicious, and most tender mother full of solicitude and earnest in prayer for her children, as a faithful wife and head of a Christian household, frugal that she might be liberal, as the sagacious counsellor and sympathizing friend, as the devoted laborer in her Master's vineyard, she has left to posterity the example of a life which, however severely she judged of it, could have been produced only under the beneficent influence of Christianity, and through submission to Him of whom it was promised that he would guide into all truth.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT. — Received from Cumberland, R.I., cheque for $100, which has been appropriated for the three benevolent objects designated by the kind donor.

DIED.

LEWIS.—At his residence in Wiscotta, Dallas Co., Iowa, on the 5th of Eleventh month, 1869, in the 70th year of his age, Abner Lewis, a member and valued Elder of Bear Creek Monthly Meeting.

BOBERTS.—In Farmington, N. H., on the 30th of Twelfth month, 1869, of a lingering illness, Sarah, wife of Moses Roberts, in the 76th year of her age; an esteemed member of Dover Monthly Meeting. In early years she became by convincement a member of our religious Society, and has been through life a consistent Friend, a devoted wife, and a tender mother, doing good to the poor heartily, as unto her Lord. In her sickness, which she bore with Christian patience and without a murmur, although a person of few words, yet she spoke from time to time messages of comfort, encouragement and exhortation to the dear ones about her, and she was, we believe, permitted through redeeming mercy to pass away in sweet peace, without groan or struggle; and her friends have the comfort of believing that she is at rest with the redeemed.

BROOKS.—On the 25th of Twelfth month, 1869, Olive, wife of Arthur Brooks, and daughter of Alfred and Hannah H. Underhill, in the 22d year of her age; a member of West Grove Monthly Meeting, Ind. Remarkably sustained in a short but painful illness, having early found her Saviour, the evidence of her acceptance with God for His sake was plainly manifested.

UNDERHILL.—On the 14th of Ninth mo., 1869, Jane, widow of John Underhill, in the 83d year of age; a member of Springfield Monthly Meeting, Ind. She has been gathered as a shock of corn fully ripe. Whilst in her usual health, she often said, when retiring to bed at night, "If my Master calls me away before morning, all is well—I am ready."

UNDERHILL.—On the 20th of Ninth mo., 1867, Julia, daughter of John and Jane Underhill, in the 45th year of her age; a member of Springfield Mo. Meeting, Ind. Her illness was protracted, and she was for twenty-seven years unable to walk, under which afflictions she was sustained in Christian fortitude, putting her trust in the Lord.

CARTER.—On the 15th of Tenth mo., 1869, Elam, son of Ira and Elizabeth Carter, in the 29th year of his age; a member of Plainfield Monthly Meeting, Ind. His relatives and friends are comforted in the belief that their loss is his eternal gain.

HADLEY.—On the 21st of Twelfth month, 1869, Mary Elizabeth, wife of Elias M. Hodson, and youngest daughter of Wm. T. and Ruth Hadley, in the 20th year of her age; a member of Plainfield Mo. Meeting, Ind. Although the call was sudden, her relatives and friends have not to mourn as those that have no hope.

WILSON.—Near Oskaloosa, on the 7th of First month, 1870, Sarah A., wife of Isaac Wilson, in her 37th year; a member of Spring Creek Mo. Meeting, Iowa.

STEERE.—In Burrillville, R. I., on the 8th of First mo., 1870, Shadrach Steere, in his 91st year; a beloved and valued member of Smithfield Monthly Meeting. Through Divine grace and mercy, this patriarchal man came to the close of life on earth as a shock of corn in its season. He believed in Christ for redemption, and trusted in His blessed atonement for salvation. We were continually reminded by his life that "an honest man is the noblest work of God."

CAREY.—Near Springdale, Kansas, on the 25th of Twelfth month, 1869, in the 21st year of his age, Andrew H., son of Sylvanus and Sarah Carey, (the former deceased;) a member of Kansas Mo. Meeting. He was enabled to rejoice in a bright prospect of joining, in a happy futurity, his loved ones who had "passed through the valley before him."

MADDEN.—At the residence of her son Samuel C. Madden, Parke Co., Ind., on the 30th of Eleventh month, 1869, in her 73d year, Mary, widow of Geo. Madden; a member of Bush Creek Mo. Meeting. She trusted in the mercy of Him who giveth the victory.

OSBORN.—At his residence, Sylvania, Parke Co., Ind., on the 30th of Eleventh month, 1869, Jesse Osborn, in the 56th year of his age.

MARSHALL.—At the residence of her son-in-law David Atkinson, on the 26th of Twelfth mo., 1869, Elizabeth, widow of Wm. Marshall, in the 72d year of her age; a member and elder of Rush Creek Mo. Meeting.

PLUMMER.—On the 10th of First month, 1870, in the 69th year of his age, Joseph Plummer; a member and elder of Le Grand Mo. Meeting, Iowa. His friends have the comforting assurance that his end was peace.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Belvidere, Perquimans Co. N.C., 1st mo. 19, 1870.

We had a very interesting Children's Temperance Meeting at Piney Woods Meeting-house on last First-day afternoon. It was appointed by our Total Abstinence Society, and was largely attended by adults as well as children. The exercises consisted of recitations, (singly and in concert,) dialogues, reading, &c., by the children and young people, followed by remarks from various older persons who felt interested in the promotion of the object of the meeting. Of course, the pieces selected for recitation, reading, &c., were temperance articles. The First-day schools in our vicinity were discontinued on that day, that there might be a general gathering to the Children's Temperance Meeting. The desire for another meeting of the kind was such as to induce another appointment, at which it is expected that the children will present (amongst other matters) something of Bible testimony in favor of Temperance. The teachers of our First-day schools and of our Quarterly Meeting school are alive to the importance of this work, and will aid their pupils in preparing the exercises for the meeting. I may add that there is a remarkable concurrence of sentiment and action on the part of the members of our Monthly Meeting in the cause of Temperance. The President and the three Vice-Presidents of our Total Abstinence Society are Elders of the Monthly Meeting; and when the Elders of the Church arise and gird themselves, and say, "Come, brethren, our work is waiting," the flock will be very likely to follow their footsteps. It is better to say, "Come" than "Go." The Father draweth, not driveth, us to Christ, and Christ, as the Good Shepherd, hath smoothed with his own footsteps the pathway of the sheep; and so the Elders are not to be lords over God's heritage, but "examples to the flock." We know indeed that there is no cure for the soul's diseases, but regeneration. That remedy is sovereign for all who accept it. But there is a condition of spiritual disease in which the soul is so thoroughly sunk and the will so overpowered with the enchantment of sensual gratification, that it will not accept the offered deliverance; and this special condition is reached by the stepping-stones of actual indulgence—each stone being a little lower than that which preceded it. For however deplorable may be our spiritual bondage and tendencies as Adam's children, it is undeniable that our own evil habits are constantly forging new chains of degradation for us. This view of the subject illustrates the value of moral training, and thoroughly vindicates the attempt to preserve the youth in the paths of total abstinence, both by our precept and by our example. Thus the way is kept open for the converting influences of the Holy Spirit whilst we are endeavoring to fulfil the injunction, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord —make straight in the desert a highway for our God." This injunction has a meaning for us—it points to a labor for our hands to do; and if these hands piously plant and nurture temperance and the other virtues in the hearts of the young, then the Good Husbandman, when He cometh to prepare the ground of the heart and make it good, will not have these virtues to uproot, but His work will wonderfully promote their growth, nnd they shall bring forth fruit manifold. Thus it is that sanctified human instrumentality plants and waters, preparatory to the increase which God giveth; and for that increase let us constantly pray. W. N.

A SERIOUS DRESS.

The Editor of this interesting and instructive Periodical, in his judicious remarks on "A Serious Dress," says: "It is a great privilege to be free from the trammels of fashion, and it is easior to put them on than to lay them aside." Parents and teachers in our Society may acknowledge the force of this sentiment. Some of these, who are religiously disposed, are not themselves yet set free from the alluring fashions of the world. And why need any one wonder at the power of their example over the minds of the children and youth, whom they are endeavoring to instruct in the way of godliness? Their pupils may be induced to go far beyond them in the changeable and often absurd fashions which prevail in these days of extravagance in dressing and making up of attire—of beads and feathers, better suited to the taste of the uncivilized and unchristianized Indians, than that of an enlightened Christian community. May we not shudder at the thought that the very precepts of the Bible seem to be set at defiance? Can it be other than an abomination in the Divine sight? Pride was condemned in a lower dispensation; and may not we expect that the Almighty will visit with his judgments such a nation as this? R.

For Friends' Review.

I wish to call upon the young amongst us, and the babes in Christ, whether young or old, to take courage and strength from the increasing disposition, on the part of the elder or more experienced in the church, to sympathize with them, and to aid them by kind words and helping hands. But particularly should they thank God and take courage for the revival of religious life in the whole body; for the warmer atmosphere which is driving coldness and barrenness from our meetings, and making the immediate presence of our Holy Head therein more sensible and more efficacious; and for the liberty of the Spirit, whereby, as in the days of our forefathers in the truth, even the young are enabled, humbly, and wholly guided by the Lord, to make public confession of their faith in Him. Oh, may all who have not yet found peace for their souls earnestly strive for it now,—when an angel is moving the waters,—with that singleness of purpose and whole-souled earnestness which cannot fail to win the blessing.

And may all be willing to receive blessings for the church just in that way in which our Heavenly Father is pleased to send them, being careful not to sin like the unbelieving Jews of old, who rejected Him in whom a long series of prophecies, in which they took great hope and pride, was fulfilled, because He did not come in that outward form and with those attendant circumstances which they, in their narrow interpretation of the prophecies, had been led to expect. CONTRAST.

In the last book of the New Testament, so fraught with emblematical revelations of the world to come, we read of Him, who "was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood, and his name is called THE WORD OF GOD; and the armies which were in heaven followed him, upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean." And, again, to her who represented the true church in heaven, to her it "was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white; for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints." While the woman who represented a city of wickedness on earth, sat upon a scarlet-colored beast, "arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and pearls and precious stones." She, too, was drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus." H.

JOHN ASHWORTH IN PALESTINE.

John Ashworth, of Rochdale, author of "Strange Tales," has written an account of his recent visit to Palestine, or "Walks in Canaan," as he terms his tour. He writes as a consistent man of peace. His ten companions in travel armed themselves with pistols and revolvers, but he declined to do so. He says, "I believe that the less a man has to do with swords and guns, the longer he is likely to live. I never yet knew a consistent member of the Peace Society shot, but history tells a sad tale on the other side. These being my principles, I had no gun to take care of." He thus speaks of Jaffa, or Joppa, the first place visited by him in the Holy Land:—"Some who have visited Joppa, did not go to comfort, but to make widows; not to raise from the dead, like Peter, but to destroy. Pompey, Alexander, Saladin, Napoleon—terrible names! especially the last—all visited this city. In 1799 Napoleon besieged Joppa; the garrison offered to lay down their arms and surrender on condition that their lives were spared. Eugene and Crosier, two of Napoleon's staff officers, agreed to the terms proposed. Four thousand men laid down their weapons of war, and were led to the headquarters of the French army. Napoleon ordered them to sit down; their hands were tied behind their backs; despair instantly marked every countenance, but all were silent. A council of war was held, and although his own officers had promised them life, this deity of France signed the death-warrant of the whole four thousand, and ordered every man to be shot. Bound and helpless, they were led down to the bottom of the sand hills on the sea-shore, formed into squares for execution. They requested one word with Napoleon; that one word was to remind him of the terms of their surrender: but the hero, who had just been through the hospitals and ordered the poisoning of four hundred sick creatures, could now order four thousand to be butchered. For five hours, French soldiers fired volley after volley into the dense mass of sons, husbands and fathers, till not one soul was left alive. The returning tide washed the blood of this murdered host from the sands of Joppa, but no tide will ever wash their blood from those French executioners and this soldier-god."—London "Friend."

The pursuits, the equipage, the outward exterior, serve as an index to the mind, and to the degree undue conformity to the world is practised, is the default in regard to worldly renunciation evident.—P. Palmer.

EDWARD HOOPER.

Aged 46 years—Died 7th mo. 2d, 1869—late residence, Portswood Lawn, Southampton.

It was a wish expressed by the subject of this notice, that if it were the will of his Heavenly Father, he might be raised up to say a few words on the simplicity of religion. It will therefore be in harmony with the purpose of the Annual Monitor, to record a few of his latest remarks, in which he so emphatically dwelt on this simplicity.

Being of a very reserved and reticent nature, he seldom spoke much of his religious feelings; and on this account the freedom and clearness of his expressions, during the last few days of his life, were remarkable. As the outward man was perishing, the inward man was being renewed day by day; and as the interests of this life paled in his view, the brightness of the future inheritance intensified. It was beautiful to watch the calm assurance and undoubting trust, with which his spirit passed from the scene of its earthly life, and entered into the joy of its Lord.

Submission was the most striking feature of his character. Through a life of more than ordinary sorrow and bereavement, this became a settled habit of his mind. Although peculiarly susceptible of domestic enjoyment, he was twice called upon to resign his closest earthly companionship. This he did with striking submission, and in the full conviction that all was ordered by unerring love and wisdom.

Edward Hooper was one of those whose influence consists in what they are, rather than in what they do. Integrity of purpose, force of will, and a keen sense of honor, were some of the qualities which, under Christian sway, gave him this influence; whilst in his own family circle, his loving, genial nature, combined with good judgment in the administration of family affairs, made him beloved and valued by a large circle of connections.

Unwavering peace and happiness characterized the short illness that closed his life: and in the near approach of death his spiritual perceptions unfolded. To one of his sisters he contrasted very strikingly the inward with the outward world. Speaking of the bright sunshine, the lovely scenery of the natural day, he said, "but what is it to that which shall be revealed? and then, too, it is forever!" As he spoke of the oneness of God and Christ, his sister remarked, that the soul of man that was to live in that glorious eternity is also of the same nature, he said, "Yes, all the same,—no division,—in that eternal reunion it will be with, and in, Divine life."

The following is from memoranda made by another sister at the time—"June 23d. Had an interesting time of converse with dear Edward, whose mind seemed full of eternal things. On alluding to one who had passed away, he smiled and said,—'really when I think how many there are, of those I have loved and known intimately, who will be ready to meet me when I am called home,—it is very beautiful. It is wonderful, when there are such joys awaiting us, such meetings with those we love, amidst those glories, that beautiful glassy sea, and those lovely pure skies, all glorious,—that we should not wish only, but long for the time to be there. I sometimes wish to be drawn a little again into this outward life, that I might have a mission of good to my dear children; but it is all in higher Hands.' Afterwards we spoke of child-like trust. He said, 'Yes, it is the simplicity; I have long felt this, and when I have thought of the ways of God and got into difficulties, and not been able to work them out—I have thought, well it is not for me to work them out. I have only to leave it to the Lord, and he will work it out for me when I am to see it. It is simplicity we need, and love, love!—the simple trust in His love, that His promises are sure; and however things may go, we may trust His loving care, through our Saviour who died for us.'"

"June 25th. Found dear Edward as usual, in a quiet, happy state, thinking over his blessings. He said, 'Now that I have done with all business matters, I seem to have still more of the scenes of my past life come before me, and I see things which I had entirely forgotten for years. They do not come before me as if to trouble me, or to show me where I have been at fault in order that I might atone for it: no, at the same time comes such a satisfying belief and clear sense that all is atoned for, that there is nothing but what is pleasant in the retrospect. You see, God sent His Son to atone for the world, and to save it; and I feel that He has redeemed me, and that now I have only to rest in the love of the Father. I do very much wish, if it was right, that I could be raised up, just to give out a few words on this extreme simplicity. I do believe that many people lose the enjoyment of their lives in endeavoring to see the way in which things are done, and trying to account for them, instead of leaving it all in trust. It is so simple: there is the love of the Saviour who came to save us, and the love of the Father who sent Him, but it is all one.'"

This sketch may be appropriately closed with one or two extracts from Edward Hooper's diary. Ninth month 23d, 1868. "How beautiful, each morning, to feel that we are resting on our Heavenly Father's love, having been reconciled to Him by faith in His dear Son. . . . How unsatisfying and unrestful must be the life of those who are parted from their Heavenly Father, and are without God in the world! Lord, help me to throw down the whole of the wall of partition, that I may live close to Thee."

Third month 16th, 1869. "Oh how sweet, during the sleepless hours of weakness or pain, to feel that One is near, who will ever be mindful of His covenant."

Third month 28th. "'Be careful for nothing!' How much more of the peace of God do we enjoy, if we habitually each day, and in every time of need, let our requests be made known unto God, casting all our care upon Him! Then if we faithfully follow His leadings, we may calmly and without concern pass through the greatest trials of this life. 'He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.'"—Annual Monitor.

TWO REMARKS ABOUT FAITH.

1. "Faith without works is dead." A profession of faith which produces no fruit is a vain delusion. But this is no reason why we should rest our confidence on the fruits of faith instead of on Christ. Others can recognize our faith only as they see its effects. Yet they may be deceived, and may conclude that we have faith when we know that we do not believe. Back of all its effects, a man knows if his heart's confidence is in Christ or not. Dr. Bonar says, "The consciousness of moving accompanies motion; the consciousness of seeing accompanies looking; the consciousness of loving accompanies love; so the consciousness of believing accompanies the act of believing. If not, there is no certainty in anything. If I am liable to be mistaken as to my simple act of believing, I am much more liable to be mistaken as to my complex act of examination into my own feelings, motives, and principles."

2. Faith is not my Saviour, but Christ, in whom faith rests. Romaine says in a letter, "You want comfort, and you look to your faith. If faith could speak, it would say, Comfort is not in me: look to Jesus; it is all in Him. Indeed my friend, it is. The Holy Ghost, the Comforter, will not glorify your faith. He will not give it the honor of comforting you. He takes nothing to comfort with but the things of Christ, and His things, not as used by you, but as given from Him. This lesson, I think, He is teaching you. He is bringing you off from looking at your faith. He intends that you should not regard how you believe, but to settle you in believing. The Spirit has been teaching me to draw my comfort not from how well I believe, but from Jesus Christ, in whom I believe."

SALT FOR THE THROAT.

An exchange says: "In these days when diseases of the throat prevail, and particularly a dry hacking cough, which is not only distressing to ourselves but to those with whom we are brought into business contact, those thus afflicted may be benefited by trying the following remedy. Last fall we were induced to try what virtue there was in common salt. We commenced by using it three times a day—morning, noon, and night. We dissolved a large tablespoon of common salt in about half a tumblerful of cold water, and with this we gargled the throat most effectually, just before meal time. The result has been that during the winter we were not only free from the usual coughs and colds to which, as far as our memory extends, we have always been subject, but the dry hacking cough has entirely disappeared. We attribute it entirely to the salt gargle, and do most cordially recommend it to those of our readers who are subject to diseases of the throat."

THE RIGHT WAY.

Lord, is it still the right way, though I cannot see Thy face,
Though I do not feel Thy presence, and Thine all sustaining grace?
Can even this be leading through the bleak and sunless wild
To the City of Thy holy rest, the mansions undefiled?

Lord, is it still the right way? A while ago I passed Where every step seemed thornier and harder than the last;
Where bitterest disappointment and inly aching sorrow
Carved day by day a weary cross, renewed with every morrow.

The heaviest end of that strange cross I knew was laid on Thee,
So I could still press on secure of Thy deep sympathy;
Our upward path may well be steep, or how were patience tried?
I knew it was the right way, for it led me to Thy side.

But now I wait alone amid dim shadows dank and chill;
All moves and changes round me, but I seem standing still;
Or every feeble footstep I urge towards the light,
Seems but to lead me farther into the silent night.

I cannot hear Thy voice, Lord! Dost Thou still hear my cry?
I cling to Thine assurance that Thou art ever nigh;
I know that Thou art faithful; I trust, but cannot see
That it is still the right way by which Thou leadest me.

I think I could go forward with brave and joyful heart,
Though every step should pierce me with unknown
fiery smart,
If only I might see Thee, if I might gaze above
On all the cloudless glory of the sunshine of Thy love.

Is it really leading onwards? When shadows flee away,
Shall I find this path hath brought me more near to perfect day?
Or am I left to wander thus, that I may stretch my hand
To some still wearier traveller in this same shadow land?

Is this Thy chosen training for some future task unknown?
Is it that I may learn to rest upon Thy word alone?
Whate'er it be, oh! leave me not, fulfil Thou every hour
The purpose of Thy goodness, and the work of faith with power.

I lay my prayer before Thee! and, trusting in Thy word,
Though all is silence in my heart, I know that Thou hast heard.
To that blest City lead me, Lord, (still choosing all my way,)
Where faith melts into vision as the starlight into day.

ABOLITION OF THE DEATH PENALTY.—A bill for this object will be brought before the Pennsylvania Legislature in the month about opening. It is expected to pass, provided constituents request their members to vote for it. Petitions may be found at this office, at 304 Arch St., or at 111 S. 4th St. It is requested that all Friends will sign. Persons in the country should circulate petitions, written or printed.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—Advices from Europe are to the 24th inst.

FRANCE.—A number of copies of certain Belgian journals intended for circulation in France, were intercepted and seized by the French authorities a few days since. This act, following the recent official declaration that foreign journals were to be freed from the censorship, excited much surprise. Legal proceedings against the proprietors of a radical journal called La Reforme have resulted in three of the editors being sentenced to imprisonment for six months, and the manager for seven months. The trial of Rochefort ended on the 22d. He was convicted, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and a fine of 3000 francs, (nearly $600.) The sentence includes deprivation of his political rights, though he remains a member of the Legislative Body. It is announced that an amnesty for offenders against the press laws will soon be issued, and a new law regulating the press proposed in the Legislature.

A cable, in the interest of a French company, has been laid to connect Brest with England, the English end being at Salcombe.

At La Creuzot, one of the greatest iron manufacturing towns in Europe, situated in one of the eastern departments of France, 10,000 workmen, a few days since, joined in a "strike," which excited much attention and considerable uneasiness throughout the country, from the large number concerned in it, and from a fear that the example might be followed elsewhere, and that revolutionary agents had caused or promoted the difficulties. The immediate cause was said to be a change in the general direction of affairs, to which the workmen objected, and they petitioned for the reinstatement of the former directors, which was refused. Over 3000 troops were sent to the place, to prevent or repress disorders, and it was announced by telegraph on the 22d, that the strike was ended, but no particulars were given of the nature of the settlement. Similar demonstrations have occurred within a few months past, among various classes of workers, and in different parts of the country, the demand being mostly for some increase of the low wages usually paid. In some cases a reduction in the hours of labor was asked. In a few instances the workmen obtained what they sought, in others they were obliged to accept a part of their claim. They have generally refrained from violence, and only when they were rudely repulsed and military interference invoked, has any bloodshed occurred.

Spain.—The Spanish bishops in attendance at the Council in Rome, have united in a protest against the authorization of civil marriages in Spain.

Italy.—The German bishops attending the Council held a meeting on the 21st inst., and resolved that unless the number of members in dioceses be taken into consideration in the votes taken in the Council, they will return home in a body. This decision is said to have caused much excitement in Rome.

Egypt.—An expedition, apparently with the combined objects of exploration and conquest, was some time since despatched by the Viceroy up the Nile to the interior of Africa, under the command of Baker, the well-known English explorer, who discovered Lake Albert Nyanza. Accounts have been received from it to the 1st inst., when it was on the upper waters of the Nile, and all was going on well.

China.—Advices to the 16th ult. The Burlingame treaty between the United States and China had been ratified by the Chinese government. The term of his mission to foreign governments has been extended two years, and $140,000 in gold appropriated for the expenses of the embassy. The revised treaty with Great Britain has been published, and is said to be satisfactory to the Chinese, but not to the English in China, as it does not conceede inland steam navigation, and exacts transit dues of 2½ per cent. on imports. Sir Rutherford Alcock, the British envoy, before his departure for England, went to Nankin and demanded satisfaction for the outrages which had been committed on missionaries. He was unfavorably received by the local authorities, was answered only with promises, and was obliged to leave the matter in the hands of the British consul for settlement. The French demands for indemnity were better received.

An order has been issued to the commissioners of customs at the treaty ports, restricting the emigration of coolies to the ships and to the ports of treaty powers only; requiring the commissioners to ascertain that each emigrant fully understands the contract under which he acts, and that he goes of his own free will; and wholly prohibiting the coolie traffic at Macao.

Japan.—The late Inspector General of Customs had concluded a loan of £1,000,000 to the Mikado's government, to construct a railroad from Yeddo to Kioto, and it was said that some English capitalists had effected a further loan of £2,000,000 on the public works. The government had informed the foreign Ministers that as soon as workmen can be got from the English mint, it will coin new Japanese dollars a trifle finer and heavier than the Mexican dollar. Drainage works for Yokohama had been commenced, and the government engineer had gone to the Inland Sea to open fresh coal mines. Dr. Willis, who established a hospital and medical school at Yeddo, was about to go to Salaismas to provide similar institutions there. A telegraph line from Yeddo to Yokohama was nearly completed. Political affairs were quiet, though there were some indications of probable future trouble.

Pacific Ocean.—A U. S. vessel, just arrived from the Feejee Islands, brought the account that many English settlers were arriving there from Australia and New Zealand, to engage in raising Sea Island cotton, which is said to yield largely there; and that a petition, numerously signed, had been sent to the United States government, asking it to assume a protectorate over the entire group, consisting of 154 islands, 65 of them inhabited. Great Britain had previously declined to add them to her colonial possessions. The population of the islands is said to have increased in three years from 400 to 1,800.

Domestic.—Under the new arrangements made by the Postmaster General with some of the transatlantic steamship companies, the British mails will be dispatched from New York by the Hamburg line on Third-day, by the "Williams and Guion" line to Queenstown on Fifth-day, and by the Bremen line on Seventh-day of each week. The Canadian line, sailing on Seventh-day from Portland, Me., in winter, and from Quebec in summer, will also carry a weekly mail to Great Britain.

At Chicago, on the 17th inst., the thermometer varied during the day from 5° to 15° below zero, and on the 18th, at 8 A.M., was 15°, and at noon 8° below zero. At St. Paul, on the morning of the 18th, it stood at 25°, and at Oshkosh, Wis., 16°. In this city and its vicinity, the winter thus far has been exceptionally mild, very few severely cold days having occurred. It is stated that the Union and Central Pacific Railroads have been free from snow blockades, with a single exception.

The House of Representatives of the Ohio Legislature, on the 20th inst. adopted the resolution ratifying the 15th amendment, which had previously passed the Senate. The vote stood yeas 57, nays 55. On the 18th, in the Rhode Island Legislature, the House ratified the amendment by a vote of 9 to 7; the Senate having adopted the resolution in the Sixth mo. last. In Iowa, a difference between the two Houses has delayed the completion of the ratification. Each House appears to have passed resolutions of its own, and refused to concur in those of the other body. On the 24th, a committee of conference was appointed on the subject. The amendment is still pending in the California Legislature, and both Houses have postponed the discussion of it, several times.

Congress.—The Senate continued the discussion of the House bill declaring Virginia entitled to representation in Congress, until the 21st, when it was passed with sundry amendments, requiring State officers to take the test oath or one declaring that they had been relieved by Congress from disability, and imposing the fundamental conditions that the State Constitution shall never be so altered as to deprive any citizen or class of the right to vote, &c., assured to them by the present Constitution. The vote on the final passage was yeas 47, nays 10. The House, on the 24th, concurred with this substitute by a vote of 136 to 57. A bill for the establishment of a postal telegraph system was introduced in the Senate, and a similar one in the House. The latter was referred to a special committee. Among the bills introduced in the Senate was one proposing a 16th Constitutional amendment, making citizenship the basis of suffrage, and declaring that all native and naturalized citizens shall have the same rights and privileges of the elective franchise; the intention of the mover being understood to be to extend suffrage to women.

MARGARET LUCAS,

Died at Luton, 7th of Third month, 1869—age 35 years.

Margaret Lucas was the youngest daughter of Edward and Benjamina Lucas, of Luton. She was born at Southwick, the 29th of Sixth month, 1833.

As a child she was of an open, loving disposition, and possessed peculiar simplicity and purity of mind, combined with great conscientiousness. She received her education at the Friends' School at Lewes, where she formed some close friendships, only broken by death. Many instances might be brought forward, to show that during this period of her life, she often thought very seriously of the welfare of her immortal soul. In a memorandum, dated Twelfth month 31st, 1854, in a retrospect of her early days, she says:—

"I cannot remember the time when I have not been, more or less, under the influence of religion; and yet, now that I am more than twenty-one years of age, I have not given up my heart an undivided sacrifice. Oh! I do sometimes long to abide under the teaching and guidance of the Holy Spirit of Truth. I have realized a little the blessedness of such a state; but, when I have taken a right step in yielding to a little apprehended duty, the benefit is soon lost by renewed carelessness and unwatchfulness. Oh! I must not go on so; it is awful to trifle with these things, as I have done."

On the 3d of Sixth month, 1855, she again writes:—"I must record the goodness and tender mercy of my Saviour. He has lifted me up out of the miry clay, and set my foot on a firm place,—even on the Rock of Ages. For several weeks, perhaps months, at the beginning of this year, I was in a more indifferent, unsettled state than usual. I seemed left to myself, and began almost to despair of help. I was very careless, and even tried sometimes to forget my miserable condition; but I was very unhappy; for who that has once tasted of a Saviour's love can ever be happy without Him? No one knew my state but dearest J——, who encouraged me to look from myself to that merciful Saviour, who came to seek and to save that which was lost. And He has, in wonderful mercy, lifted up the light of His countenance upon me. He did help me when I was unable to lift a finger for my own deliverance."

In writing to her most intimate friend, she thus describes her feelings:—

"The same day that I received thy letter, I came into my own room and read the seventh and part of the eighth of Romans; and after the reading, my burden seemed to be rolled away without any effort of my own, and I rose up free and unshackled. It seemed best not to look much to the future, but to endeavor to keep as near as possible to my compassionate Saviour, by prayer, obedience, and faith, and leave the rest to Him." Her confidence was that she was "kept by the power of God," and, from that time, she never lost a sense of sweet assurance that she was "accepted in the Beloved," although she had to pass through many spiritual conflicts, in common with other Christians.

Her power of sight, which had never been very strong, grew less year by year; and although the best medical advice was sought, both here and on the Continent, all the means made use of failed to produce the desired effect, and she was told that she must expect to lose it gradually. In a letter to her friend, dated 3d of Fifth month, 1859, she thus touchingly alludes to it:—

"Looking forward to the time, perhaps not far distant, when I must become much more dependent on others, it is often a bitter momentary thought; but it is almost instantly checked by a sweet sense that all is known to, and directed by, my Heavenly Father, and then His yoke does seem easy, and His burden light. Even at the present time, the various little mortifications and difficulties I am frequently meeting with, in consequence of my infirmity, are almost always attended with a comforting consciousness of overruling law, love and protection, and I think I can say from the bottom of my heart, 'Thy will be done.'"

It was then that she seemed for the first time to be impressed with the thought of what she found afterwards to become the joy of her life—that there was a service for her to perform for her Lord. She writes in the same letter:—"There is no doubt a period in our Christian course, when we can do little more than receive the love so freely offered; but if we are to get beyond the state of babes in Christ, I think the time will come, when we must work diligently and earnestly for Him, who has so tenderly nourished and supported us."

In 1860 she lost her intensely loved friend and school-fellow, and, for the time, she seemed almost crushed. She says, in writing to another:—

"Our hearts, lives and sympathies were so closely twined together, that it has indeed taken a hard wound to sever them. Pray for me, my dear E——, that the effects designed by Him who chastens in love may be accomplished, and that my affections and energies may not be permanently blighted, but rather elevated and purified under its influence." In alluding to it again shortly afterwards, she adds:—"I desire rather to take fresh courage, and to be pressing earnestly forward with a contented and thankful spirit. I cannot see how good can come out of this seeming evil, and perhaps I never shall in this life; but I think I do feel more able to leave it, and to believe—yes, even to know—all is well."

Eleventh month, 1861. "I suppose we must endure a life-long struggle before we gain a complete victory over our own evil hearts. Does it not seem strange that they should be so hard to conquer? We should indeed sink into despair, did we not know that the battle has been already fought and won for us." It is evident, however, that reliance upon the Saviour's work did not allow her to conclude, that the maintenance of her own warfare was not needed;—but was rather felt as one of the chief encouragements to persevere in it, assured of final victory through Him.

In 1862 she began to gather some little ragged boys together, and after giving them a breakfast, she sought to influence them for good. Referring to this, she remarks:—

11th of Second month, 1862. "After breakfast I read a very few verses of Scripture to them, and let them repeat a little morning hymn, thus endeavoring to supply a morsel of spiritual, as well as natural food; but this appears to be very slow work indeed, and if it were not for the many encouragements we have, to work by faith rather than sight, I think I should quite despair of doing them any good. The words of the sweet hymn often come to mind with an encouraging influence:—

'Room in the narrowest ledge,
The little seed may find, &c.'"

Her earnest desire was, as opportunity offered, to influence her younger friends, and relations especially, for good in the Heavenly way, and she thought all true Christians ought to make an effort in this direction. In the same year she undertook a class of girls in a First-day school, and she often wrote of her scholars—even individually—with exceeding interest. On the 23d of Twelfth month, 1864, she says:—

"Now, dear E., I must tell thee a little about my own scholars; for I know thou wilt be glad to hear that I do seem to be getting a little more hold of them, and I am thankfully able to believe that there is something good working amongst them. I am afraid to speak too confidently, and yet, I think, when we see some signs of spiritual life, we cannot do other than welcome it with joy and gratitude." And again, on the 7th of Tenth month, 1866, she writes:—"It is a very responsible thing to have them, in some sort, under my care, and I am afraid of saying too much or too little. It is a great comfort to know that, if we keep a single eye to the Great Teacher, He will make use of us as He sees fit. I do long to live in a more heavenly state of mind, and to be commending the Gospel of Christ constantly in life and conversation, and very often more pointedly in words."

The earnest and watchful way in which she entered into any fresh duty, was very characteristic. Thus, while on a visit to some of her relations, she became interested in the subject of Mothers' Meetings, and wrote:—

"I think I shall have something to do in that way when I get home; but I often feel doubtful about it—whether I feel it sufficiently laid upon me to warrant me in undertaking it. I feel entirely unable to do so, I think, in every way. Do ask for me, dear, that I may be helped to see what I ought to do; and if there is any liberty to go forward, I may be enabled to do so in simple faith, and under the influence of the pure, loving Spirit of the dear Master. I hope I do not take too high a ground. It is a very simple work that I contemplate; but even this I dare not undertake in my own strength."

On getting home, way opened to engage in the work, and she was enabled to throw her heart and energy into it with telling effect. After writing of one of these Mothers' Meetings, (Twelfth month 6th, 1867,) when, according to the special desire of the women, the Bible only was exclusively read, and a longer time for prayer allowed, she adds:—"I trust that some hearts were tendered, and brought near to the Throne of Grace. I may say that I have great satisfaction in our little work. It seems to supply a want which I have felt ever since I had a district. One can sit down by the bedside of a sick person, and speak of heavenly things; but in just going round from house to house, it is difficult to introduce anything like religious conversation, without its seeming strained, or even what might be taken for cant. But in meetings like ours, called for the special purpose, and to which all are at liberty to come, it feels very different, and perhaps they may be more easily followed up by a word in season at the house. At all events, it gives them an opportunity of seeing that there is something deeper and more earnest about it than mere talk."

(To be concluded.)

For Friends' Review.

ARE WE PROGRESSING?

Missionary effort, First-day schools, temperance and deeds of charity seem to be increasingly engaging our attention. Our ministers are increasing and are laboring with great apparent earnestness. We, in some cases, extend the right hand of fellowship to non-members, so far as to admit them into meetings for discipline, with other advanced steps, in which we should all rejoice, did we not fear that, in some cases at least, there is danger of compromising some of the views that have ever distinguished the Society as a peculiar people, and which still remain dear to many of its members; views that we advocated at the time of the separation in our Yearly Meeting, (Ohio.) I hope Friends, amid all the life and light that seem manifest among us as a people, will not be led to consider the paths which our fathers walked in and "found peace," too straight for them, nor their mission ended; especially while the many forms and ceremonies are practised among other sects. For while we are ready and willing to extend Christian fellowship to all who love righteousness and hate iniquity, we believe we have a mission to fulfil, a principle to extend, which many among other sects have failed to realize in all their fulness. Then may we all labor in our several allotments: for all the humble, devoted followers of Jesus, whether "Jews or Gentiles, bond or free," are of the "one body;" but God hath "tempered the body together," and assigned to each member some appropriate service "as it hath pleased Him."

Why should those who are called to labor in the Temple "where neither hammer nor axe, nor any tool of iron is heard," mingle with the laborers in the mountains—the hewers of wood and squarers of stone? E. T.

THOUGHTS SUGGESTED BY THE LATE CONFERENCE.

In the history of the Society of Friends during many years, no event has been so significant or so encouraging as the Conference which has lately been held in Philadelphia. In a community against which has been brought the reproach of spiritual deadness, the life and power of the Gospel has been proclaimed with no uncertain sound, and the stranger from afar—the obscure as well as the famous—has been welcomed, cared for, entertained, in that spirit which makes the name of Friend no longer a misnomer. With this impressed upon our minds, is there room for a few words of suggestion, savoring somewhat, perhaps, of criticism, but more of friendly caution?

Practical holiness, in small things as well as great, is as urgently called for to-day as in the days of George Fox. Every movement of the professing Christian is narrowly watched by two classes,—the honest seeker, querying, "Is it a reality, or only a sentiment?" and the caviller, ready to pick flaws, saying, "It is very easy to talk, but show us the fruits." When a Friend, in a Conference or a Yearly Meeting, gives utterance to his feelings of love for his fellow-creatures and desires for their well-being, here and hereafter, and afterwards, meeting his obscure neighbor, whose outer circumstances he knows, and whose spiritual needs he ought to know with the insight which love gives, passes him with no recognition, or a cold and distant one,—he little knows what a blow he inflicts, not only upon a sensitive spirit, but upon the cause he seeks to advocate. For there is nothing we need—nothing the world needs—more than to be persuaded that the religion of the Gospel is not a thing of words, or of frames and feelings, but a tangible reality—an efficient power.

In a First-day School Conference, it is of course proper to consider especially the work of conducting First-day and Mission Schools, and to speak of such as "the Lord's work." But is there not a danger of coming to look upon special duties as pre-eminently the Lord's work, to the neglect or undervaluing of other important service? Is it not a mistake to draw too plainly a line of distinction between temporal and spiritual interests—between religious and secular duties? There is a tendency with many religious people to look upon teaching, preaching and missionary work as something done for the Lord; and the work of the farm, the counting-house, the household, the study, as work necessary to be done, but just so much taken from God's service. The Christian's life-work belongs to the Lord, every part of it, and can all be made to glorify Him.

Do we not too easily fall into the habit of using time-honored expressions without reflecting deeply upon what they really mean, or how their meaning may be affected by circumstances? "Confess Christ!" But does not confession imply something like shame? does it not imply that the thing confessed will be looked upon with condemnation, or at least disfavor, by those to whom confession is made? In the early days of the Church, to confess allegiance to a despised and rejected King required faith and courage. To-day, in the presence of infidels and scoffers, to confess a belief in that which they consider a childish superstition, may be a test of loyalty. But how is it in a congregation where the vast majority are professing Christians; where to take the name of Christ is to be honored and caressed; where a profession has almost come to be a criterion of value, instead of money or lineage; where the silent worker who speaks not in public the name of Jesus, is looked upon as "of no account?" In such gatherings as our late Conference, Christ Jesus is the King of Glory—He rules and reigns. To claim in public, "He is mine!" is not to confess, but to call down honor and applause. Let not this impugn the integrity or sincerity of any who do so confess, but let it be a plea for those who honestly feel, "if I publicly claim that I am His, it cannot add to His glory, but it will glorify myself."

One of the most pertinent things said during the Conference was something like this:—"To ape another, or to copy another, is despicable in the sight of God and man." George Fox said well and wisely, "Follow me only as I follow Christ." Would he not have said as well and as wisely, "Follow me not at all, but Christ altogether?"

From the Annual Monitor.

JOHN HENRY BACKHOUSE,

Son of John Church and Anna Backhouse, (both deceased,) and grandson of Joseph John Gurney, died at Blackwell, Darlington, Seventh month 20th, 1869—age 20 years.

The early removal of this young man was a striking lesson on the uncertainty of all earthly hopes. Possessed of talents beyond the average, and highly cultivated by persevering industry, his ripening manhood gave promise of a life of varied and extensive usefulness.

His early memoranda show the workings of true spiritual life, and love to the Saviour; but as he grew older, while giving his mind closely to the philosophical investigation of truth, there is reason to believe, that these early feelings were in degree overlaid by the eager pursuit of intellectual acquirement, and the engrossing activities of daily life.

In his illness, most consoling was the evidence that he had come "as a little child" to Jesus; and felt that on Him, and "Him alone," was his trust placed: and while regretting that his love to Him had been "too cold,"—that his life had fallen short in its highest aims,—it was given him, in a remarkable degree, to realize the all-sufficiency of redeeming love,—the victory through Christ. His heart seemed filled with thanksgiving; and with great clearness and power he was enabled to give expression to his faith. "O God, I have not followed Thee fully, but Thy grace is sufficient for me." "Christ is our only salvation. He died on the cross for us, and has given us an example, that we should follow Him." And again, "God is the true God. Many would teach us by their books to serve other gods; and would make us worship the world, and those who are no gods. Change the hearts of these, O God, and save their souls! We know that God is the true God. We know it, and have felt it. Christ—Christ—Christ dying for our sins." "God has been very merciful to me every way. God is good—He is Love!—He is Light!—and Life."

Almost the last words that could be understood were, "Thanks be unto God, who has given me the victory through Christ, and is giving me an entrance into His glorious kingdom."

Let no Bible Christian say that there is nothing in dress. The Bible forbids conformity to the world as truly as it does any other sin. For want of compliance with the self-sacrificing principles of the Bible in this regard, many have made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. "Know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? He that would be a friend of the world is the enemy of God."—P. Palmer.

ON THE NATURE OF THE INTERPLANETARY MEDIUM.

BY PROF. VANDER WEYDE, M. D.

The latest investigations with the spectroscope have revealed to us not only the nature of the matter constituting sun, stars, and celestial nebulæ, but promise also to teach us something about the nature of that much-spoken-of, contested, mysterious, hypothetical, and, withal, surely existing medium, which fills the interplanetary and interstellar spaces.

The observations of Angström, in Europe, corroborated by Winder, of Toronto, Canada, and by Peirce, of Cambridge, Mass., show that at the height of from ten to four hundred miles a medium exists not identical with any of the known simple or compound gases, while Angström recognized the same medium to exist in the zone of the zodiacal light, which, as is well known, occupies the space of a belt around the sun in the plane of the ecliptic, inside the earth's orbit. It is probable that this material medium fills the whole planetary space, but becomes only visible if illuminated by some cause, such as electric currents in the case of the aurora polaris, an unknown agency as in the case of the zodiacal light, or chemical action as in the case of the comets' tails—according to Tyndall's theory.

The nucleus of some comets has been proved to consist chiefly of carbon—a fact as startling as the other, also revealed by the spectroscope, that many nebulæ consist of incandescent hydrogen. And, by the way, let us here correct a common error committed by many scientific papers, which, when speaking of this fact, call it burning hydrogen. The hydrogen in the nebulæ is not burning, but simply in an incandescent state, which means at a temperature so high that it becomes luminous like a piece of red-hot, or white-hot, metal, undergoing no other change but that of a slow cooling process, which, in the case of the nebulæ in question, is probably more than counteracted by the mutual gravitation of its mass, and its consequent contraction and condensation.

I am not aware that the tails of comets have already been submitted to spectroscopic investigation; it will be indeed an interesting point to compare the spectral lines of these tails with those of the aurora and zodiacal light, because—if Tyndall's theory of the formation of these tails be correct—we will have a third way in which this interplanetary material medium is made visible. Tyndall supposes it to be a chemical action of the sunlight (after it has passed through the head of the comet) on the interplanetary matter, separating from it particles like a fog, which become temporarily visible, and afterward are dissipated again by the direct sunbeam. Spectral analysis will show the lines peculiar to the material particles deposited, which form this fog, and so teach us more concerning the chemical nature of the interplanetary substance.

To imagine such a very attenuated ponderable matter as fills the interplanetary space, takes no larger stretch of the imagination than conceiving a difference in density from the lightest bodies we know on the surface of our earth, just as we know these to differ from the heaviest. Hydrogen gas is 250,000 times lighter than iridium, the heaviest body known, and we may easily rarefy hydrogen some 400 times, so as to make it 100,000,000 times lighter than iridium and still be sure that we have hydrogen in the vessel, and prove its presence by recondensation or otherwise. If now we imagine a medium 100,000,000 times lighter than such hydrogen it is all we want; it may be beyond our actual verification, but so is the existence of hydrogen for uncivilized man, and was even to our race before Cavendish had described it only one century ago. It is, indeed, difficult to conceive the existence of hydrogen without having seen the experiments proving its properties; and undoubtedly we labor under a similar difficulty in regard to the clear conception of the interplanetary substance, as the ignorant do in regard to the conception of hydrogen gas.

For several reasons I avoid giving this substance a peculiar name, as nothing is gained by this. I consider it as ponderable, but of so light a weight that its expansive elasticity is far greater than its gravitating power.

Prof. W. A. Norton, of New Haven, according to the latest number of the London and Edinburgh Philosophical Magazine, in a defence of his "Principles of Molecular Physics," maintains still the simultaneous existence of two mediums, which he calls electric and luminiferous ether; the first for the explanation of electric, the second for that of the luminous and electric phenomena. The first hypothesis of an electric ether has become entirely unnecessary and must be considered obsolete, since it has lately been practically proved that electricity cannot possibly be transmitted through a real vacuum, and therefore is a mode of motion of ponderable matter. The doctrine of heat cannot exhibit such a striking and conclusive experiment against the hypothesis of a caloric fluid as this. We cannot possibly make a vacuum through which heat and light will not pass. Notwithstanding this, heat is now considered as a mere mode of motion of matter, and only its transmission through space necessitates the conception of a transmitting medium which fills that space. We have much more reason to abandon the hypothesis of an electric fluid or ether, than that of a caloric fluid.

It is not a little remarkable that it appears that we are able with our modern contrivances to make here below, on the surface of our earth, a vacuum more perfect than that existing in the super atmospheric space—in which a medium appears to exist, which transmits electricity—namely, in case the luminosity produced in this medium during the aurora borealis is caused by electricity; this appears really to be the fact, and the only rational explanation, by reason of its action on the compass needle, which is perfectly identical with that of an electric current.

As the aurora extends from the upper strata of our atmosphere to a height of some 400 or 500 miles, it appears that this—the electricity-conducting and ponderable medium—extends to that height, and that above this the rest of the planetary space is filled with the same substance still more rarefied aud less ponderable, so that it no more conducts the electricity, but only light and heat, and is there similar to our perfect vacuum, which also conducts only the latter, but not the electric currents; that this medium is, however, still dense and material enough to become visible under certain circumstances, is probable from the comets' tails and the zodiacal light.

Perhaps the atmosphere in which we move is the type of a more extended and more subtile atmosphere around the sun, extending through the planetary space and in which the planets move; this atmosphere must be more rarefied at its limits, and rotate with the planets, as our terrestrial atmosphere rotates with the earth; this planetary medium, more condensed in the interplanetary space, is less so beyond; but still as a medium in the interstellar space, adapted to the transmission of light and heat, as these agents reach us, even from the fixed stars, of which the distances surpass that of the sun many million times. As the amount of heat reaching us from the stars has even been measured, and as the so-called radiating heat is simply the result of the transmission of vibrations by means of an elastic medium (like as air transmits sounds,) we are compelled to admit that, at least as far as we can penetrate, there exists no empty space anywhere, and that matter is diffused through the whole universe not only in a very variable degree in regard to quality, but much more still in regard to quantity.

To recapitulate. I deny the existence of so-called imponderable matter, and sustain the definition that all which has weight is matter, and vice versa, that the so-called imponderable forces have no separate existence, but are simply different modes of molecular motions of ponderable matter, which fills the whole universe, only very much rarefied in the supposed empty spaces, and that this exceedingly rarefied ponderable matter is the medium which transmits heat, light, and electricity, like as air transmits sound; I maintain that it is as absurd to accept the existence of a separate caloric or electric fluid, to explain the caloric and electric phenomena, as it would be to accept a separate sonorous fluid in order to explain the acoustic phenomena; and, finally, that as the extremely light but still ponderable air is a sufficient vehicle for sound, without recourse to any other hypothesis, so the more extremely light but still ponderable matter in the universe, is the sufficient vehicle for light, heat, electricity, etc., without recourse to any other hypothesis of inconceivable imponderable agencies.—Scientific American.

WASTE OF OINTMENT.

It has ever been a weakness of the Church, out of which she did not fully emerge with the Reformation, that she has failed to recognize the complete adaptation of the Gospel to our condition, in the full compensation to the Church for the loss (if we may so speak) of the bodily, by the Spiritual presence of Christ; and, in accordance with this semi-belief, she has also exhibited a proneness to multiply material mediums of devotion, as though to supply this mistaken want—to repair this fancied loss.

Whilst reverently accepting the Scripture testimony of the rightly directed devotion of Mary in her apparent wastefulness of the precious ointment, we do not see that it can be brought to bear in favor of lavish expenditure in connection with devotional service. We believe that the "poor, whom we have always with us," (being in this sense the representatives of Jesus, whom we have not always,) are the legitimate channel through which our gratuitous bounty should flow back to the Giver; while at the same time no means should be withheld that would enable the mind to acquire larger conceptions of God, that it may lavish itself upon Him. Would this standard of Christian liberality be elevated, or rendered less gross or material, by the admission of another "field of offering," where the rich might bring gifts for the decoration of churches, or purchase costly "communion services," wherein only a mere material representation of spiritual communion can be realized? All this would imply a forgetfulness that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing. As the bodies of believers are the most holy of material things, being Temples of God, would it not be more reasonable—"waste" being here out of the question—to bestow our gushing piety upon them instead of wood, or stone, or metals. While "piety cannot be limited to the form of almsgiving," can it be expanded by erecting material monuments? The position of the true worshipper should be where nothing could come between him and Christ. He would be more thoughtful to conduce to the symmetry of that Church which must be presented without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, than to yield his sensibilities to the transient spell of architecture, or painting, or music. Did the Church more fully realize the "Spirit of the Gospel," she would not doat upon such tangible mediums to receive her piety or assist her devotions. While the Maker has so profusely lavished his skill in painting the lily of the field, or giving the bird of paradise his gorgeous plumage, enough to absorb our admiration of the beautiful, should we not render Him an irreverence to bring our own devices of beauty into close proximity, as aids to our devotions?

The Jews were indoctrinated that God's pleasure accepted and absorbed the vaporizing of material things, and while Jesus, being subject to the law, acquiesced in many things in the spirit of the law, He ever pointed His disciples to "greater works than these, because," said he, "I go unto my Father.'

Then let us not sew a piece of the old upon the new, but recognize in the ministrations of Jesus a dovetailing of the dispensations together, each projecting at intervals into the other, forming an exact and harmonious connection, which was completed at the death of Christ, one circumstance of which may remind those who love externals in religion, that although it may be a pious motive that would thus embalm the body of Jesus, it is the wisdom of God that has taken it away, leaving the intermediate clear of material obstructions to a direct application of the spirit to its Maker.

HINDRANCES TO THE EFFICACY OF VOCAL PRAYER.

What we complain of is this:—From acquired indistinctness of voice, from grotesque metaphor, from "the sin of excessive length," from the want of naturalness, from the use of the worst and most deadly forms—the forms that are unwritten—forms of their own, which are but the petrified expressions of old and extinct prayers; from deficiency in sacred awe before God, perhaps leading to language of endearment verging on profanity—perhaps to the constant repetition of the Great Name as a mere waste-word of prayer—a word for the mind to rest upon, while it collects itself for the next sentence, like the constantly recurring phrases in the oldest poetry, used for a similar purpose by the bards—from these and other faults, individual or conventional, those who are called upon to utter our prayers for us may sometimes exhaust our powers of attention, be "unfruitful to our understanding," and even tend to keep our minds away from God, instead of aiding us in our approach to Him.—*C. CHRISTIAN MORALITY IN BUSINESS.

It seems to me that men lower their standard in the affairs of this life.
